Then take the farms and country villages of our older States as they were a generation ago. Some of you remember the kind of atmosphere that pervaded those quiet, rural homes, and the kind of men that grew up in them. It is where a large part of the strong men in all our great cities have come from. These innumerable little springs back among the hills are what have been feeding the rivers of civic righteousness. But now, when you travel about the country, have you not grown anxious to see how many of those springs seem to be running dry; how often the village life has lost the intelligence and character of other days; how the old farms have passed into the hands of aliens, and the old church on the green stands almost empty. If the springs dry up, how long will the rivers flow?

And even in the cities, do we not grow anxious to see how often the healthful community of other days seems to have been cut in two? In olden times there might be some accounted poor, and some accounted rich, but the most of the people lived between those extremes, and the different grades of prosperity merged imperceptibly into each other. Nowhere could you draw any sharply separating line. The people all owned something, and nearly all expected to do some work. But to-day we can hardly close our eyes to the fact that a line of separation has been drawn, or a gulf of separation, which threatens to grow wider, leaving two distinct classes; as if something had dropped out between. But there is reason for grave anxiety lest that thing which has dropped out between was what used to be a chief source of national virtue and strength.

In France, you remember, when Louis XIV revoked the great edict, most of the Huguenots had to flee the country; they were the intelligent, prosperous class of artisans, and after they were gone France was left with little or nothing between the wealthy nobles, who owned the land, and the ignorant poor who sweated in tilling it. Something had dropped out between, and they discovered too late that that something had been the source of a large part of the national virtue and wealth; the loss of that something was the ruin of France. No nation can do without righteousness in the hearts of the people; but the supply of righteousness is likely to run out if ever the time should come when nothing is left us in our great cities but two divided and antagonistic classes of the rich and the poor.

I need not go on mentioning those many occasions for anxiety on the part of every American who cares for his country. It is enough to remind you that they exist.

The conclusion of the whole matter is this: If we do care for our country, then we must loyally sustain those influences which will still work righteousness in the hearts of our countrymen. A nation's fate will not be determined by the issue of some great battle, but by the issue of the character of the people, the righteousness or unrighteousness of the several men and women. But the influences that work such righteousness in the hearts of the people are without observation; they do their work quietly, steadily, without much noise of trumpets: The godly home, the school, the church; some plain colporteur leaving a tract at a door, or a Bible on the table, or going in and teaching a father to pray with his household. Some good woman in the village drawing the children into Sunday School, teaching them the sweet story of Jesus. Some home missionary in the West riding from station to station of his big parish, calling little groups of people together to pray and to hear these words of God. So, little by little, innumerable tiny seeds scattered over a great field; innumerable tiny drops of rain making fruitful the soil of a continent; little by little, with much patience and waiting, working for men, women and children, one by one. It is only so that any people can be made all righteous, that any nation can be saved.

You and I, as good Americans, want to claim our share in that kind of work for the saving of America. We ought to be working at it every day of our lives in our homes, in our shops and offices, in the activities of our church, by all the power of our living example. May the God of our fathers show each of us here and now what our own share of that great work is.

International Women's Congress in Berlin

THE International Council of Women meets every five years, and owes its origin to American, French, and English women, who in the year 1888, met at a Congress in Washington. The movement had no prominence, however, until 1893, when following an invitation from the Woman's Division of the World's Congress in Chicago, it had its first formal meeting there at that time. Delegates from more than thirty nationalities took part, and upon their return to the homeland they founded individual societies, and were united with the International Council of Women. To-day there are more than nineteen National Societies, spread over the entire universe, and with a membership of between seven and eight million women. The Woman's Society of Germany, which sent out invitations to their Congress held recently in Berlin, belongs to this International Council.

The International Council of Women has no other motive than the furtherance of woman's interests, which is shown by their motto: "All that you should wish all people should do to you, that do you also to them." Only delegates who are elected by them belong to the National Society. In Germany, these are Frau Marie Sitt of Dresden, Chairman of the Society of German Women; Frauline Anna Pappe of Berlin, and Mrs. Helene V. Foster of Nurnberg.

The President of the International Council of Women is Mrs. May Wright Sewall of Indianapolis, but she will remain in office until the expiration of her term, and the rules of the Society are that a new President must be elected every five years. She received her academic education in the Northwestern University. She was the first woman to enforce the inspection of public schools in America.

The Vice-President is Lady Isabel Aberdeen, who is a descendant of the old Scotch family of the house of Aberdeen. Growing up among the people, she early learned to do her utmost in the way of helping the needy and the oppressed. The founding of a society for the welfare of her people was her first work. Other similar societies soon followed, their object being the elevation and self-support of women. Especially in Canada, where her husband was for five years Governor-General, and where she was beloved by all, she did much for woman's efforts. Because of her literary ability, she received the title of Doctor from the Queen's University of Kingston. The Treasurer is Mrs. Helene Lange, who has earned high honors for the furtherance of woman's interests.

Among the delegates were a great number of well-known women. Holland was represented by the pioneer among its doctors, Dr. Aletta H. Jacobs, who recently celebrated her twenty-fifth anniversary as a physician. From Sweden, came Mrs. Anna Hierta-Retzius, founder of a working school for children, in which the poorest of the poor, both boys and girls, are taught and taken care of, gratis, and learn two trades, so that they may be able to earn their own living. During the fifteen years since this school was founded, the number of beggars in Sweden has materially decreased.

The neighboring land of Norway, also gave a very accomplished woman, Mrs. Gina Krog, who was the first woman speaker in Norway, and founded the first society for Norwegian women's interests. Among the Americans, special mention should be made of Miss Susan B. Anthony, who is eighty-four years of age. She comes of old Quaker stock, which makes no distinction in the education of its sons and daughters.

The programme was arranged so that the Congress should give an illustration of woman's work and her accomplishment along different lines. The Empress of Germany was very gracious, and warmly greeting Miss Anthony, she said: "What a long journey you have taken! How do you like Berlin? I know your long life's work, and your position in the Council of Women." Miss Anthony replied: "I hope your husband the Emperor will vie with the United States in endeavoring to place German women on an equality with men, and that he will devote his attention to this, as well as to augmenting the commercial greatness of his country." The Empress replied, "Men are very slow to comprehend the equality of women with themselves." The American delegates made a favorable impression, owing to their oratory, their clear, concise statements, and distinct, deliberate speaking.

ALL the indications in the Russo-Japanese campaign in Southern Manchuria point to a great and probably decisive battle near at hand, if indeed it has not already taken place. Three Japanese armies, under Gens. Kuroki, Oku, and Nodzu, have been slowly concentrating their forces preparatory to an attack on the Russian position in the neighborhood of Tashichao, or Hai-Cheng. Gen. Kouropatkin, to oppose this powerful movement, has now a considerable army, his forces having been greatly strengthened by new arrivals. The strength of the various commands on both sides is estimated as follows:

JAPANESE
Kuroki	140,000
Oku	140,000
Nodzu	50,000
RUSSIAN
Kouropatkin	185,000
Stakelberg	140,000
Kellar	140,000
Total	365,000

Some estimates place the figures still higher, but the foregoing is conservative, and probably near the actual numbers. The Japanese, besides, have a considerable force investing Port Arthur, and the Russian strength at Liao-yang is unknown.

A week of hard fighting, with severe losses on both sides, made the Japanese masters of all the leading passes, which the Russians had previously occupied. Engagements, in which cavalry, artillery and infantry participated, took place at Sarganhoon, the Champanling and Waitaling Passes, Mo-tien-ling Pass, Phakhfsan, Tafangku, Kevitsiaputsi, Vandiaputsi, Tuinpu and several other points, where the Russians sharply but ineffectively contested the Japanese advance. Kaichau was captured on June 26, after a hot battle lasting two days. On June 28, another Russian force was defeated sixteen miles east of Hai-Cheng. Advices from the front are meagre and confusing, but enough was known on June 28, to justify the conclusion that the main body of the Japanese advance was almost within striking distance of the Russian army, and that a general engagement was imminent. It was reported that after the fight east of Hai-Cheng, the Russians at Tashichao began a hurried retreat to the north, fearing to be cut off. One Japanese army, under Gen. Oku, was pushing the Russians back along the railroad to Kaichau, while Kuroki's troops were fighting their way toward the railroad in the general direction of Hai-Cheng.

It was reported on June 30, that the junction of the Japanese first and second armies had already taken place, and that the united forces of Kuroki, Nodzu and Oku now have a fighting front of 120 miles. Simultaneously with these operations, the Japanese also continued to advance from Siu-yen and Feng-wang-cheng, threatening the Russian line of communications northward. A dispatch from Liao-yang states that in the last week of June, the Japanese were advancing on that place in three divisions, and that Gen. Kellar was preparing to give battle. It is apparently Gen. Kouropatkin's purpose to retire with his main force on Liao-yang, and to avoid a general engagement south of that point.

and Novik, made a sortie from the harbor at dawn, by steamers used for clearing the mines. At 11 A.M. battleships Czarevitch, Retvizan and Pobieda joined them. All the ships then advanced, endeavoring to dispose of the mines laid by the Japanese, but they were hindered by two Japanese torpedo boat destroyers which had been guarding the mouth of the harbor. At 3 P.M. one of the Russian destroyers was set on fire and retired. Subsequently the Japanese decoyed the Russians out to sea, and awaited an opportunity to begin general action, but between 8 and 9 P.M. the Russian Admiral changed tactics and steered straight for port while the rest of the fleet also made the harbor. The Japanese torpedo boat destroyers and torpedo boats chased them, and at 9.30 delivered the first attack. During the night eight separate attacks were delivered, lasting until dawn of Friday. One of these assaults, according to Admiral Togo's report, the Chirataka torpedoed a battleship of the Peresviet type, and sank it. A battleship of the Sevastopol type, a cruiser of the Admiral type, were disabled and towed away. There was considerable loss of life, but no details have been received.

Russian reports of the sortie make no mention of any loss to the fleet. Surprise was expressed in naval circles at the success of the Russians in repairing their ships, and in clearing the harbor entrance of mines.

On Sunday, June 26, after an all-day fight, the Japanese forces investing Port Arthur succeeded in capturing the three Keekwan forts, viz.: the Chik-wan-shan, Chit-an-shan, and So-cho-shan forts, southeast and a part of the Port Arthur defenses. So-cho-shan was captured first, after a hot artillery duel, and the others fell soon afterward. The Russians retreated west, leaving forty dead on the field and several guns. The Japanese losses were still heavier, though no official figures are given. Russian reports mention the loss of one fort only, viz.: Guin-san-chau.

Fighting at the port has been continuous both by land and from the sea. It is stated by late refugees who have reached Chefoo, that Gen. Stoessel has 10,000 troops, 12,000 sailors, and about 700 guns; there is plenty of food, and the men are in good spirits. It is not improbable that the capture of the Keekwan forts may result in making the harbor untenable for the Russian fleet.

RUSSIAN WOUNDED ARRIVING FROM THE FRONT, IN MANCHURIA

Tashichao, which has been prominent in the war news for weeks past, lies due east from Yinkow, the port of New Chwang and on the railway. Almost due north are Hai-Cheng and Liao-yang. East of Liao-yang is the famous Mo-tien Pass, the control of which was so bitterly contested. Kaichau (or Kai-ping) lies south of Tashichao, on the railway. The whole country west of Feng-wang-cheng to the railway is a series of hilly ridges with narrow valleys between. When Kuroki seized the Mo-tien Pass, he endangered the Russian rear. It is not even yet clear how a general engagement can be avoided, except by a precipitate retreat northward beyond Liao-yang, or westward into Chinese territory, across the Liao River.

On June 23, the Russian battleships Peresviet, Poltava, and Sevastopol, and the cruisers Bayan, Askold,

NORTHFIELD'S SUMMER CAMP

GREAT deal has been written about the Bible schools, the preparatory schools, and the Summer Conferences established by the late D. L. Moody, but it is not generally known that he originated one of the most frequent and characteristic summer camps in the New England mountains. He first thought of this camp while in Mexico, and even before he returned to this country the initial arrangements were under way. He wrote then, that he should like to see five hundred men camped each summer on the mountain-side, back of Northfield. This was in 1875. Seven years later, his wish was fulfilled; for in 1882, the camp register reached the 500 point, and last year the total enrolment for the summer was 525. From the beginning of hot weather in June, until the cool days in September, men from the cities or the colleges leave their offices and their studies, and flock to the mountains and rivers around Northfield. Some pack their trunks for an all summer stay—others, less fortunate, come for a month or so—while still others bring their tennis rackets and golf clubs for their two short weeks' vacation.

Life at the camp is very attractive. Where several hundred men are gathered together in one place and bent on having a good time, there is sure to be "something doing," and at Northfield there is every facility for doing it. Immediately in front of the slab dining-room, is a fine tennis court, and a short distance away are a half dozen more. Tournaments are arranged between different players and different schools. To those who are eager to get more from their vacation than a thorough rest and a sound body, the privileges of the Northfield Summer Bible Schools and Conferences are frankly extended. These religious assemblies for years have given tone to Northfield as a summer resort, and many young men who have come to Northfield for tennis and golf, have remained for the meetings. In fact, one of the Conferences—the Student Conference—July 1-10, is dedicated entirely to young men. It is under able and experienced young men leaders, such as John R. Mott and Robert E. Speer. It handles young men's questions, and is attended by a thousand or so of the best young men in the East. During the Summer of 1904, in addition to the Student Conference, there is the Young Women's Conference, the General Conference, and several Bible schools for time is a joyous, noisy occasion, with no formality and not much fastidiousness. Some are given the opportunity of waiting on the table for their board, and all the cooking is done by students of Mount Hermon School. Each tent accommodates four persons. Firm friendships frequently follow this intimate relationship.

The programme of the day is very comprehensive. Immediately after breakfast, a short religious service is held in the centre of the pines, at which some of the leaders of the conferences generally speak. This is one of the most helpful hours of the day, and old campers never forget the "Morning Council," as it was held in the days when D. L. Moody and John G. Paton were frequent visitors there. In the evening, the crowd gather round the camp fire, and with the accompaniment of guitars and banjos, sing old college songs and tell stories. Frequent public entertainments are given. Sometimes excellent programmes are provided, the camp quartette doing very creditable work, and the amateur performers making up in enthusiasm what they lack in skill. Lights go out at ten o'clock. All rules are made by the campers themselves, so that as far as the majority is concerned, there is perfect autonomy. Friction is unknown. The numerous tents in the shade of the pines resemble an army encampment, but the life within the tents is more like a big happy family. This was D. L. Moody's idea when he first planned the camp. He wanted a place where young men, without much money, could spend their vacation; where there would be athletics enough to make a strong man, social life enough to make a broad one, and religious influence enough to make a Christian one.

The camp opened this summer, June 29, and does not close until September 1.

SUMMER DAYS AT CAMP IROQUOIS

HAD visited Lake Placid, and several other beautiful lakes of the Adirondacks, and passed eastward through the beautiful One Valley and Elizabethtown, reaching Westport, on Lake Champlain, at twilight. I thought my trip thus far had included the most beautiful scenery of the Adirondacks, but was most agreeably disappointed, when, the next morning, the steamer Sagamore left her dock at the town of Baldwin, and I, for the first time, beheld Lake George. It was all glorious and peaceful, and I decided to spend two or three days at some quiet retreat there.

Camp Iroquois, a unique settlement at Glen Eyrie, on the stern shore of the lake, nearly opposite the Hague, was pointed out to me. I could see from the deck of the steamer a large dining-room, standing well back in the glen, the cabin on the shore, and the tents artistically arranged, giving a most picturesque appearance, while in front were Golden Island and Mallory Island. Learning that young men were always welcome there, I sought its shelter.

On landing, I found that fifty young men were having a delightful experience in real camp-life, but in a comfortable way. There were tents with board floors, cots, mattresses, pillows, etc., arranged in a semicircle, with a big camp-fire in front, and a dormitory, for those who prefer living indoors, accommodating twenty-five. Fourteen States were represented by young men from Boston, New York, Baltimore, Washington, Savannah, Denver, and other cities of the East and middle West. The cabin on the shore was a thing of usefulness as well as beauty, where newspapers, periodicals, and magazines were on file, with writing material furnished free, a selected library, and general office. The dining-room was decorated with cedar boughs, birds' nests and other curios of the mountains. Never did a meal taste so good—fresh eggs, vegetables, and milk from Glen Eyrie farm, home-made bread, flap jacks, and real New England hushnats, were in evidence, and fresh fish were frequently beautiful and secluded nook at the mouth of the inner glen. Here the twilight hours are spent in social intercourse. Evening prayers are held around the camp-fire or else in the cabin on the shore. Each morning at eight o'clock a short Bible study is conducted in groups. I noted that almost every young man in the camp took special pleasure in these morning studies.

Two Sundays were spent in camp. At 10:30 A.M., a Gospel service was held on the cliff. It had been widely announced, and the people began to assemble at ten o'clock, many coming by boat, and others by carriage and wagon. All were comfortably seated in the shadow of the great rocks and trees. The table and speaker's chair were made of white birch boughs around which the American flag was draped. The address was a simple Gospel message which was listened to by all with the deepest interest. In the evenings, a song service was conducted in the big tent or the cabin on shore.

Any young men looking for a special summer vacation place, may secure an illustrated prospectus by addressing Mr. Tibbitts, Bond Building, Washington, D. C. Parties, or young men's Bible classes from churches and societies, can secure camping-ground free of charge, providing their own equipment, and at the same time receive the protection and influence of this unique camp without fee.

The Saint or the Sinner?

IN the varied experience of our churches, in city and country, the question frequently arises whether a certain applicant should be admitted to the privileges of Christian fellowship. If the applicant for membership happens to be one who has never been a professor of religion, and still more if he be a person who has been notoriously irreligious—dissipated, profligate, "a sinner"—there will be found not a few in our churches who will raise the eyebrows and shrug the shoulders, as they remark that "So-and-So would in no way be a desirable acquisition to our membership."

Now, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has many times had just such a problem sent to it for consideration. It is of such common recurrence that we have resolved to submit the question, in its broadest and most comprehensive aspect, to the judgment of our readers. We now cordially invite them, one and all, as they are interested in the advancement of Christ's Kingdom upon earth, to unite with us in solving the problem:

Is the Church for Saints or for Sinners?

Should a man or woman be barred from the privilege of fellowship with God's people by reason of past sins? Should we receive them in the Spirit of Him who said, "I come not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance," or should we first demand evidence of a change of heart and life, and works meet for repentance? Is a period of probation beneficial, or the reverse? What is the true Christian attitude in the case? Where should the line be drawn, if drawn at all? Will the letting down of the barriers, and the indiscriminate admission of all who apply, result in making the church worldly, or will the church's spiritual influence be strong enough to make them godly?

We shall be glad to receive as many replies as possible to this invitation. All will be accorded due recognition in these pages, and may be the means of helping many who are even now struggling with this difficult question. Address all answers to "THE MAIL-BAG, CHRISTIAN HERALD, New York."

Our Children and the Fourth

IT was a very little country which kept the Fourth of July, when this, our nation, was first independent. It is a very great country to-day. Looking back to the time when those brave men signed the Declaration of Independence in Philadelphia, we understand as perhaps at no earlier period we could have understood, what a fine thing they did, and how fearlessly they counted the cost. That act of defiance is one of the most sublime things in history. Among the men who were not afraid to challenge the power of England and begin a new nation over here in America, there were farmers, merchants, gentlemen of leisure, statesmen and scholars, all moved by one common patriotic impulse.

In the early days of this Republic, it was customary to make the children familiar with that greater charter of our nation's liberties, the Declaration of Independence. The original document, now so faded by time, that it is almost obliterated, is kept among the nation's archives in Washington, where it is jealously guarded, and may not be brought to the light more than once in a generation, lest it become wholly illegible; but science has triumphed over the defacement of time, and photography has given us a facsimile of the great document, which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has scattered broadcast by tens of thousands among the homes of America. As one looks at it, it is not difficult to conjure up, in imagination, the patriotic Jefferson, with eyes aglow, tracing these immortal words with swiftly moving pen. Nor was it surprising that, for many years thereafter, and always on the morning of the glorious Fourth, citizens, old and young, with the growing children, gathered in some public place to hear it read once more, and to listen to a thrilling oration on liberty. The old-time Fourth of July, in the memory of thousands who were children forty years ago, was very significant. Whole towns and villages seemed, overnight, to blossom out with bunting, red, white and blue, and flags and banners were everywhere displayed. There was, of course, a procession of soldiers marching behind the guns, and, in many places, the Sunday Schools or Day Schools had an anniversary, and followed the militia, their young faces bright with excitement, and their steps keeping time with those of the older people in the front. How the band played "Hail Columbia"! How proud every one felt!

We sometimes wish that there were less noise and less explosive concussion in the display of fire-works on the Fourth, and yet there is a certain pleasure about the cannonading and the bright and even vociferous manner of keeping the day that may be borne, when we consider that it is the spontaneous expression of enthusiasm which must have vent. The small boy especially finds no day quite so splendid and so much to his taste.

Looking back to the motley crowd of ill-trained, undisciplined men, in poverty and privation, poorly equipped with ammunition, and having few resources, who set out on the eight years' battle for independence, we cannot sufficiently praise the courage, enterprise and magnificent valor of those who went before us. They builded better than they knew. Are we not sometimes in danger of forgetting the names of the great heroes of that early conflict? Surely there are some names that never should be forgotten: the names of Washington, Adams, Patrick Henry, John Rutledge, John Jay, and many another should be kept forevermore green in memory. And every American child, native or foreign-born, should be taught the Declaration of Independence.

A Moral Movement

THERE are probably few who will not hail as a wholesome sign that speaks well for public morals, the movement among large employers of labor in our Eastern cities to discourage race-track gambling. Recognizing the fact that it is an evil of almost universal prevalence, and that many thousands are unconsciously drawn into the vortex that brings them to ultimate ruin, a number of employers have united in the adoption of new tactics in dealing with the national vice. Many banks, mercantile houses and other establishments have now an unwritten law, rigidly forbidding turf gambling by employees under pain of suspension or dismissal. This example has been followed by wholesale establishments, and it promises to be adopted in many lines of business.

It is a question how far an employer may go in interfering with the amusements or recreation of his employees. Many will contend that when the legitimate service of the day, covering a certain number of hours, is faithfully rendered, the employer has no farther concern with the disposition his employees make of their time. This, however, we do not regard as sound argument. There devolves upon every employer a certain responsibility for the moral and physical welfare of all who are in his establishment. Regular hours and good habits are indispensable to thorough and efficient service in any calling in life. The youth who drinks or gambles, or frequents resorts where his time, money and strength are wasted in dissipation, very soon deteriorates morally, mentally and physically, and becomes undesirable in any capacity.

Gambling on the races is one of the most gigantic evils of our time. It is an insidious vice, which has invaded every section of society, and sought its victims by the tens of thousands, among rich and poor alike. Clerks, tradesmen, office-boys; people on small wages and employees in positions of financial trust; shopmen, and a vast multitude representing every class of labor, are drawn into the vortex. It is even more common than the old-time "policy" gambling before the lotteries were suppressed. As a fruitful source of crime and suffering it has probably no equal at the present day. Some of the most startling defalcations of our time are directly traceable to the passion for race-track gambling.

There are many other forms of gambling, it is true, but this is the worst. We welcome the new movement against it, and trust that it may extend and result in checking thousands of our youth, who are now treading the path that leads to ruin and shame.

The New Serial

A RARE literary feast is that which the Rev. D. Cyrus Townsend Brady, the famous chaplain of the United States Volunteers, has prepared for the readers of this journal, in the serial story, the opening chapters of which will appear on July 27. Dr. Brady has had an experience which exactly fits him to produce a thrilling story of the type of "The Two Captains." His knowledge of history and his experience of the service afloat, combine to give him unusual ability in this special field. He has chosen one of the most romantic and soul-stirring periods of history for the date of his story. It is the time when France, emerging from the Reign of Terror, and the character of the story have borne their part in those awful scenes. The aristocrat who has lost his son on the scaffold, the Jacobin who has aided in the work of slaughter, the new citizen who is hoping to see the world regenerated by the cataclysm which has shocked all hearts, and the innocent lives which are overshadowed by the mighty convulsion—all these are represented in the story. Besides these, there are the two great leaders, Napoleon and Nelson, two of the most romantic figures in history, whose characters in the early manhood Dr. Brady portrays with vivid realism. With these materials he has painted a picture of a time so faithful, and so entrancing that the reader seems to be living in that wonderful era.

He is equally skilful, too, in the weaving of the three ever new yet as old as humanity, into his tapestry, the thread of the love of young manhood and pure girlhood. The two hearts which love draws so close together, and which association and race and tradition hold so sternly apart, appeal to the sympathies of every reader. They are young people of another time than ours, but they are like us in their affection and in their ardor, and their fortunes will be followed in his chapters with delighted interest.

Scenes of stirring warfare afloat and ashore, scenes of tender and thrilling emotion, follow one another in pleasing variety, and keep alive the interest of young and old from the first line to the last. Our readers, who have friends who do not see the paper, would do them a service by telling them of the beginning of this delightful work, which will fascinate and charm them with its extraordinary power and pathos.

Among the Workers

—THE EIGHTH Annual Bible Conference at Grove City, Pa., will be held August 4-11.

—A VERY SUCCESSFUL series of undenominational Gospel meetings, has been held lately in the M. E. Church, Sea Cliff, N. Y., Rev. George William Carter, pastor.

—BEAUMONT, TEX., has been experiencing quite a religious awakening. Evangelist Charles R. Scoville, Chicago, assisted by singer DeLoss Smith, recently closed a very successful series of meetings of two weeks there. They reported two hundred and fifty new members to the Christian Church. Evangelist A. Mulkey held at the same time revival services in connection with both the M. Church South and the Baptist Church. A large number of new members were brought into these churches.

—A REMARKABLY successful series of union evangelist meetings, has just closed at Benton Harbor, Mich. The churches joined in inviting the evangelist, Rev. Milford H. Lyon, of Wheaton, Ill., to lead the movement. A choir of a hundred voices was led by his singer, Mr. Charles Coultres, of the Moody Bible Institute. A tabernacle was built, seating about seventeen hundred. Many evenings hundreds were unable to gain admission. During the month, six hundred people came forward and professed to receive Christ as their Saviour and Master. These included many of the prominent business men of the city. On one day all the business houses of the city, as well as the saloons, closed for the meetings. Mr. Lyon is now leading a union campaign at Baraboo, Wis., where a tabernacle, seating almost two thousand, has been erected.

Changes in the Cabinet

THREE new appointments in the President's official family having become necessary, have been duly made, and have been met with general public approval. The three men, whose portraits are published on this page, are well known, and will bring strength to the Cabinet. Mr. Victor Howard et al, who succeeds Mr. Cortelyou as Secretary of Commerce and Labor, is a member of Congress from California, and was serving his third term when appointed to the Cabinet. He is fifty-one years of age, and a native of New York State. He is a graduate of Yale, and was admitted to the bar in 1876. He went to California to practice law in 1878, but entering political life, was elected to Congress. The vacancy in the Cabinet which he now fills, was caused by Mr. Cortelyou under the management of the Republican campaign, in deference to the President's wish. Mr. William H. Moody leaves the Navy Department to become Attorney-General in succession to Mr. P. C. Knox, who has been appointed by the Governor of Pennsylvania, Senator, the place of the late Mr. Matt. Quay. Mr. Moody is fifty years of age, and is a native of Newbury, Mass. He graduated from Harvard in 1876, and served in Congress from 1895 until he was called to the cabinet to succeed Mr. Long as Secretary of the Navy. He was one of the most popular speakers in the House, and during his short service in the Naval Department, has demonstrated his executive ability.

VICTOR H. METCALF
Secretary of Commerce and Labor

WILLIAM H. MOODY
Attorney General

PAUL MORTON
Secretary of the Navy

Mr. Paul Morton, who succeeds Mr. Moody as Secretary of the Navy, was born in Detroit, Mich., in 1857. His family associations with politics have been with the Democratic party, and until four years ago Mr. Morton himself was accounted a Democrat. He was, however, opposed to the candidacy of Mr. Bryan, in 1896, and since 1900 has been regularly identified with the Republican party. His father was Secretary of Agriculture during President Cleveland's second term. Mr. Morton is an expert in railroad affairs. He began his career as a clerk at the age of fifteen, and has worked his way up until he is now Vice-President of the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Railroad.

The positions which these men are called to occupy are places of great responsibility as well as of honor, for they are not only the directors of their respective departments, but are the advisers of the President and jointly responsible with him for the policy of the nation. Now that the country is coming so prominently into the family of nations and taking the place rightly belonging to it in the affairs of the world, it becomes increasingly important that the counsellors of the Chief Executive be men of wisdom and discretion. They will all do well to heed the injunction the ancient king gave to his administration:

Deal courageously and the Lord shall be with thee good (II Chronicles 19: 11)

Perdicaris Liberated

As predicted in this journal last week, Raisuli, the Moorish brigand, has set at liberty Mr. Perdicaris and his stepson, Mr. Varley. Mr. Hay's peremptory dispatch, intimating that he was tired of excuses and subterfuges, and that the United States demanded Perdicaris alive, or Raisuli dead, had probably much to do with the prompt closing of the negotiations. The Sultan of Morocco apparently granted all that Raisuli asked. He released the prisoners of Raisuli's people, and paid over the ransom demanded. Mr. Perdicaris and Mr. Varley reached Tangier on June 25, after a long ride from the place of their captivity. They were looking thin and worn. They complained of having suffered many hardships during the five weeks they had been held, but said that they believed Raisuli had done all in his power to mitigate their suffering. There was a joyful demonstration to welcome them back to Tangier, the citizens joining the personal friends of the captives in congratulating them. Mr. Perdicaris is evidently very popular in Tangier. His hospitality has been remarkable, and many foreigners who have been stranded in Morocco have been indebted to his kindness. It was a notable tribute to his character, that when it was learned that he was ill, the correspondent of an English journal, then at Tangier, offered himself as a substitute, in order that the sick man might return to his home and be nursed by his wife. The bandit, however, would not listen to the offer. The very fact of Mr. Perdicaris being so popular rendered him all the more valuable as a hostage. It now remains for the Sultan to deal with his rebellious subject, who has humiliated him. It is release of his followers, and getting the other concessions he wanted. Mr. Perdicaris, though innocent of any offence against him, has had to pay the penalty, and many a prisoner is now rejoicing in liberty through his suffering. So it often is in this world. The pity of it is, that in that greatest of all cases of vicarious suffering, so many neglect to avail themselves of the deliverance wrought for them.

The word preached did not profit them, not being mixed with faith in them that heard it (Heb 4: 12).

Radium Photographs

A quantity of pitchblende extracted from mines at Leavenworth Gulch, about fifty miles northwest of Denver, Colo., has been handed to a scientist at Minneapolis, Minn., for analysis. In the course of his tests he discovered the presence of uranium, copper and other minerals. He called a photographer to his assistance, who has made a photograph from the light emitted by the ore. He placed it in a closed box, from which all light was excluded. With this he put a key and two coins on a dry plate. The result was a perfect photograph. The ore was four inches long and two inches wide, and an inch thick. The remarkable feature of the experiment was the fact that the light from the pitchblende was not visible to the naked eye, even in the dark, but it evidently contained the elements that until recently were supposed to exist only in the light of the sun. Thus, even in darkness, may things be not only revealed, but their presence recorded. So is it with the things of the spirit. Even our secret thoughts, and the evil in our minds that never comes to light, in word or deed, may be indelibly registered against us.

Who will bring to light the hidden things of darkness, and will make manifest the counsels of the heart (I. Cor. 4: 5).

Mixed Fruit

A correspondent of this journal, referring to an article which appeared on this page recently, writes that there is no doubt of the fact that fruit of different kinds may be combined by the process of grafting. She says that on her father's farm, in Genesee County, N. Y., there is an apple tree which bears five varieties of fruit. Still more remarkable, there is one limb on which the fruit is itself mixed. An apple from this limb, when cut crosswise, shows part a rich yellow and the other part green. The yellow part is delicious to the taste, but the green is extremely sour. The grafting was done by a former owner of the farm and there is no record left of the means adopted, but the result is incontestable, as is proved by the apples still gathered from the tree. It is not generally known that such combination exist in natural fruits, but there would be no incredulity about the mixture in human nature. In the best of us, there are streaks of evil which only the grace of God can eradicate, while in the worst of us, there are good qualities which show the divine origin of our nature, and may become, under divine influence, the germs which Christ can use for our reformation.

If they abide not in unbelief they shall be grafted in, for God is able to graft them in again (Rom. 11: 23, R. V.).

BRIEF NOTE

Dr. G. Campbell Morgan has cabled Mr. Wm. R. Moody, of East Northfield, Mass., that he has accepted a call to become pastor of Westminster Congregational Church, London. He will, however, keep his engagement for the Northfield Conference this year.

MR. PERDICARIS AND FAMILY ENTERTAINING GUESTS AT TANGIER

doubtful, however, whether the Sultan has the power to punish him, and it is certain that if a civil war should ensue, France would make it the pretext for occupying the country. The Sultan, therefore, may conclude that his wisest course is to placate Raisuli rather than attempt to punish him. It is evident that Raisuli is an astute desperado, for he could not have adopted more effective measures than those he took for securing the

EAGER TO GO TO MONT-LAWN

FROM every quarter of New York's crowded districts, come appeals for the little children that they may have a vacation at Mont-Lawn. They come from the various charitable organizations that have sent out delegations in former seasons, and from other sources. So great is the need, that were Mont-Lawn capable of entertaining 2,000 children at a time, instead of 200, it would be large enough to give an outing to only a small percentage of the needy children of this great city.

The down-town and other tenement districts teem with child-life, that in many instances only waits for torrid July and August weather to be snuffed out. A short time in the country, where they can run about, amid the flowers, and under the trees, will often restore strength to the little ones, who pine amid their stifling and unwholesome surroundings.

A Sunshine Mission manager writes:

Last year you were kind enough to give a number of the children of the "Sunshine Mission" a delightful outing, which they thoroughly appreciated. It is our intention to send the children away again this summer, and we would like to make application for some of them. The neighborhood of "Hell's Kitchen," as you know, is a very crowded one, and even with your help we did not succeed in getting all of the children away for an outing.

The call comes from various other Associations and Institutions, that have the care of the poor little ones of the city, to renew the good offices of the Children's Home, at Mont-Lawn. Mr. Arthur B. Wakeman, Secretary of Brooklyn Children's Aid Society, writes of the evidence on every hand of the real need of such work as THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home is doing. Mr. Wakeman speaks of the different branches of Fresh Air Work, and says, with it all, it is still most insufficient, and he pleads for a continuance of Mont-Lawn's hospitality for the children, the lives of many of whom depend upon their removal from their poverty-stricken city environment for a short stay in the country.

Miss Harriet Irwin, head-worker at the Gospel Settlement, writes:

There never seemed to be so many children on the East Side as this year, and to get away from the tenement home for a week or more would be a Godsend to these poor children of the hot pavement. Can you make room for some of them?

From the Church of the Ascension comes another appeal:

The children of this Parish, who were sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home, at Nyack, last year, came back with such an enthusiastic feeling in regard to the happy time they had spent there, that we again ask the privilege of sending some of our children to the Home this year. We do not wish you to think we are greedy, but, as you know, there are Homes—and Homes; but this one was of such benefit to the children whom we sent to you, that we would be very glad to send some again.

As if in response to these appeals come other letters enclosing contributions in different sums, to be used for the Mont-Lawn work.

"May God's blessing go with the money, and bring comfort to some of his little ones," writes the Superintendent of the Junior Society of Christian Endeavor of First Baptist Church, Morristown, N. J. The money ($19.00), was raised by the children, who held a fair.

Another letter enclosing $6, came from the primary department of the Baptist Sunday School of Troy, N. H. "This money," writes Miss Florence H. Silcox, "has been earned by the little children. They began in January, and earned it in six weeks, so the little children in the city could go to Mont-Lawn. Some of these little workers are only three years' old. Indeed, they have earned it by the sweat of their brows. Two years ago we sent $3, and last year $3. This year we have worked very hard that two little children might go. I some of the children would write to us we would be delighted to receive their letters."

These efforts of the children for the children, is one of the most delightful phases of this work. Truly "O such is the kingdom of heaven."

Three dollars will give a poor child ten days at the Home; $21 endows a cot for the season, and gives a beautiful vacation to ten needy little ones. Send money to Fresh Air Fund, CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House New York City.

MORE MASSACRES IN ARMENIA

ACCORDING to cable dispatches received by London and Paris newspapers, Armenia has again become the scene of outrage and massacre by the Turks. Russia being fully occupied with her troubles in the Far East, and consequently in no position to interfere with Turkey at the present time, Moslem fanaticism has seized the opportunity to indulge its religious and racial hatred of the Armenians, by a series of atrocities that recall the frightful butcheries of 1896.

The French and British consuls in Turkey have information, said to be reliable, that twenty-eight villages have been destroyed by the Turks within a very recent time, and over 6,000 Armenians slaughtered. The villages of Darmet, Adekelpoum, Arnist, Vari, Vertok, and Mekrokon (say the cable dispatches), were sacked and burned, a great part of the inhabitants massacred and the corpses cast into the wells. "Mekrokon was pillaged by Kurds, who were accompanied by Turkish soldiers. Its church was plundered and profaned. The objects of worship were sold at auction. Every able bodied man was stabbed, most of them in the back. During the night Turkish soldiers entered houses and assaulted the women in them. On the arrival of the British and French consuls, women, streaming blood, rushed to them begging for mercy. Moush is occupied by Turkish soldiery. More than 2,000 women and children from the destroyed villages have taken refuge there. These are wretched, and wander through the streets half dead from hunger and fear."

This latest outburst of Turkish fanaticism—which, like its predecessors, will probably be permitted to pass unpunished by the European powers—is a painful reminder of the dark days of 1896, when Armenia's defenceless people in many cities and villages were almost exterminated. It is said that in that year 100,000 men, women and children of the Christian faith were slain in cold blood in the valleys and on the hillsides of Armenia, while between 300,000 and 400,000 others were rendered destitute and utterly helpless. Flame, rapine, violation and every conceivable form of outrage attended the massacres or followed in their wake, but the so-called civilized powers of Europe gave no sign, and no nation lifted hand or voice to arrest "the nineteenth century Nero," Sultan Abdul Hamid, from his sworn purpose of exterminating the Armenian people.

Armenia, or as the Turks have now named it, Anatolia, is a province of Northwest Kurdistan, having for its boundaries Russia, Persia, Mesopotamia and Asia Minor. The native Armenian population, which in 1896 was estimated at about 650,000, is now probably less than half a million. They are peace-loving, industrious, frugal and kindly. On the other hand, the Turks and Kurds, among whom their lot is cast, are bitter enemies of the Armenians. The Kurds are tribal and predatory, and live in mountain villages over the entire region. When opportunity serves, they become mere lawless brigands. For centuries they have robbed, butchered, abused and despised the Christians, and whenever a Turkish Sultan, or some provincial Vali (Governor) desires to reduce the Armenian population in any district, he simply turns loose upon that district the robber Kurds, and the usual result follows.

If the news contained in the cabled messages, that 6,000 Armenians have been slain, should prove true, it will no doubt be found later, that the bloody scene of massacre and riot enacted eight years ago in Erzeroum, Moush, Sassoon, Oorfa, Van, Kemerik, Moor enek, Mardin, Rusenik, Kaisarea, Harpoot, and scores of other places, have been reproduced with all their attendant horrors. Some of the scenes of the last persecution were truly such as "to make humanity shudder."

In some villages, all the young men were marked for slaughter, and the young girls were carried off by the Turks or the Kurds to meet a fate worse than death. At Kaisarea, the public baths were invaded and helpless women bayoneted there, while young girls were dragged through the streets by the hair and the feet. Infants were impaled on bayonets; in one place sixty young brides and other girls were attacked and murdered in a church, and a stream of blood flowed from the church door; whole villages refusing to deny Christ, were put to the sword and torch; priests were hacked to pieces, babes were slain in cradles or in their mothers' arms; and native Christian teachers were murdered with cruel tortures. In Oorfa several thousand Armenians, principally women and children, were driven into a church which was then set on fire, and nearly all within perished. At Diarbekir, thousands were massacred, and at Karahissar, Arabkir, Palu, and Sivas, similar dreadful scenes were enacted on a smaller scale. Thousands fled to the forests and mountains, many of them to find death by starvation. After the massacres had ceased, and when Turkish blood-thirstiness had been temporarily glutted there was great suffering. Christian America took pity on the plight of the refugees, and with the gifts contributed through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD sixteen relief stations were opened in Armenia, and many thousands of the sufferers were rescued from starvation.

What the outcome of the latest massacres will be, no one can foretell. It is possible that some official remonstrance may shortly reach Constantinople from England and France.

Sunday School in the Wilderness

AN EVERGLADE SUNDAY SCHOOL

DOWN in Everglade, Florida, among the Ten Thousand Islands, there is a flourishing Sunday School, belonging to the Methodist Episcopal Church. Here gather old and young, to teach and learn of the love of Jesus. The young mothers carry their babies, and the little barefoot boys and girls are not deterred by the absence of shoes and stockings from attending the Sunday gathering. "God is with us in the wilderness," writes one of the teachers, and the illustration shows a healthy, happy group, gathered at the entrance to the building.

Young Zulus Eager for the Gospel

FROM north of Inhambane, in South Africa, to beyond the Zambesi, there are about 120,000 square miles of territory in the Portuguese possessions, without a single Protestant missionary for the natives, and perhaps not a single witness of the Gospel of salvation by faith. What the native population of this vast district is, which equals an area almost the whole of the New England States, and the State of Indiana, can not be said; but in no place is it a desert, and in many places it is quite thickly populated. According to estimates in other parts of South Africa, where some sort of census has been taken, the population cannot fall short of a million, and perhaps it is many more.

The natural centre and point of vantage for this great field is Beira, the principal seaport on the east coast, north of Delagoa Bay. It lies at the mouth of two rivers, which are navigable for from fifty to one hundred miles each, and along whose banks there are extensive alluvial flats where sugar and rice are already growing, but nothing in comparison with what the land is capable of producing. It is the entrepôt of Rhodesia and all its great mineral wealth, with which it is already connected by a railway. Another railway is soon to be constructed to Senna, on the Zambesi, thus deflecting another great stream of commerce from the interior to this port. Whether Rhodesia is the ancient empire of King Solomon or not, there is no doubt in the minds of archaeologists that the extensive ruins of an ancient civilization found all over the land, were made by a people who were seeking gold. That much gold is yet coming out of its deep hiding-places, and that Beira, through which it must pass, is to become one of the great cities of South Africa, is a reasonable certainty.

When I was at Beira in 1891, five minutes' walk took me to the end of a dozen zinc shanties which comprised the whole town. Outside of that was wilderness. When I was there again in 1899, I was surprised to find well-built streets, extending a mile from what was bush before. Now the principal street is about two miles long, with cemented sidewalks the whole way, and there is a steam tramway perhaps ten miles of tramway. A line of sea wall of solid masonry has been built, and is still being extended across an inlet from the bay, which will reclaim a hundred acres or more of tide land. All these various industries draw crowds of natives, who come long distances from the interior, as they do at urban and Johannesburg, to get work or to trade. If it is possible to get hold of any of these men and boys, and give them the Gospel, as is being done at Durban and Johannesburg, what wonderful possibilities are here for the spread of the Word on virgin soil!

I am speaking of the district north of Inhambane. From Inhambane south, there are already five or six Protestant societies at work with encouraging success. One may be wondered why such a great and needy field has been so long neglected. A recently prepared missionary map of Natal and Zululand, shows that in this vast field there are already twenty-six different societies at work, on one hundred and fifty stations, and more are coming every year. It shows where stations of one society are wedged in between stations of another society with scarcely an hour's walk between. One church station has been started within the year by a new society from America. Why is this? Why do new missionaries and new societies coming to South Africa all drop down here, in Natal, where it is impossible to find a place for them without encroaching upon the field of some other society, and leave a vast field totally unoccupied? Natal is a popular field. It has one of the finest climates in the world. One may have here almost all the comforts and conveniences of advanced civilization. Beira is not a popular field. The climate, especially of the surrounding districts, is bad. It is the centre of a great malarial belt. It is not a good place to bring up a family, not only on account of the climate, but on account of the moral malaria which infests the region. Nevertheless, the fact that there are already about two thousand white people making their homes there, many of whom have their families with them, including the Governor and other high officers besides other men of wealth and influence—shows that white people can live there. Shall we, who are seeking to advance the Kingdom of Christ, allow ourselves to be surpassed in courage and endurance by those who are seeking only their selfish interests?

But there is another reason that has kept missionaries out of this field. It is a Portuguese possession, and that government is not favorable to Protestant missions. In fact, according to the laws of the country, no Christian mission is recognized but the Roman Catholic.

work which rolled down upon me. In about two weeks, I had ninety boys enrolled as members of a night school, which proved to be a day school as well, for they would keep coming all day long, whenever they could get off from work, to learn to read. The Zulu primers I brought with me were all sold in three days, and then there was such a clamor for more, that I wrote alphabet slips on the type-writer, hectographed them, and gave them to the boys in lieu of primers. These were in evidence all over the town. Often as I was passing along the streets, I would see a knot of boys squatting in the sand, poring over one of these slips, or I would hear them going over their lessons in some back alley, "Ba, be, bi, bo, bu." When I remember that we were nearly two years at Inhambane before we found a single native who showed any real interest in lessons or books, it seemed to me that this new development was something wonderful. Such enthusiasm could not pass unnoticed, and soon a spirit of opposition was manifested, which came, strange to say, not from the Portuguese, but from the English residents. One night, an Englishman came into my school, and drove all my boys downstairs, hastening their progress with the toe of his boot. Then he turned upon me with dire threats if I should proceed with my work. Another wrote to the Beira Post as follows:

Sir:—From native sources I learn that a night school for our black brothers is to be inaugurated in Beira, where the three R's and other accomplishments are to be taught—some of the said b.b.'s having already worried their employers for a shilling, and a pass to attend. If this be true, I, with many others who are fairly acquainted with the African natives, think that the sooner it is prevented, or if started, stopped, the better it will be for the white population here and elsewhere in South Africa. Are not times sufficiently hard, and money scarce, without having domestic expenses increased by such folly? For so soon as the natives know they are our "brothers"; that they can wear boots and clothes similar to the white race; that better food and drink should be theirs; and other weak-minded fallacies are instilled into their shallow heads—such will be the inevitable result if this is permitted. . . . If this school is allowed to be established, probably day schools, with the usual vacations, churches and theatres will follow, and at last the white population will have to sit side by side with those who were and always should be our menials and our servants. Missions and schools are of inestimable value to the poorer classes of white people, but an unmitigated curse if extended to the blacks.

I have felt very grateful for these distinguished notices of my work. Some might think otherwise. But I think it is because they do not understand the Gospel. They read the apostle's words, "A great door, but many adversaries." But that is not what he said. He said, "and many adversaries." We can ask for no stronger evidence that the battle is ours, than this trumpet-blast from the enemy. We must teach them to read the Gospel for themselves.

I feel strongly called to this field and I am now only waiting for our Society to appropriate or find the means to enable me to return there with my family and Zulu helpers, to go on with the work already begun. I promised those boys when I went away that I would come back, if God would let me. My wife is as deeply interested and as enthusiastic about the work as I am. We have had three years' experience at Inhambane, where the climate is much the same, and we think we know a little better now how to avoid the fever. My knowledge of the Zulu and two kindred dialects spoken at Inhambane, will make it very easy to pick up the dialects spoken at Beira. I have, besides, a considerable knowledge of the Portuguese, which comes very handy when dealing with the Portuguese authorities there. If this is not a call of God, I do not know what a call of God is.

Ifafa Mission Station, Natal. W. C. WILCOX.

A GROUP OF NATIVE BOYS AT BEIRA

When I first went to Inhambane, I received a formal notification from the Governor, that I should not be allowed to go on with mission work unless I was ready to submit to the authority of the Roman Catholic bishop. I found that there is a way of getting a foothold and going on with mission work without exactly contravening the law, and now the precedent is so thoroughly established, that mission work is not likely to be interfered with as long as we proceed in this way. When I received the injunction from the Governor, I went to see him, and found that the Portuguese laws do not curtail liberty of conscience, and any man has a right to believe or worship according to the dictate of his conscience, in his own house, which privilege may be extended to all the inmates of his household, or of the houses or places over which he may have charge. In this way, mission work was begun at Inhambane, where there are now four societies at work, and later, the Swiss mission moved its headquarters from Spoken down to Delagoa Bay, where it now has a church built at a cost of $20,000, and over 1,000 members.

I have just returned from a visit to the place, and have made a beginning in a small way; but I was fairly driven back for reinforcements, by the avalanche of

Nellie's Experiment

By E. H. PORTER

NELLIE was ten. Her calico gown was full of darns and patches, and her shoes—if she wore any at all—were gray with age. Her dinners were light, her breakfasts lighter, and her suppers the lightest of all; for Nellie's was not the only mouth that the Widow Holbrook tried to feed on a scanty income from washing and scrubbing, and Nellie and her four brothers and sisters went many a time hungry to bed.

Yet it was only to-day that Nellie had discovered that she was rich. Had she not the broad fields and the shady woods in which to roam to her heart's content? Were not daisies by the dozen waiting for her eager fingers whenever she went down to the meadows back of the house?

It was from a weekly magazine given her by her Sunday School teacher that Nellie had learned that there were little girls in the world not nearly so rich as she—little girls who lived in hot brick houses or dirty streets, where there was no grass to walk on and where there were no flowers to pick. Nellie had never been to the city, but she could see it all so plainly; and, oh, how her heart ached!

Then she read on, laboriously spelling out the longer words, she learned that others were sorry for the children, too, and that there was a beautiful summer home called Mont-Lawn, which was on purpose to give these poor little city waifs a taste of the precious outdoors which she herself enjoyed every day of her life! Just at the foot of the page was a paragraph explaining that three dollars sent to the office of the magazine would take one child to Mont-Lawn for a ten-days' vacation.

Nellie was jubilant. She herself would send one of these poor little hot children into the cool Mont-Lawn fields. Of course she would! She hurried to the kitchen shelf and took down her little tin bank. Its contents jingled pleasantly. Nelly ran errands occasionally and received a penny or two. She had long been saving this money. There must be a lot there now! The bank once emptied, Nellie counted her wealth. There were just twenty-seven cents. Twenty-seven cents—and she wanted three dollars.

"Mother, how long would it take me to earn three dollars?" begged Nellie that night.

"Three dollars! Bless you, dearie, mother herself can't earn such a lot as that without days and days of work," returned Mrs. Holbrook.

All the next morning Nellie lay out under the trees by the brook, thinking. It would take miles of errands and a whole summer of time to bring her twenty-seven cents up to three dollars, and by then it would be winter. But there was so many people in the village with such lots of money. There were old Mrs. Smithson in the big house on the hill, and Mr. Hegan, the rich banker, and Mrs. Edwards, who wore such pretty dresses, and lots of others. If all these people would each give something. Nellie suddenly sat upright with the thought that had come to her—what if they all gave three dollars apiece! Ah, then she could send heaps of children. And they'd do it, of course. Probably they didn't know there were any poor little boys and girls that couldn't walk on grass or pick flowers. If they only knew it, they'd be glad to give the money, of course!

She sprang to her feet. With swift feet Nellie ran home, and the next morning, with her brown curls carefully brushed, she started in her worn shoes and patched calico for the great house on the hill.

She was a little frightened when she rang the bell. The plate-glass panels in the great oak doors reflected her thin little face and her scanty gown in a manner most disconcerting. She was more frightened when a tall man—very grand to Nellie, but in reality Mrs. Smithson's butler—swung back the door and looked coldly into her face.

"Well, what is it, little girl?"

Nellie was speechless. Her dry lips refused to move.

"Come, come, don't keep me waiting like this," remonstrated the man, impatiently.

Nellie swallowed and choked a little.

"If yer please, sir," she faltered, "I—I want ter ask Mis' Smithson ter give—"

"Not to-day, little girl," he interrupted pompously. "We don't have anything to do with beggars, and—"

Nellie's terror suddenly fled.

"I am not a beggar!" she began, with blazing eyes; then she stopped short and the color left her cheek. "That is—well, I am kind of a beggar," she finished hesitatingly.

A rippling laugh came from the inner hall.

"James, what in the world have you there?" called a clear voice. "It's not often one meets with such refreshing candor."

Nellie's "grand man" became all deference at once.

"It's one of the Holbrook children, I think, Miss Carrol," he murmured, as a pretty young lady came to the door.

"I want ter see Mis' Smithson," announced Nellie with sudden dignity.

"So you shall!" laughed the young lady. "Come with me, my dear." And she led Nellie through the long hall, up the wide stairs and on through two richly furnished apartments to Mrs. Smithson's private sitting-room. "Auntie," began Nellie's escort again, pausing before a gray-haired lady in a handsome morning dress, "Here is a small maid who says she isn't a beggar, and yet is 'a kind of a beggar!'"

Mrs. Smithson languidly turned from her book. "Ugh!" she shuddered daintily. "Her boots are dirty, Mabel. Don't you think, dear, you were a little rash to bring her inside? She may carry germs and microbes!"

A bright red flushed Nellie's face. "Madam, I hain't got a single one!" she flashed indignantly. "I've only got my magazine. I don't know what germs and microbes be, but I know I hain't got 'em!"

The young lady laughed outright, and even Mrs. Smithson smiled.

"Well, well, child, I hope you haven't, I'm sure," said Mrs. Smithson, in what was meant for kindly tones. Then she turned to her niece. "Mabel, do get the little thing something to eat and let her go."

"I'm not hungry," interposed Nellie; then she stopped and blushed again. "Oh, yes, I'm hungry, of course," she added, cheerfully, "but that isn't what I come for."

"Another illustration of that remarkable frankness," laughed Mabel; but Nellie did not notice. She had opened her magazine, and was now at Mrs. Smithson's side, the papers spread before her.

Ten minutes later, her story ended, and the name and address of the magazine left with Mrs. Smithson, Nellie was hurrying down the hill.

"They'll send it—they'll send it—I know they will!" exulted Nellie, quite hugging herself with joy. "Now I've got one of 'em started for Mont-Lawn!"

At that moment Mabel was saying to her aunt: "There, what a careless thing I am! I let that poor little midget go off after all, without a single thing to eat; and she actually looked half-starved."

"Hm-m!" murmured Mrs. Smithson. "A strange child—a very strange child!" she added, as she turned again to her book.

Nellie's success had put new courage into her heart, yet it was with some misgiving that she entered the First National Bank and asked the man behind the iron netting for Mr. Hegan. The teller was a round-faced, good-natured man, and something in the pathetic little figure before him touched his heart.

"So, so, my little maid," he began jovially, "what in the world do you want with Mr. Hegan?"

"I—I want ter see him."

"But Mr. Hegan is a very busy man. He can't be bothered with trivial affairs."

"I'm not a trivial 'fair,' declared Nellie stoutly.

"Important business, perhaps, eh?"

"Yes, sir."

The teller laughed; then his face grew almost stern.

"There, there, little girl, I don't want to be cross with you, but you really must run away and not block the window any longer. You can't see Mr. Hegan to-day, unless you tell me what your business is."

At that moment Nellie caught sight of a familiar figure at the end of the corridor. Mr. Hegan had evidently just come in from the street. Another moment and she was close at the man's side.

"Mr. Hegan—please—I want you!" she panted.

"Eh?—What?" demanded the old man, gruffly.

"I—I want ter speak ter you," faltered Nellie; then, mindful of the teller's words, she added, "on—on 'portant business!"

"Well, well, upon my word!" ejaculated the man, pushing open the door of a small room near by, and motioning Nellie to enter—though scarcely realizing what he was doing.

Nellie darted inside, spread her magazine upon the great polished table, and began to speak very rapidly.

"There, Mr. Hegan, that's where the poor little boys and girls live—where all those dirty looking houses and snippy streets are. And over here is the fields an' the woods, an' the little white beds—and that's where they eat, and—"

"What in the world are you talking about?" snarled the banker.

"Why, I'm tellin' you so you can send some money—"

"Money!" interrupted the man, his mouth settling into stern lines. "I might have known as much! See here, child, I've no time to bother with your nonsense. Run away and—"

"Oh, please, Mr. Hegan, it ain't nonsense—truly. Just s'pose you were shut up inside brick walls and—"

"Well, I am," he snapped.

"Oh, but you can get out, and they can't, and—"

"Come, come, child!"

"Just think, when you was a little boy, if you couldn't got outdoors and smell the grass and lie down 'side the brook an—"

Nellie talked on and on, but the man scarcely heard. Swift as thought he was a boy again, flat on his back in the woods, with the twitter of the birds in his ears and the flicker of the sunlight in his eyes.

What was it that made Banker Hegan's eyes grow moist? What was it that made the hard lines vanish from his lips? What was it that caused the great man to draw a check and hurriedly place it in an envelope, then address the whole under Nellie's careful guidance?

Certainly Nellie herself did not know, but she went on her way rejoicing.

It was afternoon when she rang Mrs. Edwards' bell. The lady herself opened the door.

"Please, marm, may I come in a minute?" asked Nellie.

"Come in? Why, yes, I suppose so," acquiesced Mrs. Edwards, with unflattering hesitation. "Let's see—you're one of the Holbrook children, aren't you? Well, what is it?" she finished, sitting down on the hall chair, and leaving Nellie standing before her.

"Oh, I just come ter tell yer," began Nellie, opening her magazine, "that there are lots of poor little boys an' girls in New York that hain't been in the country since they was born, and if you'd send some money right away they could go to—"

"Good gracious, child!—you don't mean that you've come here teasing for money to send a lot of children I never heard of into the country?"

"You see, that's just it, Mis' Edwards—it's 'cause you never heard of 'em that come ter tell yer about 'em. They—"

"Why, child alive, it's all I can do to get my own children ready to go. The idea! There, there, run along! I've no doubt you mean well, but it's only two days now before we start for the shore and I'm driven almost to death. I really can't stop to talk a minute!"

"Yes, but don't you see?—your Freddie an' Annie have been away ev'ry summer and I knew that if you only found out that there was some little boys an' girls who hadn't ever been away, that you'd a hea ruther keep Freddie an' Annie to home this year, and let the others go."

"What!" gasped Mrs. Edwards.

"Let two little boys an' girls in New York go, I mean," explained Nellie, her cheeks pink with eagerness. "It don't matter much for Freddie an' Annie, anyhow, you know," she continued cheerfully, "they've always been—besides, this country here an' they don't need it."

"Well, I never!" murmured Mrs. Edwards, weakly; then her eyes suddenly flashed. "See here, little girl, you're altogether too impertinent. You haven't the least idea what you're talking about. You can fold up your paper and run straight home. I sha'n't give you a cent, and I can't stay talking with you another minute!" And she opened wide the door.

With hanging head and sorrowful face Nellie passed through the door and down the walk.

Mrs. Edwards went upstairs to her room with an angry emphasis on each step. Her cheeks were flushed, and her hands trembled as she began to lay out her children's dresses, suits, and undergarments ready for packing.

"The absurdity of it—keep my children home, indeed! The saucy little chit!"

But as the mounds of soft linens, muslins, flannels, and gingham on the bed increased, the flush faded from Mrs. Edwards' cheeks and her face grew troubled. She moved restlessly from room to room, finally sitting down for a few minutes hurried writing at her desk.

"There!" she said, rising with a sealed but undirected letter in her hand. "I hope that tiresome conscience of mine will give me some peace now!"

"Annie," she called a minute later, "want you to take this letter down to the little Holbrook girl—the one with the short brown curls—and I want you to ask her to direct it for me to the magazine; she was telling me about this afternoon. She will understand."

That first day of Nellie's begging was much like those that followed. Very patiently she went from house to house, leaving behind her, sometimes angry, sometimes consternation—but always amazement.

Yet after her visit, Doctor Wainwright and his wife suddenly felt that now they had found a fitting way to spend the dear, dead boy's small savings; and the Hubbard sisters discovered that much might be saved on what was perhaps needlessly elaborate trimming for some new gowns. The Smith twins, too, fell dressing dolls and crocheting tidies for "parlor sale" which they suddenly decided to hold; and old Mrs. Perkins found brand-new way to dispose of part of her missionary money.

And so it went. Even for those familiar with the magazine and the Mont-

A Good Man in Bad Company

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON, BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS*

THE confessions of Jehoshaphat, King of Judah (see II. Chron. chap. 17-20): "I began life on the vantage ground of a favorable heredity as the son of good King Asa, and a descendant of King David. Upon reaching manhood, I deliberately decided to live up to my noble ancestry. When I succeeded my father on the throne, I determined to follow his wise policy, and so destroyed the shrines where idols were worshipped. As a result, the favor of God was upon me. The people were loyal, and bestowed many gifts upon me, so that I had riches and honor in abundance. The great number of my warriors gave me security in my kingdom from foreign kings. All went well with me until, in an evil hour, I formed an alliance with King Ahab, and with him went out to battle against the Syrians, to recover the city of Ramoth-Gilead. It is true I did not enter upon the expedition with readiness, not until after the prophets had been consulted.

"Some said one thing, and some another. I finally decided against my conscience, and went. My love of adventure made me personate Ahab in the battle. I wore his armor, and rode in his chariot. It came near costing me my life, as I found out to my sorrow that the King of Syria had instructed his warriors to aim only at King Ahab. Under the circumstances, my escape was a miracle. I reached Jerusalem a sadder and a wiser man. King Ahab himself was killed by a chance arrow from a Syrian bow.

"The Lord sent his prophet Jehu to me with a severe rebuke or 'helping the ungodly, and loving them that hated the Lord.' I was so thoroughly convicted of my wrong-doing that I tried to make amends by going among my people as a teacher of righteousness. Hitherto I had sent teachers, but I thought I must show my repentance by going myself.

"Ah, me! I come now to another dark part of my life. Surely, I sinned against great light when I formed another compact with the house of Ahab. I entered into a ship commercial partnership with Ahaziah, the son and successor of Ahab. My punishment was the destruction of our ships in storm (II. Chron. 20: 35-37). But I was not deterred from further evil associations. I joined myself to Jehoram, the second son of Ahab, and went out with him to invade the land of Moab. The expedition would have failed because of lack of water for our warriors. All would have perished with thirst but for the efforts of the prophet Elisha, through whose prayer to God water was caused to spring up out of the ground. Oh, how I was humiliated by the Lord's goodness and mercy to me. Evil associations, political, commercial—yes, and matrimonial, for I married my son to a daughter of Jezebel and Ahab—have been the curse of my life. Oh, why have I yielded to them, when I had the power within myself, by the help of God, to be a just and useful man? The world will hardly know whether to consider me on the whole a good or a bad man. May my besetting sin of evil associations be a warning to all that read my story." (See record of his evil alliances in II. Chron. 18; 19; 21: 2).

Illustration and Application

The lesson text gives the bright moon of a life which also had a night morning, but let us not pave out of view its equally instructive but less pleasing afternoon, repeatedly overshadowed by heavy clouds through Jehoshaphat's strong propensity for bad company—his evil alliances, political, military, commercial and social, that require us to set beside Jehoshaphat's Reform, this besetting sin, and suggest as a companion text to his, "Deal courageously and the Lord shall be with thee." Jehu's rebuke, "Shouldst thou help the wicked, and love them that hate the Lord? Nevertheless there are good things found in thee" (II. Chron. 19: 1-3).

What is it to be good? That suggests as our lesson topics: 1. What constitutes "a good man?" 2. Was Jehoshaphat a good man? 3. Am I good? 4. To what extent is it my duty to separate ourselves from the wicked?

The word "good," means a hundred different things to a hundred different men. After visiting Helena, Mont., in its latest days, I was startled to hear a shoemaker in a near city say, "Helena is a good town." He meant that it was a good place to make money, as Shylock said, "Bassanio is a good man," and hastened to explain that he was good for his bond, but the true meaning of goodness is Godness, that is, God-ness in moral character. There is always in human lives a combination of mixed motives. A cabinet officer once said to the writer's hearing at a religious meeting in Washington, "The New Testament division of men into sheep and goats, lacks scientific accuracy. The dividing line goes not between men but through them. Everyone is both sheep and goat." Those of us who believe the Christ, whose classification was thus criticized, "knew what was in men," nevertheless, see the half truth in what the critic said. No man is wholly good. But Christ knew—what we all ought to keep in mind in judging ourselves and others—that although motives are mixed in men, right motives rule some, and evil motives others. It is by this test that we determine whether a man should be called a good man or a bad man. Some are disappointed that the sincere beginning of a Christian life is not the end of sinning. A little girl who had joined the Church in great joy, praying that she might never do wrong again, on finding she had yielded to sin through impatience, went quickly in like impatience to God, and prayed, "O Lord, I asked you to make me good, and why didn't you do it?" A more reasonable prayer was that of a boy who said, "O Lord, make me good, and if at first you don't succeed, try, try again." He was probably too patient with slow progress, and probably was not trying enough himself, like the girl who was asked if she was a good girl, and replied briskly, "Not velly good, not velly bad, just a comferable little girl."

"THE LORD HATH SPOKEN EVIL AGAINST THEE"

Jehoshaphat is but one of many cases that disprove the juvenile idea that the most comfortable life is one that is neither very good nor very bad. He found a half-and-half life, full of tribulation, as if he had been pulled strongly in opposite directions. The writer once asked a minister's little girl, "Is your brother a good boy?" She answered carefully, "Well, Tom is not as good as God; but then, Tom is not as bad as the devil." Somewhere in that wide channel, most of us are making our voyage of life. But if not as bad as the devil, most of us are at best only "goodish," or "goody," or "good for nothing." How few are bravely good, deciding habitually for God and right, when our motives battle! That is what constitutes a "good man." Phillips Brooks said: "There is no nobler sight anywhere than to behold a man quietly and resolutely put aside the lower things, that the higher may come in to him. To put aside everything that hinders the highest from coming to us, and then to call to us that highest, which—may, who—is waiting always to come—this as the habit of a life is noble."

Does Jehoshaphat bear this test? Jehu said there were "good things found in him," but that is true of almost every bad man. Many who rob men or cities, or do other mean things for money, are "sweet sinners," kind to their families, generous to the poor, clean in private morals; but by the test of the ruling passion they are bad men. On the whole, their lives do more harm than good. In some, as in Jehoshaphat, good and evil alternately predominate in such a way that we are in doubt whether to call them good or bad, as in the case of Solomon, who is represented by an artist as coming up in the resurrection, and looking anxiously to the right and left of the great white throne, uncertain to which side he will be assigned. The moral is that it is hardly second to being a bad man, and known as such, than for you and me to be such half and half characters, that neither we nor others can be quite sure whether or not it were better we had never been born.

Let everyone ask, "Am I good? Can I claim the promise, 'Deal courageously, and the Lord shall be with the good?'" This golden text profoundly suggests that courage is an essential element of goodness. "Dare to do right." It is largely through cowardice that men sin.

This brings us to that worst foe of goodness, bad company, which leads men astray largely because of their cowardice. To save the young from thus wrecking their lives, let us use the dark chapters of Jehoshaphat's life, as a surgeon would use his knife to save his patient. Away with that spirit which led a mother to ask her daughter's teacher that she might be "taught history with all the painful parts left out." God put pain in the world for a sentinel, and he must not be drugged. Even the discussions of goodness already suggested should not prevent the devotion of fully half the lesson time to the troubles Jehoshaphat got into by four kinds of evil companionships: political, military, commercial, matrimonial. Illustrations of the evil results of such associations are all about us in real life, and should be used bravely though discreetly, omitting names when they will add nothing to the point and may divert attention from the main issue.

For adult classes at this time there is a message in Jehoshaphat's wicked political alliances with Ahab, Ahaziah, and Jehoram. For the young people there is a serious warning in Jehoshaphat's matrimonial alliance for his son, whom he married to a daughter of Ahab and Jezebel (II. Chron. 21: 6).

No wonder there is such a scandalous abundance of divorces in our own land, when even in Christian homes marriage is commonly treated as "midway between a joke and a crime," and the profoundly wise command of God, "Be not unequally yoked with unbelievers," is scarcely recognized at all—to marry wealth, even though it involves marrying wickedness, being generally spoken of as matrimonial success, even though love, as well as character, is wanting. Every motive, hygienic as well as heavenly, should be put behind that command of Him who knows our frame and plans our joys. "Keep thyself pure." Let us teach over and over again those great maxims: "Self-denial is self love living for the future." "A good time is one that don't go off with the having." "That only is true pleasure which is pleasant to remember."

For young men there are lessons in the military alliances of Jehoshaphat that brought him into wicked associations. We suggest as a question for classes of boys and young men whether military life in our day, in war or peace, is "a friend to grace to help us on to God," and under what circumstances a Christian may rightly be a soldier. A soldier about to go to war, sitting alone with his mother, and holding her hand, said: "Mother, when I was a little boy, I used to kneel down by your knees and say my prayers. I should like to do that once more before I leave the dear old home." And so he did. The great strong soldier knelt down at his mother's knees, and prayed aloud as he had done when a little boy. That was a precious memory to leave behind him, for he died in battle.

The disastrous commercial alliance of Jehoshaphat, that resulted in wreck, have widest application to classes of boys soon to enter upon some avocation. Even among Christians, when it is hard to get the position of useful activity most desired, there is too much readiness to do whatever will pay, and whatever will pay most. It was such a motive that led Lot to "pitch his tent at Sodom," and then move in, to the corruption of his whole family. Ruskin urged workmen never to make any harmful thing. There is need of courageous and plain application in home and church of the Word of God. "Come out from among them, and be ye separate, and touch not the unclean thing, and I will receive you."

SUSY PRENTISS AND HER STUMBLING-STONE

"E all have our stumbling-stones."

Mrs. Deacon Wentworth uttered this plaintive statement with a profound sigh. "All of us," she added, "except the Deacon. He's a saint. And maybe you, Susy Prentiss, haven't got any rocks of offence. Mine is my quick temper. I flare up like tinder. The Deacon says he doesn't mind, he'd rather have my hot temper than any other woman's cold one. He don't enjoy monotony." Mrs. Deacon Wentworth leaned back in the Boston rocker, and fanned herself. She had the air of a comfortable and matronly hen, who is satisfied with her barnyard and sure that the supply of corn is ready for her chicks. It was her habit to boast of her quick temper, yet she was really a placid person seldom ruffled. She would sometimes tell the Deacon how angry she had been at somebody's shortcomings. Now terribly indignant, while as she spoke her voice was as soft as the purling of the brook before the door. The brook went purling along, singing its little song, and Mrs. Deacon went peacefully on her way, too. She liked to fancy herself rather formidable, and Susy Prentiss, who had been at school with her, smiled as she took a seat on the front door-step.

"Never having had a husband, Maria, I've had less to put up with than most," she remarked, "yet I have a stumbling-stone. It is my love of a clean house. I'm trying with all my might to conquer my dislike to dirt and disorder. I'm ashamed of being so old-maidish."

"Why, Susan!" ejaculated Mrs. Deacon, holding up her hands. The good housewives down Dingle way were notable, and they despised dirt, and prided themselves on their neatness. This regretting a virtue as if it were a vice, seemed a sign of falling from grace, and the Deacon's wife wondered what had happened to her old friend. Had she had a sunstroke? Or, was there coming on softening of the brain? Old grandfather Pollock had died of that slow malady, Mrs. Wentworth recollected.

"You see," Susy proceeded very soberly, "there's been nobody to make a litter nor disturb my home, and when I've cleaned a room, I've hated to upset it, so that sometimes I've actually slept on the attic floor, that I might not have to use my own front chamber. The minister's sermon the other day about making idols of our earthly treasures set me to thinking hard. My house, my old mahogany furniture that never had a scratch, my parlor with the long pier glass, my blue china tea-set, they are my stumbling stones. I can't keep the house any way but the way I do, so I've come to a resolution."

"Well?" Mrs. Wentworth waited expectantly.

"I'm goin' over to the Industrial School, to see if I can get a young girl or a child from there to come and live with me, who'll appreciate a good home."

"How old did you calculate to have the orphan?" inquired Mrs. Wentworth politely.

"If I choose a very little one, I can train her up so as she'll do things my own fashion, and I can get her to love me and grow up like a daughter. If I get a girl fourteen or fifteen years old, she'll be more of a help, and I'm not so certain that I wouldn't prefer that."

"I can't say I approve your idea, Susy, but then I can't say as I disapprove," observed Mrs. Wentworth judiciously. "You will find either one you adopt, for I s'pose adoption's in your thoughts, that you're shouldering a big responsibility, and you'll not have your home the spotless place it is now. And John's folks, what will they say? They'll shake their heads."

John was Susy's brother, and his farm joined her little garden. John was a good brother, but close-fisted, and he and his children might easily be annoyed, if Susy should form new ties.

"John and his people have nothing in the world to do with my taking in a poor orphan for the discipline and uplifting of my soul, any more than they would if I had married Abner Hulst when he asked me last year."

"First I ever heard of that," exclaimed Mrs. Wentworth. "Abner wanted you? Surely the good Lord guided you when you refused him, the old curmudgeon. He treated his first wife most meanly. But he didn't grieve over your declining his proposal, did he, for he's married now, safe enough; married to Helen Jenner. She's equal to keeping Abner in order, but you wouldn't have been. At your time o' life, it's not likely you'll change your condition, is it?"

"I cannot be sure," replied Susy Prentiss, who was forty-three and very comely. "If an orphan doesn't help me over my stumbling-stone, I may marry somebody yet!"

Mrs. Deacon Wentworth gasped, then laughed until her shoulders shook. Then she went home to prepare supper for her good man.

Susy Prentiss brought home a golden-haired, blue-eyed scrap of a little girl from the Industrial School, and found herself very busy in making clothes for the child, teaching her the catechism, and generally fussing over her. The house ceased to look spick-and-span. A doll blinked seriously from the corner of the living-room sofa. Little Maud ran about like a flash of light, and only rebelled when Susy, clinging to her traditions,

THE CHILD BESIDE THE POND

If I could swim in the water, Dolly,
As the geese and ducks do, wouldn't I try!
But if you and I should go swimming, Dolly,
I know that mother would certainly cry.
For we'd be drowned, as quick as a wink,
So we'll stand and be safe on the pond's green brink.

daily fitted a tiny thimble on her rosy finger, and insisted on teaching the baby to sew.

"I fink I can't sit still," the child would say, pouting. But Susy was firm.

"I fink I'd be gooder if I had my fwend here, too," solemnly declared Maudie, when one day she had been shut for ten minutes in the closet, for stamping with her foot on the strip of cloth on which she was learning to hem, and losing her thimble under the lilac bush. It took her half an hour to find the thimble; but Susy, gentle as a dove, was determined, nevertheless, and find the thimble in the grass Maudie did, before she was permitted to play again.

"Who is your fwend?" Susie was holding the little maid in her lap, and forgiving her for her naughtiness. A big tear quivered on the golden-brown lashes.

"My fwend is Fanny. She's so good, you'd love her."

"I love you Maud, even when you are bad," said Susy, in whose heart an unsuspected fount of mother-love had suddenly gushed forth with sweet waters.

But she made an errand to the Industrial School before many days, and brought home another orphan girl, little dark-eyed Fanny. Her neighbors were aghast, and John's folks deeply resentful, but Susy kept right on.

She grew younger and prettier as the children, who called her "Auntie," stole farther and farther into her heart. And, as they worked in their little gardens, and after awhile strolled to school with luncheons packed in dinner-pails, she forgot her old desire to have a house like a shrine. The house was still sweet and clean, but it had now become a home, where children romped and played and love reigned supreme.

"A gentleman's at the door, Auntie," said Maudie one afternoon; "he asked for you." Susy stepped into the passage. At the door stood a stranger, tall, bronzed, smiling. He held out his hand.

"Do you know me, Susy?"

"Arthur Ellis! Arthur! Where did you come from, after all these years?"

"From Seattle, Susy. I've come for you to take you back with me. You said 'No,' when we were girl and boy, and I was such a fool I accepted it. But you are not to say 'No' again. This time, it must be 'Yes.' Susy, will you marry me?"

This was poured out in a breathless torrent as they stood by the door. The man's arms went around the woman. He stooped and kissed her lips. She did not withhold them. Tears rushed to her eyes as he still held her closely.

"Oh, Arthur, I did love you," she stammered. "But you would whittle chips in the best room, and I couldn't stand it. And you played tricks on me, and tied my braids to the back of a chair."

"I'm ashamed of myself, Susy, for I'm an untidy chap yet. But I've reformed. I'll do nothing you don't like. Marry me next week, dear, and come away into the big world. Come to Seattle, Susy. You'll feel alive there."

She had drawn him into the sitting-room. The two children were scampering about under the apple-trees. He looked into Susy's eyes with a glance of perfect satisfaction.

"You are prettier than you were twenty years ago, Susy," he said. "Let me kiss you, darling. I've starved for you so long."

Again he embraced her, till, blushing, she drew herself away. What had become of the years? They were gone, and these two were young again.

"What shall I do with the children?" she said musingly, after awhile.

The man looked puzzled.

"What children?"

"My two little daughters; adopted, you know."

"You took them because you were so lonely, dear?"

"I took them, because I found a house with nothing in it but chairs and table could not feed an immortal soul. Arthur are you a Christian man? You know the old trouble between us, because you neglected the church, and were rude to the minister." She spoke wistfully.

"I am not the man I would like to be," said Arthur Ellis; "but in the years I have been working alone, in mines, in forests, have learned to know the Lord, and I am his servant. I'm glad you have the little adopted girls, dear, for I have two little lads, children of my partner, who died, and I'm their guardian. We'll have a house full of bairns, and plenty to do, and, than God! plenty to do it with."

So Susy's stumbling-stone proved a bridge, over which she stepped to happiness and joy. She married her old sweetheart, and went West with him; but she did not at once take the little girls. They were left for a year in the little home, maiden cousin taking charge of it and them. Later, the little girls went West, where the adopted brother awaited them.

"Strange," said Mrs. Deacon Wentworth to her good husband, "are the ways of Providence. Strange and mysterious, indeed. Who'd ever have fancied that Susy Prentiss and Arthur Ellis would have found each other after so many years."

The two were sitting at the breakfast-table as they chatted.

"They missed a good deal of sunshine by not marrying when we did; but it's better to find happiness late than not at all."

"Yes, dear, better late than never," agreed Mrs. Wentworth, handing a cup of coffee across the table.

A Remarkable Bible Reader

THE Pennsylvania Germans are classed as a most wonderful race, being mostly what might be called "born agriculturists." They invariably follow the life of farmers, and in this vocation they have been most successful.

Abigail Knetz, a daughter of the late Mr. and Mrs. George and Eva Moll, was born in the village of Huff's Church, Berks County, Pennsylvania, in 1817, at the time when that village consisted of only five houses.

Mrs. Knetz is the only surviving member of a family of eight children, and the mother of four children. She has also nineteen grandchildren and one great-grandchild. Born of parents who were farmers, she, at the age of sixteen years, left her home to work as a hired girl for other farmers during the summer months. For a few months each winter, she attended a village pay school. The studies were all in the German language, and the "three R's" were the only branches taught; nevertheless, she was a close student and became an excellent German reader.

She married an industrious farmer and they tilled a two-hundred-acre farm, erecting on it a stone dwelling house and other buildings. This property is now owned by one of her daughters. In the immediate vicinity was another large farm which they also bought. Her husband died in 1879, and the widow stayed with a daughter who still resides on this farm. Seven years ago she felt a desire to again live in the place where she was born.

she walks to church to hear the Reformed and Lutheran pastors preach. She has been a life-long member of the Lutheran denomination. She retains all her faculties and is fluent in reminiscences of her early life. The incidents she relates of the members who came great distances—some as far as thirty miles, to attend services, sixty, yes, even seventy-five years ago, on horseback and in large four-horse farm-wagons—are indeed most interesting.

In 1845, Mr. and Mrs. Knetz had bought themselves a German Bible. Two years later, Mrs. Knetz had the misfortune to fall and break an arm. While nursing the fractured limb, she began the perusal of this German Bible, the contents of which became so interesting, that ever since the Bible has been her inseparable companion. She has read it from beginning to end thirty-three times. Early this spring, when reading it for the thirty-fourth time, and just as she had completed the contents of the Old Testament, the Bible slipped from her lap, and as the leaves were loose, the book fell upon the floor in a confused mass and could hardly be rearranged. She procured a new one, and is now finishing the reading of the New Testament for the thirty-fourth time, which task she has nearly completed.

Mrs. Knetz, like most Pennsylvania German women, is still well preserved, and able to do her own housework. Every Sunday

Lawn Home, the subject gained new interest as it fell from Nellie's eager lips.

The child had reserved Miss Whitcomb—the village dressmaker and Nellie's particular admiration—until the last. Miss Whitcomb listened with shining eyes to Nellie's now oft-told story, and when it was finished, she drew a long breath.

"O, Nellie!" she cried, "I wish I could send a hundred dollars!"

"There—I knew you'd feel like that! But you can't, 'course—you ain't rich like some of the rest, Miss Whitcomb; but—well—I wanted ter ask,"—Nellie was blushing painfully—"er—you see, I've got twenty-seven cents, Miss Whitcomb, an' I want it ter go. I could send it alone; but it looks so little, and—I wondered if you wouldn't give 'nough ter make it up ter the three dollars an' send it in all together!"

Miss Whitcomb had already heard much of Nellie's daily trips throughout the town, and the little dressmaker's note to the magazine must have contained some mention of this (besides the three dollars), for a few days later Nellie got a letter bearing a New York postmark.

"My dear child!" it read, "We want to thank you for all you have done for our Mont-Lawn Home, and we want to tell you that because of many 'three dollars' sent from your little town, just twenty-four boys and girls will have ten happy days in the country."

Nellie had a dream that night. She saw a huge green field dotted all over with buttercups and daisies; while rolling and tumbling in the flower-grown grass were hundreds of boys and girls.

Taylor University Commencement

Taylor University at Upland, Ind., has just closed a very successful year. The annual commencement week ended June 8. President Winchester preached the baccalaureate sermon Sunday morning, June 5. Other meetings took place on the preceding Friday and Saturday evenings, respectively. The trustees held a very harmonious and delightful session Monday and Tuesday. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD gold prize contest and the Moony diploma contest were the order for Monday afternoon and evening. Class day exercises came off Tuesday forenoon. Tuesday afternoon and evening were given to the alumni business meeting and banquet, at which the first of $40,000 was pledged toward an alumni endowment fund. A very fine programme was rendered by the school of music Tuesday night. Wednesday afternoon witnessed the graduation of a class of six for the College of Liberal Arts and the awarding of diplomas to sixteen others, representing the other departments. Everything promises a glorious future for Taylor University, under the new president, Dr. Winchester. Unless all signs fail the attendance for the year beginning June 14 will be very large, far larger than in any former year.

The Liberty Bell at St. Louis

ONCE more the historic old Liberty Bell has been upon its travels, ending its latest journey at the St. Louis Fair. There it was greeted with great enthusiasm by the thousands thronging the Exposition.

The Liberty Bell is old and broken, a big wide crack extending nearly its whole length. The voice which told the glad news of freedom so many years ago, is now silent, and the bell is but a battered relic of those stirring times when our forefathers fought so successfully against tyranny. We are living in an age of seeming frivolity, of devotion to the glory of gold, and the glamour of worldly prosperity; but it needs but the sight of some such a reminder of what our beloved country really is, and at what a price liberty was bought, to arouse the sentiment of patriotism, always alive in the American heart, ready to come to the surface in cheers at sight of the flag, the Liberty Bell, or upon any other occasion where the key-note is love of country.

but they cannot forget that it once awoke, with its deep clangor, the spirit of liberty in the breasts of men, and gave the nation an impulse toward that destiny which, under Divine guidance, has made it a beacon-light for freedom among the nations of the world."

Elaborate ceremonies have always attended the ancient bell upon its travels. It has been escorted by guards of honor, and beautifully decorated at different stages of the journey with silken tricolors and flowers.

This precious relic of stirring revolutionary times—when it is not upon one of its triumphal marches across the country—reposes in state in Independence Hall, Philadelphia. Whenever the bell goes, old and cracked as it is, it is greeted with an almost reverential feeling. One writer has said, in describing the bell, "Beside other bells, it may be clumsy and unsightly, its workmanship poor and defective, and its tone cracked and rasping,

FAMINE IN BRAZIL

COMMUNICATIONS from a number of different sources have been forwarded to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD—some of them through readers of this journal—calling attention to the prevalence of famine in a large part of the South American republic of Brazil. Rio Grande do Norte, one of the northern States of the republic, is subject to frequent droughts. The present season has been one of unexampled dryness, and the whole country is parched and vegetation killed. In March, which usually ushers in the rainy season, there was no precipitation and the last hope vanished. Dr. Juvenal Lamarine, Lieutenant-Governor of the province, has made a public appeal in behalf of the suffering population, in which he says:

"It means the certainty of a slow death by thirst and starvation of the population of the interior of our State. . . . Hundreds of thousands of our countrymen are struggling with the greatest of miseries—famine."

In response to a telegram of inquiry, the Brazilian Minister in Washington wired the following message:

"WASHINGTON, D. C., June 30.
"THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, New York City:

"Some of the population of the interior of the State of Rio Grande do Norte afflicted by severe drought, but government has taken measures for relief.

"(Signed) FERREIRA."

Notes of the War

The wet season has set in in Manchuria, and the armies can now only move with great difficulty.

The Czar, on June 29, inspected the Baltic fleet, destined for the Far East, and expressed satisfaction with its general condition.

A Kiel dispatch says Emperor William and King Edward have decided to take the first opportunity for mediation in the war between Russia and Japan.

The Russian submarine boat, Delfin, while being officially tested in the Neva, June 29, suddenly sank at her moorings, taking down with her, Lieut. Cherkasoff and twenty men, who were drowned. The accident was due to overcrowding the boat, and the attempt of one of the crew to escape while the manhole was being closed. The Delfin was raised after the accident. She is Russia's best submarine, and was successfully tried in 1903.

A Rome dispatch states that at a cabinet meeting in Tokio, June 30, "it was decided that, after the fall of Port Arthur and the evacuation of Liao-yang by the Russians, Field Marshal Oyama should address an ultimatum to Gen. Kourapatkin, asking him to surrender, to avoid further and useless bloodshed. A copy of the ultimatum is to be sent to the Powers. Should Gen. Kourapatkin refuse, the Japanese anticipate that they will be able to annihilate his forces.

Russia and the Jews

M. de Plehve, Russia's Minister of the Interior, has proposed an important project for the repeal of the law under which Jews are forbidden to reside within thirty-two miles of the frontier. Some years ago the Jewish Pale was drawn back from the border. The new departure is considered to be one of the important steps in the execution of Emperor Nicholas' ukase, issued in the early part of 1903, promising freedom of conscience to subjects. The Emperor considered the present time auspicious for the inauguration of this reform.

Persecution of the Stundists

By COUNTESS ELISABETH GROEBEN*

OUR German Mission to the East was led some years ago into the large field of the Stundist movement in Russia. Perhaps there is hardly any field in the whole world where the Gospel has made such wonderful progress as in south Russia, where the Stundist movement originated in a great revival which began fifty years ago among the German colonists, and spread noiselessly over the provinces of the Russian Empire; and perhaps there is no other field where the Gospel is so much hindered, as it is hindered here by the systematic persecution organized by the Russian church.

By the providential leading of the Lord we were put in touch some years ago with the centres of this revival through our missionary, Rev. A. Stefanowitsch, who is a Russian by birth, and though trained for the ministerial calling, has served in the Russian and Bulgarian armies, thus coming in touch with the people. Since his conversion he has joined in the Protestant Church, and has children, a girl nine and a boy seven years old, to cross themselves, which was the only way of saying her prayers she knew. The children said their parents had another way of praying, they did not cross themselves, and they would follow the example of their parents. Thereupon they were beaten almost daily by their aunt. One day, coming home intoxicated, she dragged both the children before an image of a saint, and with clinched fists forced them down on their knees, commanding them to make the sign of the cross. On their refusing, she cut off the fore-finger and the middle-finger of the right hands of both children, telling them that as they did not use the fingers to make the sign of the cross as she ordered, they did not need the fingers at all. I have seen both these children in the Caucasus. They had been rescued from their cruel aunt by a kind Stundist friend, who had taken them to their parents.

"Another victim of persecution was Osif Semerenko, a laborer on the estate of Mr. A. Mazow, in the neighborhood of Ploskaya. He heard the Gospel through the man-servant of his master, who sometimes read to him passages from the Bible, and recognizing himself a sinner and in need of salvation, he was converted to the Lord Jesus Christ. His wife also having come to Christ, they began to serve the Lord in spirit and in truth; they could not any more worship images, and the wife took the images down and put them out of the house. Her sister coming to see her, noticed this change, and was much astonished at the explanation she received, and was not slow in spreading the news among her kinsfolk. Very soon Osif's brother Iwan, who had official duties in the district, came to inquire why they had no saints' images in their house. His sister-in-law explained the matter to him, and spoke about the uselessness of image-worship. This made Iwan very angry, and he denounced his brother and his wife to their master, who, not wishing to have Stundists in his employ, put them out of their work and home.

"Osif and his family took refuge in their own house in Ploskaya, but Iwan and a troop of peasants attacked them, and forcing an entrance, fell upon Osif and beat him. When he recovered from a swoon he was covered with blood and quite alone, the cold wind coming in through broken doors and windows. His wife and children had been taken in by his mother-in-law. It was impossible for him to get work, and beside he had to hide from the peasantry, who also wanted to beat him.

"After some time, he was called to appear before the local authorities. There he found, beside his brother, the priest of the district and an orthodox missionary. These two priests admonished him to return to the orthodox faith. 'Why will you not worship the holy images?' asked the priest. 'I might paint them myself,' Osif answered, 'and it would be very stupid of me to pray to my own paintings.' For this answer his brother condemned him to fifteen strokes with a rod, and this punishment was inflicted on the spot. After two weeks he again received fifteen blows, and a month later, having once more to appear before the judges, he was again beaten, and his brother called for paraffin oil to pour over him, so that he might be burned to death. But someone else said: 'The smell of this will be too bad; we can manage differently.' They had tied his hands to a rafter, and while he was hanging there, they struck his back with a red-hot iron and applied their lighted cigarettes to his bare body. Eventually the strings, which fastened his hands to the rafter, were cut through, and he fell down, striking his head severely on the floor. Osif was enabled to escape to Bulgaria, where I met him two months after his cruel treatment, and his wounds were not yet healed. We helped him to go to England.

"Latterly the priests have taken to a new way of persecuting the Stundists. They find out where these brethren meet at night for Bible-reading and prayer, and send some people to join them who, when leaving the house, slyly put fire to it, and the Stundists are accused of burning down their own houses.

"As to myself," says the pastor. "I have had very great difficulties while traveling in Russia to preach the Gospel. Of course I could not travel as a preacher, I had to hide. For instance, I once had to hide under a large heap of soiled linen; and another time, in an enormous basket filled with hay.

"But it is so necessary for true evangelists to go to the Stundists; their leading men have been banished, the mass of the Stundists, numbering about two millions, are like sheep without a shepherd. They have no catechism, no tracts, no commentaries to the Bible; and most of them are not even able to read, so that the Bible is a closed book to them.

"They need evangelists; they need men and women, who living among them, leading their own simple life, can read to them, pray with them and teach them. But these men and women must be instructed, and this cannot be done in Russia; they must come out for some time, say two to four years, then return when they are able to take up the Lord's work."

PASTOR STEFANOWITSCH

When blessed of God in his efforts to spread the knowledge of the Gospel in Russia. Commissioned by us, Mr. Stefanowitsch has visited the Stundist communities in Russia and made acquaintance with a great many of these persecuted Christians. He has given us a clear insight into the terrible straits of these people, who are treated very cruelly under the Russian laws against those who stray away from the orthodox church. They are at the same time in great danger of being led away from the sound teaching of the Gospel by irregular and fanatical sectarians, as the educated leaders of the Stundist communities have been sent into exile by the Russian government. It has been laid on our part to take up the work of bringing effective help to the Stundists for: (1) We have seen how desperate the situation of the Stundists really is; (2) We have seen that no really efficient help has been brought as yet to the Stundists in Russia and out of Russia by any angelical church, and (3) We are convinced that there are ways and means by which the Stundist movement can be upheld and strengthened and kept from many errors. It is our earnest wish to found in Berlin a primary for young Russians from the Stundist circles, in order to prepare them to become leaders of their communities. These young men ought to keep to their secular schooling, but they ought to be well taught in the Bible and in church history, so as to be able to keep the evangelical communities in the sound doctrine of the Gospel.

The history of the Stundists is, on the one hand, a lamentable record of injustice and fanaticism, and on the other of faithful clinging to the Lord Jesus, amid terrible suffering and relentless persecution. The punishments inflicted on the Stundists by the Russian government are persecution, exile, separation of parents from their children, of men from their wives, and enormous fines.

Some facts related by Rev. A. Stefanowitsch, as coming under his own observation, are startling. He says:

"About ten years ago a law was given in Russia, that Stundist children were to be taken from their parents. There was a family in the neighborhood of Charkow, which is punished for adherence to Stundism, by the parents being exiled to the Caucasus, and the children being made over to an aunt, who is a drunkard. This woman ordered the

Had to Switch

Even the most careful person is apt to get on the wrong track regarding food sometimes and has to switch over.

When the right food is selected the host of ails that come from improper food and drink disappear, even where the trouble has been of lifelong standing.

"From a child I was never strong and had a capricious appetite and I was allowed to eat whatever I fancied—rich cake, highly seasoned food, hot biscuit, etc.—so it was not surprising that my digestion was soon out of order and at the age of twenty-three I was on the verge of nervous prostration. I had no appetite and as I had been losing strength (because I didn't get nourishment in my daily food to repair the wear and tear on body and brain) I had no reserve force to fall back on, lost flesh rapidly and no medicine helped me.

"Then it was a wise physician ordered Grape-Nuts and cream and saw to it that I gave this food (new to me) a proper trial and it showed he knew what he was about because I got better by bounds from the very first. That was in the summer and by winter I was in better health than ever before in my life, had gained in flesh and weight and felt like a new person altogether in mind as well as body, all due to nourishing and completely digestible food, Grape-Nuts.

"This happened three years ago and never since then have I had any but perfect health for I stick to my Grape-Nuts food and cream and still think it delicious. I eat it every day. I never tire of this food and can enjoy a saucer of Grape-Nuts and cream when nothing else satisfies my appetite and it's surprising how sustained and strong a small saucerful will make one feel for hours." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

True food that carries one along and "there's a reason." Grape-Nuts 10 days proves big things.

FATAL ALLIANCES

By MRS. M. A. BAXTER

SINCE the time of David, no king had reigned who had so much at heart the cause of God as King Jehoshaphat. His father, Asa, had learned to trust in God, and he had put away idolatry, and brought his people into a covenant that they would serve God. To make a covenant with God, and fail to learn of him in his Word, leads often to disappointment and grievous failure. But Jehoshaphat went farther. He also strengthened himself against Israel, and put away idolatry and sin; but he moreover sent his princes to teach in the cities of Judah, and with them Levites and priests. "And they taught in Judah, and had the Book of the law of the Lord with them, and went about throughout all the cities of Judah and taught the people" (II. Chron. 17:38).

Now, let us note the result of Asa's building fenced cities, and raising an army, and of Jehoshaphat's organizing instruction in the Word of God. Asa had the army of the Ethiopians come against him, but Jehoshaphat was rewarded in that the fear of the Lord fell upon all the kingdoms of the lands that were round about Judah, so that they made no war against Jehoshaphat. Thus, the knowledge of God's Word, and the keeping of his commandments, proved to be a better defence than an army and fortresses.

Having thus joined interest with the living God, he built castles and cities of stone, and he had mighty men of valor. Then came the king's first wrong step. He had riches and honor in abundance, and joined affinity with Ahab. How seldom marriages are undertaken with the one aim that God may be glorified! Probably the unhappy union between Jehoshaphat's son, Jehoram, and Athaliah, the daughter of Ahab, was brought about from political motives, as a preventative against war between Israel and Judah; and the sin of an alliance with a king whose state religion was the worship of the golden calves, does not seem to have struck Jehoshaphat. Was it not to awaken him to this that God allowed him to get entangled with Ahab's war, and very nearly to lose his life?

Having made an alliance with Ahab, it became necessary that Jehoshaphat should visit him. He had put himself into a false position, which entailed unexpected difficulties. Very often the greatest difficulties we meet with are the result of some false step which we have taken without the Lord, and until we become aware of it, and retrace our steps, everything seems to go wrong. Let us never pity ourselves or expect sympathy from others when circumstances seem to be all against us. He who maketh all things work together for good to them that love God has most surely something to say to us; and when we understand it, and get into step with him again we shall find ourselves, with him, above the circumstances which appeared so difficult. Ahab entertained Jehoshaphat royally, but it was to lay him under an obligation, and at last his purpose came to light. "Wilt thou go with me to Ramoth-Gilead?" Wilt thou, Jehoshaphat, servant of the Most High God, be at the disposal of him who is in open enmity to thy God (II. Chron. 18:1-3)?

Jehoshaphat was in a dilemma; either he must break the alliance and, as he may have thought, injure his country, or he must make common cause with the wicked Ahab. Oh, how near-sighted we may be, when we are, in any measure, off the right track! God could surely care for Judah more than Jehoshaphat could, and would not the king's action in putting the claims of Ahab before the claims of God prevent God from continuing his blessing on Judah? Jehoshaphat fell into the snare, and said, "I am as thou art, and my people as thy people, and we will be with thee in the war." But at once his conscience smote him, and he besought Ahab, "Inquire, I pray thee, at the Word of the Lord to-day." And Ahab gathered his false prophets, who all assured the king of Israel that God would deliver Ramoth-Gilead into his hand.

ANSWERED PRAYERS

L. E. W., Martel, O. "I want to publicly acknowledge God's great mercy to me also in answering my prayer. I prayed to him that he would grant that I might hear from a dear boy, and he has wonderfully answered my prayer."

A Reader, Michigan. "I wish to acknowledge in the answered prayer column that I am certain that God answers prayers."

F. D., Canada. "I have had many prayers answered, and I am going to ask the readers to kindly pray for a friend who knows not Christ."

A Reader, Canandaigua, N. Y. "I have recently had prayer answered in a manner not to be mistaken. God came to my help when there seemed no help."

N. B. S., Louisa, Va. "Many times I have asked Him for some special thing and He always hears and answers my prayers. I hope by my acknowledging this that it may help others to pray more faithfully and earnestly to God."

Mrs. A. E. S., Waterbury, Conn. "I want to acknowledge the goodness of God to me in the past in answering prayers and also for present blessings."

E. S. H., White Plains, N. Y. "I wish to acknowledge God's goodness in answering one of my prayers that I have kept before him for several years. I thank him for all his tender care over me from infancy to old age."

Alice G. S., West Stockbridge, Mass. "I wish to thank God for answered prayers."

E. T. C., Phila. "I desire to publicly acknowledge the goodness of God in answering my prayers for the recovery of a sick relative. His promises are ever faithful and true. Praise his holy name."

Mrs. B., Augusta, Me. "I promised the Lord if he would answer my prayer for a very dear one, I would acknowledge it. He has answered that and many others."

A Constant Reader, Pittsburg. "I wish to acknowledge that God has answered my prayers, and I feel that he will always hear if we ask in faith."

M. K., New York City. "Your column of answered prayers has been a source of great comfort to me. Will you kindly ask, through your paper, the prayers of those who have acknowledged answers to their petitions, for a family in great trouble."

E. J. M., Kimball, Minn. "I promised that if my prayer was answered I would publicly acknowledge it. My faith was as a grain of mustard seed. I wish to acknowledge not only answer to this prayer but to others."

O. K. S., Germantown, Pa. "I want to bear my testimony to the fact that prayers are answered. I prayed—really prayed—for the first time in my life four weeks ago. That prayer was answered. Since then I have prayed many times, and I know every time they have been answered. I believe prayer—that is, real prayer—is always answered."

L. D. A., St. Louis, Mo. "God has answered my prayers in time of need and sore distress. He has abundantly blest me both spiritually and temporally."

Mrs. M. S. D., New York. "I want to acknowledge God's goodness to me in answering prayers. Not always has he given everything for which I have asked, nor do I, as a parent, give everything for which my little ones ask, but what I know is best, so I ask that I be given such a child-like trust and thankful heart."

THE LOVE OF GOD

COULD oceans, rivers, springs and lakes, All that the name of water takes, Beneath the expanded skies, Be turned to ink of blackest hue, And every drop of falling dew,

To make the wonder rise; A book so large could we suppose, Which thinnest paper could compose,

As the whole earthly ball; Were every shrub and every tree, And every blade of grass we see,

A pen to write withal; Were all that ever lived on earth, Since nature first received her birth,

* Forwarded by Mr. Caleb Moore, Birmingham, Mich.

Most skilful scribes, to place In clearest light that wondrous love Found in the heart of God above, Towards Adam's ruined race; Were each Methuselah in age, And every moment write a page, They'd all be tired and die; The pens would every one wear out, The book be filled within—without,

The ink be drained all dry, And then to show that love, oh, then, Angels above as well as men,

Archangels e'en would fail; Nay—till eternity should end, A whole eternity they'd spend,

And not have told the tale.

THE SPIRIT OF CASTE*

STRANGE how alike the ages are! That passage from the Epistle of James, which is associated with the topic, is an exact picture of the conditions prevailing at this day in any of our churches. Only last week, a man who had once been wealthy, but is now working as a car-conductor in New York, was urged to go to church. His answer was: "No, neither my wife nor I could go. We have not clothes that are decent."

We tried it one Sunday, and the churchers sent us to a back seat in the gallery, and, even there, the people in the front drew away from us, as they looked at our shabby clothes. I have seen the time when going into a church, I would be taken to a good pew, and would be welcome there, but not now. The missions are the places for us, and I do not care for them. There are many churches in which dress does not count, but the man who evidently been to one in which it did. There ought to be no such church in existence, for the spirit of Christ was fundamentally opposed to any such distinctions. A prominent preacher uses a very striking illustration of the principle. He says at Christ's dividing line is vertical, not horizontal. The world divides society into the upper and lower classes, but Christ divides it according to character. On the one side the line, as on the other, the rich and poor, cultured and uneducated. These distinctions do not separate men in his sight. The difference that separates, is whether men have been changed by his grace. The man who is living in sin and loving it; the man who is living for himself and caring nothing for any one else; the man who has no love for God and righteousness, is on one side the line, whether he be poor or rich, of high or low birth. Character is the only distinction he recognizes, and even to those who are on the wrong side the line, he offers the grace which would bring them on to the other side. Christ's conception of his Church was of a brotherhood, and he emphasized it by instituting the Supper, in which, by partaking together of a common meal, his people could show their equality.

It has surprised foreigners coming among us, to find how potent are the class distinctions, which are familiar to them in the Old World, but which they expected not to find here. We have the aristocracy of wealth, the most vulgar of all kinds of caste. It is illogical, too, for a child can see that the man who has gained a million, is no more of a gentleman than the man who has lost a dollar. The aristocracy of birth has no better foundation, for the sons of noble and ancient families often bring disgrace on the honored names. The aristocracy of culture, has more reason in it, for between men of the same order, conversation and community of thought and feeling are possible, as they are not between the refined and the boor. But even in this, the distinction is often mere veneer, and the man without it, may be heroic, generous, self-sacrificing and true, while the refined man, may be at heart a scamp. It is a burlesque of our institutions, that society in the present day in America should be so sensitive as it is on mere externals.

In no place on earth, is caste so abhorrent as in the Christian Church. It shows that men do not know Christ, or know themselves. If they knew Christ, they would be so impressed with the immense distance between him and themselves, that the difference between man and man would fade into nothingness. Neither do they know themselves, otherwise they would be aware that they have in their souls capacities for evil, which, if they had not had the advantages of environment and training that they have had, would have developed the character that they now scorn. To the boy of six, his brother of twelve seems a prodigy of strength and learning; but set the boy of twelve among grown men, and he is a child. So, the Christian who spends much time in communion with God, comes into association with other Christians, impressed with his own unworthiness, humble and conscious, not of his merits, but of his defects. He learns to be tolerant and charitable with the faults of his brethren, and eager in his own humility to help them as he has been helped. "All ye are brethren."

TUNING A PHYSICIAN

He Got Out, and Then in Tune

If coffee has you where your nerves demands it each morning you have a wreck ahead sure.

Think back for a year and notice how the sick spells grow on you instead of getting less.

You are running into nervous prostration or some fixed disease absolutely certain, and when it suddenly takes full possession you will find nothing, absolutely nothing, in drugs that will heal you. Nature demands penalty for the daily hurt to the nerve centres by coffee, and you must pay the full price.

A physician of Cornwall, Ont., says of himself, "For years coffee was to me what rum is to the toper but I kept getting worse and worse in health."

"I suffered from continuous nervous twitching, insomnia, restless, miserable nights, nerves all gone. Craving for coffee was intense but it put me lower and lower in health. Something must be done, so I tried leaving off the coffee and using Postum Food Coffee. The first trial wife and I were both disgusted for we were careless in brewing it, but we went carefully into the subject of preparing Postum and found we had only allowed it to brew about five minutes, and that won't make good Postum. So next time it was boiled full fifteen minutes after boiling began, then served with good cream and it was toothsome and delicious. That marked the beginning of my return to health. Now I sleep well, the old twitching has disappeared, and in short I am well again. My good wife has also been much benefited by leaving off coffee and using Postum Food Coffee. We have abandoned the old coffee for all time." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

There's a reason why so many intelligent people and physicians drink Postum in place of ordinary coffee.

The Nominating Conventions

The Democratic Candidates

ALTON B. PARKER

HENRY C. DAVIS

For President (Democratic)

HEARTY congratulations are pouring in on the Democratic Party, even from Republican quarters, on the choice which its National Convention has made of a standard-bearer for the Presidential campaign. Seldom in our history has a nomination for that high office been made, that has commanded such unalloyed and unstinted approval from political opponents.

Alton Brooks Parker at present holds the office of Chief Judge of the Court of Appeals of New York, to which he was elected in 1897. He is in his fifty-fourth year and has been prominent in political life for upwards of a quarter of a century. He was born at Cortland, N. Y., on a farm owned by his father, who had also been born there. His great-grandfather had been a Massachusetts man and had fought under Washington in the War of the Revolution. The patriot's son settled on the Cortland farm in 1803 and it is still in the possession of his descendant. The boy's ambition was to enter Cornell for a college education, but the family finances were not equal to that strain, and he contentedly worked on the farm in the summer and went to the district school in the winter. At the age of thirteen he entered Cortland Academy for a three years' term. He had already determined on being a lawyer.

To get the money necessary for a legal education, he decided to teach school if he could get an appointment. Without saying anything to his family, he hired a horse and buggy at the close of his term at the academy and drove to Virgil, where he had heard a teacher was wanted. He secured the place and drove home in triumph. The young man loyally served his term at Virgil and then obtained an appointment at Binghamton, after which he went to Rochester, where, although he was only twenty years old, he was made Principal of the public school. He was able during his term to save enough money to cover a two years' course in the Albany Law School, from which he graduated in 1872.

Young Parker's stay at Rochester led to the romance of his life. He met there the young lady who afterward became his wife. She was Miss Mary Lee Schoonmaker, the daughter of parents of Dutch extraction, having influential connections in the neighborhood. One of the members of the family was a lawyer at Kingston, and with him and his partner Mr. Hardenberg, Mr. Parker took service as a clerk, until he was called to the bar. Through Mr. Schoonmaker, he became connected with politics. Mr. Schoonmaker had failed to secure re-election as County Judge, and Mr. Parker took up his cause with energy, and succeeded in having him elected State Senator. The ability and skill he displayed in that campaign attracted the attention of the leaders of the Democratic Party, who nominated him for Surrogate. He was elected, and at the end of his term was re-elected in spite of a vigorous opposition. His success in every contest he had entered, deeply impressed the chiefs of his party, and when Mr. Hill was nominated for the Governorship, he urged Mr. Parker to manage his campaign. Again he won the fight, Mr. Hill being elected by a plurality of 11,000.

Mr. Hill soon had an opportunity of showing his gratitude. In 1885 Judge Westbrook, of the Supreme Court of New York, died, and Mr. Hill appointed Mr. Parker to fill out his term. So ably did he conduct the business of the Court, that he was nominated for the full term of fourteen years, and the Republican party put no one in nomination against him. In 1889, however, the Second Division of the Court of Appeals was created, and Mr. Parker was transferred to it. This Division was dissolved in 1892, and then he was appointed to the General Term of the Supreme Court, the appointment being made at the express solicitation of the other judges. In November, 1897, he was elected Chief Judge of the Court of Appeals by a plurality of more than 60,000.

In person, Judge Parker is tall and vigorous. His manner in court is dignified, but urbane, and he is noted for his kindly treatment of young lawyers who are beginning practice. His only son, a boy of seven, died some time ago. His daughter is married to Rev. Charles Mercer Hall, rector of Kingston, whose children are the favorite guests at Judge Parker's beautiful home of Rosemount at Esopus, on the banks of the Hudson.

For Vice-President (Democratic)

LIKE Judge Parker, Ex-Senator Davis of West Virginia, who was nominated for the Vice-Presidency by the Democratic Convention, began life on a farm. He is a native of Maryland, and is in his eighty-first year. He lost his father in early life, and went to work on a plantation to help support his mother. On the completion of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, he entered its service as a brakeman, and was successively promoted to be conductor and station agent. After fourteen years in railroad work, he joined two of his brothers in opening a general store at Piedmont, and secured an interest in a coal mine. This was in 1858. His prosperity from that time was phenomenal. His savings were judiciously invested in land in West Virginia, and he soon became deeply interested in the development of that State.

Mr. Davis' political career began in 1865, when he was elected to the House of Delegates of West Virginia, and he afterwards served two terms as State Senator. In 1871 he was elected to the United States Senate. He was re-elected at the end of his term, and might have had another re-election, but declined. During his service in the Senate, he was a persistent advocate of the remonetization of silver, and contended that it was the best remedy for financial stringency. Mr. Davis has several times been urged to accept a nomination for the Governorship of West Virginia, but has always refused. He was a member of the Intercontinental Railway Commission, and was chairman of the American Delegation to the Pan-American Congress. He is the president of several railroad companies, and other commercial enterprises.

The Prohibition Candidates

Mr. Davis' wife, whom he married in 1853, was Miss Kate O. Bantz, of Frederick, Md. They had five children, one of whom was accidentally drowned a few years ago. One of his daughters is the wife of Senator Stephen B. Elkins.

For President (Prohibition)

AT the Prohibition National Convention, held in Indianapolis in the closing days of June, Dr. Silas C. Swallow, of Pennsylvania, was nominated for President, and George W. Carroll, of Texas, for Vice-President. Both nominations were made unanimous.

Dr. Swallow has for many years been prominently identified with Prohibition, and it is said of him by those who know him best, that "no more loyal Prohibitionist lives." He is known as a man of rugged honesty and stanch principle. He was born at Plains, Pa., in 1839, his parents being George and Sarah Swallow. He received his education at the Wyoming Seminary, Kingston, Pa., and Taylor University, Fort Wayne, Ind. From the latter he has received the degree of D.D. He was united in marriage to Miss Louisa Robbins in 1866. All his life Dr. Swallow has been an active Methodist, and he is at the present time editor of the Pennsylvania Methodist and superintendent of the Methodist Book Rooms. Dr. Swallow has long been known in politics as the "Fighting Parson." He was fearless in his attacks on political corruption in Pennsylvania. In 1897 he made a bold charge, and the retaliation was an attempt to defame Dr. Swallow's reputation. It was a charge that worked like a boomerang against his accusers, and resulted in a triumph for Dr. Swallow. For this expose he was sued, tried and triumphantly acquitted. In 1897 he was nominated for State treasurer on the Prohibition ticket, and received 118,000 votes, and the next year being nominated on the same ticket for Governor, he received 132,000 votes. He was again a candidate for Governor in 1902. He resides in Harrisburg, Pa. Dr. Swallow's career has been marked throughout by willing service and sacrifice for the cause of Prohibition—a sacrifice "not of the kind that kills but the kind that sanctifies." He is a man still in the prime of life, active and vigorous, and one whom Prohibitionists will support with enthusiasm and a clear conscience.

For Vice-President (Prohibition)

GEORGE W. CARROLL, of Beaumont, Tex., Dr. Swallow's "running mate," is also an ardent Prohibitionist, and a Christian gentleman of marked ability, and with an admirable record of public service in the cause. He is a prosperous business man of the "New South," an alderman of his home city, and was acting-mayor when he was informed of his nomination. He has made a name for himself as a law enforcer, and one who makes no compromise with the iniquitous liquor traffic.

In 1902, he became prominent in the Prohibition Party as the nominee for governor in Texas. Although the son of a rich man, he had to make his own way in the world, for as soon as he had become of age, his father gave him an eighty-dollar clerkship in the Beaumont Lumber Company and left him to work out plans for getting more. On this modest income Carroll married and set up a home. Some time later, he pledged $500 for a new Baptist church in his home town. There was one particular lot desired for the church, which could not be secured unless the whole block was purchased, so Carroll purchased the whole block—on credit—and donated the lot to the church. He sold the rest for enough to pay his $500 pledge, to pay for the lot and to buy 2,000 acres of land which turned out to be valuable, rendering him a prosperous and wealthy man. To-day, Mr. Carroll is a Christian gentleman of forty-eight winters, whose judgment is widely respected by business men in Texas. Recently he gave a $75,000 Science Hall to Baylor University, and he has made many other large gifts besides.

The Prohibition platform declares that the destruction of the infamous liquor traffic is the paramount question in American politics; that the two great parties have refused to recognize this, and permitted the traffic to dominate national, state, and local government; that all existing methods of dealing with the traffic have proved abortive, and that prohibitory legislation and the election of a Prohibition Administration alone will meet the emergency. It demands the impartial enforcement of all laws; the application of just principles to combinations and organizations of labor and capital; the adaptation of the initiative and referendum; international arbitration; reform in divorce laws; the extirpation of polygamy; the reformation of the "social evil" in our cities; the establishment of a mental and moral qualification for suffrage; an omnipartisan tariff commission; election of United States Senators by the people and an honest, reformed civil service.

THE HILL PAGODA

THE GREAT TEMPLE OF CONFUCIUS, AT WUHU

THE "PAGODA OF 10,000 YEARS"

A Day Among Buddhist Temples

By REV. Z. CHARLES BEALS, China

MUCH has been written about Chinese temples and pagodas but thus far I have read nothing about the picturesque ones we have here in Wuhu. One of our famous old pagodas is noted not for its beauty but for its age. If you were to ask any of the natives its age, he would say, "ten thousand years" or more; but the fact is it is only a little over nine hundred years old. It is surrounded by old Chinese houses and huts, and is near the mouth of the small river which empties into the Yangtze, at Wuhu. The pagoda is in a dilapidated condition. Trees are growing out through the roof from seeds dropped there by birds. The inside is filled with birds' nests and with rats, and is altogether a dirty place.

Then there are the Hill Pagoda and Temple, about a mile out of the city. This pagoda has charge of the jung shui (necromancy), meaning that it has in its keeping the peace and prosperity of the city. It has a fine appearance, and the temples at the base are kept in good order. At the Hill Pagoda there are monks on tiers of idolatrous temples, some of them very beautiful. The idols here are large and expensive. One temple was thoroughly furnished, idols and all, by Li Hung Chang, just before he died. A large number of Buddhist priests look after the temples and perform the duties connected therewith.

Not far from these temples, at the foot of the same hill, is situated the Buddhist Temple for Nuns. It is fitted up very attractively, and has a rather imposing appearance. There are about a dozen nuns living here. The one shown in the photograph, sitting on a small table, is the Mother Superior. These nuns, as well as the priests, are of a low order, and their virtues are rarely spoken of. Expressions of contempt and reviling can be heard on every side.

The Confucian Temple in Wuhu, has a very beautiful gateway, but the temple itself in the rear, is plain and somewhat dirty within. Teachers are supposed to come here and worship the tablets erected to Confucius.

The place has a musty smell, and visitors do not care to tarry long.

From here, it is but a short distance to the city Temple. This is a Buddhist Temple, and here one may get an idea of the Buddhists' hell. Commencing at the right, one notes the Buddhist conception of judgment and the punishment of lighter crimes; but further on are devils of all descriptions, tormenting women. By the way, apparently all are women who go there, according to the Buddhist theology.

The devil is represented in mud images with ugly faces, which make one shudder to look at. In delineating these hideous forms, the intention has been to frighten the worshipers so that they will do as the priests direct them, and thus appease the wrath of the idol.

From the city Temple we cross over the river and visit the temple just opposite Wuhu. It is well laid out, and on a hot summer day there always seems to be cool shade and a refreshing breeze. It is most picturesque, and is visited by more foreigners than any other place.

We go these rounds at times, to preach and talk to the priests and others, who gather to drink tea, for every temple has a place where one can order tea and also sweetmeats.

Many times, in speaking to the priests, I have told them their idols were false and could not help them, and in every case they have assented: "Yes, that is so." "Why, then, do you continue to use them?" I ask. They always say—"This is our living."

Although these temples are quaint and picturesque, yet we long to see the time when they shall be turned into school-buildings or preaching halls, where the people can hear the true Gospel.

I am truly thankful to say that I have had two temples given to me for this purpose already. The Gospel of Jesus Christ is spreading in China. I trust the many readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will do all they can to spread the Truth, and help "speak a word to bring back our King."

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD house-boat has been kept going on the river, and is a great blessing. Like everything else it costs to run it, and I trust your readers may help us to keep it going. I had the blessed privilege of baptizing nine young men on the last trip, just two weeks ago. I have ten or more to baptize at Chao Hsein next week, when I go again up there in the house-boat. I praise God for what he is doing up that river. In another town where we have begun work, we have many inquiries.

We have the war up north, but it does not affect us in the least, and if it were not for the papers, we would not know there was a war going on at all.

God bless you and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers. Pray for us and the work under our care.

MAN'S GREATER WORKS

TEXT — JOHN 14: 12:
"Greater works than these shall he do"

MAN increases not his Gospel faith by lowering the standards of the Cross. You might as well expect water to run up hill of its own accord, or violets to grow during midwinter in a snowbank, or daylight to follow after the sinking of the sun in the West, or the flush of health to be seen on the pale cheek of a corpse, or a humming bird to voluntarily make her nest in the dark labyrinths like a ground-mole, as for a radiant faith capable of transforming character, to exist in any temple, unless the chief corner-stone of that temple is Jesus Christ. "And I, if I be lifted up from earth, will draw all men unto me," said Jesus Christ, just a short time before his crucifixion. "I am the way, the truth, and the life. No man cometh unto the Father but by me," speaks our resurrected Redeemer to the Gospel workers of the present day.

Let it be clearly understood at the outset, that by no word or thought would I seek to depreciate the power and influence of Christ's personality and work. He it is who fills all created things, he it is who gives life, natural, mental, social. He is the inspirer, the spring from which come all our triumphs. But I want to show you that the promise which he gave to his disciples, "Greater works than these shall he do," has been fulfilled and that man, inspired with his spirit, has with the natural forces at his disposal, done more for uplifting humanity, as Christ said he should, than did Christ himself. Man has taken hold of the power which Christ bestowed and has applied it, beyond the opportunities which Christ had, to complete the work that he initiated. Christ fed the multitudes. Christ opened the blinded eyes and straightened the crooked limbs. Christ assuaged pain and stopped the chronic issue of blood. Christ was a great preacher and drew the multitudes about him. Christ fought against the heathenish doctrine that "might is right." Christ was the greatest of all workers of wonders that the world had ever seen. There was only one Christ. There will never be another. Yet there are senses, natural as well as spiritual, in which his promise has been kept to his followers, and they have been enabled, through the power emanating from him, to do works which surpass those he did in his life on earth. But let it never be forgotten that these "greater works" which man has done, have been accomplished only because Jesus has lived and Jesus' prophetic words have been fulfilled. In order to get a better grasp of this theme, let me read to you the full verse in which the words of my text are found. "Verily, verily, I say unto you, he that believeth on me, the works that I do shall he do also; and greater works than these shall he do, because I go unto my Father."

Christ's Miracles

Jesus Christ was the amazement of amazements to the people of his day and generation, as a worker of natural phenomena. He seemed to his time superior to all natural laws. When he went out to visit his disciples in their ship, he did not have to use the land as other people had to do. He stepped upon the crystal pavement of lake Galilee, as easily as an Alpine climber might rest his foot upon solid rock; as easily as a hind's feet might glue themselves to mountain crag. When he spoke, the homage of obedience was rendered to him, not alone by men in the synagogue, by beasts of the field and the fowls of the air, but by the winds and the waves. He called to the Galilean tempest, "Peace be still." At the glance of his eye, the "conscious water blushed to see the face of its Lord" at the wedding in Cana, of Galilee. At a word from his lip, the fig-tree dried up and withered away. All he had to say was, "Let no fruit grow on thee henceforward forever." At his call, came whole schools of fish to be caught by the Galilean fishermen. By his touch, whole ovens-full of bread seemed to be miraculously created. After the sermon upon the mount, he fed the multitudes by simply breaking five loaves of bread into pieces. He kept on breaking those pieces again in twain, until at last all were fed with bread as much as they cared to eat. Christ was a wonder worker in natural phenomena. He could tell Peter just where to go and catch a fish which had in its mouth the "piece of money" by which the disciples should pay the just taxes to the Roman Government. In the hour of his suffering and death, the earth trembled and the sun was shrouded in darkness. In him was the power which the Psalmist ascribed to the Most High, "He looketh upon the earth and it trembles; he toucheth the hills and they smoke."

Wonderful were those triumphs over natural laws and forces; but what triumphs has man achieved since that time by compelling those natural laws and forces to serve his purposes, and by harnessing them as his servants! What wonder can be greater than for man to speak in a telephone-receiver, as I have done, in Chicago, and have my voice heard in New York City, one thousand miles away. I do not consider it any more of a wonder, than for Theodore Roosevelt to start the great ponderous machinery in the World's Fair at St. Louis, by touching a simple button. Christ walking upon the waves of Lake Galilee excited the wonder of the spectators, but how could they have seen that marvelous submarine boat constructed by an American inventor, which he supplied with such wonderful mechanism that it can sink to the bottom of the sea, and support life there for twenty-four hours; or, if they could have known how a spark, as a mermaid, could carry man's message, by running along the pathway of a Pacific cable from Vancouver to Australia; or, how a great iron hull could be made to battle against storm and tide and carry thousands of human beings, besides tons upon tons of freight, from New York to Liverpool. Christ feeding the multitudes, with the five loaves and two fishes, to me is wonderful; but man, making the dry desert blossom as a rose, by the stored-up waters of irrigation; man making rain descend in regions, where, for centuries, nature as a forbidding angel of the Edenic Paradise, has said: "Thou shalt not"; man making the fruits of the Asiatic climes to mate with the fruits of the California hills; man making street cars to run without horses, and steam engines to shriek through a Gothard Pass and disappear into a Housatonic Tunnel; man making his air ships lighter than the atmosphere we breathe; all these are triumphs over natural forces so wonderful, that I say, as I compare them with the phenomena of Christ's life, how truly has the promise been kept, "Greater works than these shall he do."

When I see an Edison making an electric light blaze and burn upon the tip-end of a dirty piece of carbon; when I see the marvels of machinery, born with everything but a soul; when I see ice frozen in the tropics, and when I know that nations, separated by broad seas, are brought into speaking distance by wireless telegraphy, I know that one of the fulfillments of my text has come: "Anything which excites wonder, surprise or astonishment, in the broad sense is a miracle," wrote the lexicographer. Surely Christ was alluding to man's triumphs in the world of natural phenomena, when he said: "The works that I do, shall he do also; and greater works than these shall he do; because I go unto my Father."

Triumphs Over Disease

Not only did Christ astonish the people in his day, by his power over the forces of nature; he revealed his divine nature by showing his power over physical diseases. He tried to convince the people in his day of his power as a healer of spiritual maladies, by proving himself the cleanser of leper spots, the opener of blinded eyes, and, the only one of his time, who could send the sluggish blood of health coursing through the withered limbs of him sick with the palsy. Yet, to-day, as I study Christ, the Healer of the sick, I see that the work he did has been taken up by his followers, and its triumphs multiplied. By the word of his power he gave sight to a few blind men; but in our day, the Christian surgeons by their operations are giving sight to thousands. The virtue from his garment stopped one issue of blood; but in our day, the Christian physician, with his medicaments, is stopping thousands of issues. Christ's touch relieved a few sufferers of pain; but in the hospitals of our time, thousands pass painlessly through suffering which, in former times, would have racked them with excruciating torture.

If you would learn some of the marvels of man as a healer, read Professor White's marvelous collection of facts, in his book, entitled, The Wonders of Modern Surgery. Up to 1870, eighty per cent. of all those who had fractured leg or arm, with the bone protruding through the skin, died. Now, through the discoveries resultant from the life's work of Sir Joseph Lister, practically all those with fractured limb-bones get well. Once when a gangrened leg had to be amputated, a shrieking, yelling patient, was held down by main strength, and the leg cut off as quickly as possible, as a butcher with his axe would chop meat. Then the bleeding stump was seared with boiling pitch. Seventy-five per cent. of those patients died. Now such operations are considered practically harmless. A whiff of ether, a breath of chloroform, a deep sleep, a painless operation, and the heavy eyelids open. All the horrors that operation are a blank. Our uncles, our aunts, our parents, our grandparents, died by the hundreds of inflammation of the bowels. Along comes surgery, and says: "Down on the table; quick! Out with that appendix." And, to-day, clubs could be formed by the hundreds of those who would have died of appendicitis, unless death had been driven back at the point of the surgeon's knife.

But to-day, are the "Wonders of Modern Surgery" any more marvelous than the "Wonders of Modern Medicine?" Is the power of modern medicine to cure disease any more marvelous to-day, than the power of modern bacteriological investigations to prevent disease? You see Christ stopping here and there to open a blinded eye, or to unstop a deaf ear, or to loosen the heavy and labored breathing of the asthmatic sufferer. But to-day include more than here and there a cure. I see the lights in thousands of hospital windows gleaming like the stars in the heavens. I see the white-robed nurses and the doctors coming forth as did the angels of health, who troubled the waters at the Pool of Bethesda, crying to the sick everywhere: "Come and be cured of your ailments!" I see thousands and tens of thousands of strong men and women, who would have died twenty years younger than they are now, had they lived and been sick in the days when Christ lived, as he had seen them not or touched them not. Christ, the physician of the body was a wonder-worker. To man to-day, as a curer of physical ailments, is accomplishing far more than Christ ever did. Man is not only opening the eyes of those born blind, but he is making by the thousands and the tens of thousands the deaf and the dumb speak, until this ancient miracle has ceased to be a wonder, because of its commonness.

Now, study Christ from another stand-point. What did Jesus come down upon earth to do? He came to save the world? Oh yes: He came to save the world by drawing men unto himself and banding them together as Christians. That means, men were to become followers of himself. Yet, after he came to earth as a man born in the manger and lived in Nazareth, he literally became the "despised and the rejected of men." After he had lived and suffered, preached and worked on and on until the day when he was crucified, the converts he had won were only a little handful of followers at the foot of his cross. If I should take you to a country pastor and say: "Rev. Mr. So and So, how large is your church?" He would say: "Oh, very small. I have only six score members all told. But we are part of the great Presbyterian Church, with its hundreds of thousands and millions of members. Therefore, we are proud to belong to the great body of this church militant." But Jesus, when he died did not have a great church. He was only the humble Nazarene with one hundred and twenty disciples all told, in Jerusalem. From a worldly stand-point, Christ's life seemed to be an abject failure. Do you wonder that Christ said to his disciples in the words of my text, "He that believeth on me, the works that I do shall he do also; and greater works than these shall he do." How has that promise been fulfilled in the great preachers and organizers of the Christian Church? Inspired by his life and teaching, men have arisen, whose achievements, as they can be measured by numbers, have surpassed a thousand-fold those of their Divine Master.

Christian Organization

Compare if you will the rapid advancement of Christianity during the century just past with the seeming paltry number of one hundred and twenty whom Christ gathered about him in Jerusalem during his earthly ministry. In 1844, George Williams, of London, organized the first Y. M. C. A. Association of the world. For six years later, as a direct outgrowth of his work, there were 6,625 different Y. M. C. A. Association Societies with their enrollments of 650,000 members, with property worth over $26,000,000. In 1865, William Booth, an humble Methodist minister, stepped out of the church of his birth, and in Nottingham, England, organized the "Christian Mission," the outgrowth of which is the Modern Salvation Army. In thirty-five years that army, as a direct result of William Booth's work, had eleven thousand officers stationed in all parts of the world, holding annually over 2,000,000 meetings, a possessing their own printing presses, scattering for 43,000,000 pamphlets and papers of Gospel news, with an income of nearly $4,000,000 per year. In 1878 Francis E. Clark, a comparatively unknown minister organized his young people into a band of Christian workers, called the "Christian Endeavor Society." He is called "Father" Clark now; not, however, because he is an old man, but because he was the father of a movement which, in twenty years, had a Society with nearly 4,000,000 members. Consider the work of John Wesley. Compare the first band of one hundred and twenty members with the conversions under the power of the Holy Ghost of Whitefield, Finney, Moody. These men led the people by the tens of thousands to kneel at the foot of the Cross. Tell me, in reference to the criterion of number, has not man as a preacher and an organizer, done "greater things" than did Christ?

But, again, in this world-wide sweep of man's "greater works," we must see how man is everywhere overturning the heathen doctrine that "might makes right" rather than "right makes might." We must see man as the defender of the weak man, the hope of the helpless man, the friend of the bereft man, and in one sense the rescuer of the lost. Christ comes as the friend of the friendless. But, oh, how friendless and helpless he himself became. James Morrison, in a wonderful review of the works of Christ's life, pictures him as a mighty conqueror. Said this mighty pulpiteer, "He strode on to victory. From his elevated standpoint he saw as the consequence of his triumphal march to his Father, the overthrow of Phariseism and adduceism. He looked farther, and saw the overthrow of Roman and Grecian and Scythian idolatry. He looked farther, and saw the destruction of slavery. He looked farther, and saw the establishment, on the one hand, of home missions extending to the hundreds of thousands who have lapsed, and the establishment on the other hand of foreign missions, sending the Gospel of His grace to the ends of the earth in hundreds of tongues." But though Christ in his exaltation and prophetic vision may have seen all this, yet like Moses, with his eyes overlooking the verdant fields of the Promised Land, Christ was to have no direct physical contact in the consummation of the world's salvation. All India was yet to give up its widow-burning, and the tossing of its helpless girl infants into the Ganges to be eaten by crocodiles, and the heathen worship of idols, but Christ was not, in body, able as a man to set foot on the soil of India. William Carey and Alexander Duff and Bishop Thoburn were to do that. Africa, with its murder and rapine and cannibalistic orgies, was to build its altars to the worship of the "True God;" but Christ, as a physical man, was never to penetrate to those dark missionary fields. A Livingstone, a Taylor and a Hartzell were to do that. Europe at that time shaking under the tread of the Roman legions; North and South America utterly unknown to civilization; the islands of the sea, most of them unvisited—all are yet to bow to Christ and come under the reign of love and gentleness and purity and truth. These are to be won through the instrumentality of men. Men energized by the Holy Spirit are to gain the whole world for him. Truly as we look at such a conquest and compare it with the work that he accomplished in Palestine, we see what he meant when he said, "Greater things than these shall ye do." Christ saw all this future conquest of the world, but as a man he never went away from the Palestine Hills. He grew up in Nazareth. He journeyed from Nazareth a few times to Jerusalem. There at the Davidic capital he was at last led as a guilty criminal out to the Calvary heights to ignominiously die. To his followers he left the stupendous task of evangelizing the world, promising that he would be with them to the end, and that through his power they should be able to win more souls than he had done.

But, though we have been praising man's "greater works" we would have you bear well in mind this one tremendous fact. No work of man is truly greater than Christ's work, because all of man's greater works are the outcome of Jesus' work. If you read the verse in which my text is found, you will find the whole trend of the thought in the one word—"because." "He shall do greater works than these, 'because' I go to my Father." Because Christ is in God and God is in us, is the reason man is able to accomplish greater works than did Christ.

Never be deluded by the idea that man, in his own strength, is able to do anything apart from God. This idea seems to be running riot among many weak brains. A short time ago, I stood upon one of the Pasadena hills and looked off upon the mighty peak of Mount Lowe, lifting itself above the clouds. There in the valley at my feet were the California orange groves, and the flower gardens and the trees, which have made this land famous all around the world. "Do you see that little hill yonder?" said a gentleman by my side. "Yes," I answered. "That hill," said he, "looks much lower than we are." "It certainly does," I replied. "That hill must be at least three hundred feet below us." "But it is not," he answered. "That hill seems lower because yonder lofty mountain is back of it. Water from that hill flows down to this hill. That hill yonder is much higher than we are." So some people, standing upon man's "greater works," seem to think man's throne is higher than Christ's throne. But it is not. Only as Christ's life in its influence touches our lives, are we able to do the "greater works" which are given man to do.

"Oh, no," says some one, "that cannot be. Some of the greatest inventors, some of the greatest statesmen, some of the greatest of American men have been agnostics, and did not believe in Christ at all. How then could they get their power from God?" By the law of association. The influence of Christianity is an elevating, civilizing, inspiring power. Even those who are personally strangers to it are affected by the atmosphere it produces. Have you not noticed that nearly all inventions, nearly all true progress, nearly all the world's best blessings are found in Christian lands? Methinks God blesses the just and often the unjust in a Christian land, because Christ's work and sacrifice have been blessed in that land. Therefore, my brethren, the only way for man to achieve his greater works, is by spreading abroad, as far as he can, the works of Jesus Christ, upon which all men's greater works are dependent. When Christ goes up, man goes up. When Christ goes down, man goes down.

Oh, what could Moses' rod have done,
Had he not been directly sent,
The power was from God alone,
And Moses but the instrument.

To-day, will you not feel that you can only accomplish the greater work Christ has given to you to do, by living and working in Christ? When Marshal Bernadotte, who afterwards became King Charles the XIV. of Sweden, was a young man, he was a revolutionist. At the beheading of King Louis the XVI. of France, in order to show his hysterical joy, he had tattooed upon his arm this sentence: "Death to all kings and royal tyrants." Bernadotte, afterwards was himself raised to a throne. He closely guarded that tattooing from the eyes of his people until he was dead. Oh, my friend, marked with the signs of infamy upon your heart, marked with the signs of rebellion against Christ, will you not change your belief, as Bernadotte did, to become an enthroned king? You bear on your soul the marks of sin, but if you will come to him, he will take you into his employ and will send you forth to bless and help the world. As the apostle bore on his body the marks of the Lord Jesus, so you may wear the badge of his service, and in his name and by his power carry on the work that he began. To you, too, the promise is given: "He that believeth on me, the works that I do shall he do also; and greater works than these shall he do; because I go unto my Father."

DEATH OF THE LEADER OF THE ZIONISTS

ISRAEL throughout the world is mourning to-day the loss of the leader who, more than any other since the dispersion, inspired the chosen people with hope of restoration to the Promised Land. Theodor Herzl is dead—dead in the prime of his life, and with the great work he commenced still in its initial stages. Multitudes of Jews of every tongue deplore his passing away, and ask sorrowfully, "Who, now, will take up his work, and with his energy and far-sighted statesmanship carry it on to a triumphant issue?" It needs devotion, self-sacrifice, intense enthusiasm, and diplomatic skill, and there are few even in that brilliant race to which he belonged, who unite in themselves these indispensable qualities. But we have Scriptural authority for the belief that God has not cast away his people. He who raised up Moses, and Ezra, and Nehemiah, and the Maccabæan brothers, and Theodor Herzl can bring forth another leader, and be with him as he was with Moses. The seed which Herzl planted will yet grow into a mighty tree, and under its branches all the weary sons of Jacob find rest and peace.

Theodor Herzl was a native of Budapest, born in 1860. His parents were in moderately wealthy circumstances and gave him an excellent education. He graduated from the University of Vienna with the degree of Doctor of Philosophy, and began the study of law. He was, however, attracted to literature and soon abandoned his aspirations after a legal career, for authorship and journalism. He joined the staff of the Neue Freie Presse in the Austrian capital, and speedily made his mark on that able journal. His articles were related to Jewish subjects, but were political, social and critical. In 1891 he was sent to Paris as a correspondent for his paper, and there came in contact with men of his own race, who were prominent in art and letters. Until that time, he had taken little interest in Jewish matters and was practically ignorant of Jewish literature, history and religion. The tide of Anti-Semitism then running to flood in the Dreyfus case, the spectacle of the crowds of Russian Jews fleeing from Cossack oppression on their way to America, and the social ostracism which Paris, following Russian models, as adopting, stirred the racial spirit in the young journalist, and set him studying the Jewish question.

Dr. Herzl's mind combined the ideal with the practical, and his study of the subject led him to the conclusion that the solution of the difficulty was the founding of a Jewish state. Not that he dreamed of all the Jews leaving the lands in which they had settled and becoming citizens of one state, but of there being a centre, a nucleus, a home, under Jewish rule, to which the Jew of every land could look as the headquarters of his race. Sacred association pointed out Palestine as the proper site, and the promises of restoration uttered by inspired prophets, encouraged the belief that the enterprise would have upon it the blessing of God. The result of his meditations was the issue of Judenstadt, a brilliant work, in which he exploited his scheme of restoration. He believed that, although the Sultan might not consent to cede Palestine to a Jewish nation, he might be induced to lease the land to a responsible Jewish syndicate, able and willing to pay him a larger revenue than he was deriving from taxation. Once established under Turkish suzerainty, and under secure conditions, he believed that Jews from many lands would be attracted to such a state, and that a thriving, prosperous colony would develop.

The practical result of the circulation of Dr. Herzl's book was the first Zionist Congress, held in Basle, Switzerland, in 1897. There, for the first time in nineteen centuries, a representative body of Jews gathered to consider the Jewish problem. As one member after another of the race uttered his views, the wisdom of Dr. Herzl's plan was demonstrated. It was discovered that the Jews did not constitute a church, there being deep lines of cleavage in their religious belief, but that the ties of race and common interest were firm and strong. Love of their own land also was passionate and reverential. The idea of restoration took hold of the imagination and appealed to the heart. But sentiment alone was not the key-note of the Congress. The practical difficulties in the way were discussed with the keen intelligence of business men, and the conditions were outlined which were indispensable to the organization of a Jewish state. Max Nordau, Israel Zangwill and other eminent Jews, brought their practical good sense to the councils of the new society that was formed, and the Congress adjourned with strong hopes of ultimate success.

Five Congresses have been held since that time, at each of which Dr. Herzl reported the progress of the movement. He had audiences with the Turkish Sultan, in which he tried to win concessions from that slippery potentate, and he endeavored to enlist the support of the German and English governments. Societies were also formed for the promotion of the scheme, the collection of capital, etc. Of these there are now a thousand in Europe alone, besides about two hundred in this country. A fund of about three million dollars has also been raised, ready for a capital whenever arrangements can be made with the Sultan for taking possession of the land.

So far the movement had proceeded, when the world was shocked last week by the report of the death of the great leader. His loss is severe, but it will not be fatal. His plans were sagacious, and were worked out to the smallest details. They will surely be executed, and the world will no longer be able to point to the Jew as "the man without a country."

The Gospel at Coney Island

IN past years, Coney Island, the great seaside resort of the crowded metropolis, was also the resort of vicious characters of every description. Vice was flaunted along its thoroughfares, and on Sundays and holidays there were sections of the Island that were little better than a Pandemonium. Its pervading lawlessness was a continual source of trouble to the authorities; many of its amusements were depraving in character, and among the swarms of habitués who made the Island their stamping-ground, were crooks of almost every description known to the police. Its gilded attractions drew the multitudes, who knew little of the dangers around them. But Coney Island has undergone a remarkable metamorphosis. It has been morally purified and cleansed; the old-time dens are gone, with their lures, and the vicious and criminal element has disappeared. Scores of beautiful structures have superseded the old, noisy, vulgar-looking places that were an offense both to the eye and the ear of the visitor. The Island is now as well-regulated and as thoroughly under police control as any resort on the Atlantic Coast.

There is still another change which conduces, in a very large measure, to the happiness and well-being of the place. Coney Island has now come under the influence of the Gospel as never before in its history. For several weeks past, through the kindness of the President of the Dreamland Company, the Brooklyn City Mission Society has held Divine services in a large and well appointed hall, for the benefit of visitors and employees. These early morning services (they are held from 10 to 11:30 A. M.) have become, more and more, a pronounced factor, and are proving an immense blessing in the general life of the Island. At the service of Sunday, July 3, Rev. I. Howard Melish, Rector of Holy Trinity, delivered an eloquent Gospel sermon. He held the large audience in close attention throughout, as he described dishonesty and the train of evils following the desire for dishonest gains.

At the first of these Gospel services, the Rector of St. Ann's, Dr. Allsop was present, and since that time Rev. Jas. M. Farrar, D.D., Rev. J. Howard Melish, and other prominent pastors, have preached in the Auditorium, so kindly set apart for this Gospel work by ex-Senator W. H. Reynolds. The City Mission Society, at the outset of this movement, delegated two of its organ, always used in these meetings, reminds the pleasure-seeking multitude of the Lord's Day, and calls them to Divine service. Major Gardner presents the simple Gospel of Jesus Christ, and his preaching has been signally blessed.

In addition to these services, Rev. W. Bradford Williams, another of the City Mission Society's evangelists, holds open-air services at the same location every afternoon during the week. The distribution of tracts and Testaments, etc., is constantly going on, and through the activity of the City Mission Society many thousands of people have thus been reached with the Gospel at Coney Island.

Thus it is the good government and good citizenship have worked a complete change for the better. Coney Island, in the past, the suggestion of visit there was regarded by people as making a voyage into iniquity. The impression has changed completely, and the dark clouds which once hovered over the place, threatening the moral of the young and inexperienced, have been dispelled. To-day is a clean and wholesome resort, a place of recreation for the masses. Thousands upon thousands evangelists, Major F. Gardner and L. C. Roberts-Horsfield to have full charge, and later Major Gardner assumed the position of chaplain, and as such comes in close contact with many of the visitors and employees. Immediately after each Sunday morning service, these two evangelists adjourn to the beach, at the junction of West Fifth Street and Surf Avenue, and there hold open-air services to large audiences, gathered from the constant stream of visitors as they come from the railroad depots and trolley cars. Evangelist Horsfield's powerful voice in song reaches the people, arresting their attention, and this, together with the strains of an are carried there daily by the trolley and steamboat line. Always a popular place of recreation, its tone is now elevated, and the visitors are cared for morally as well as spiritually, and when the many thousands of visitors are wearied of the surf and of sightseeing; when they have admired the architecture of the beautiful structures, the fine towers and pagodas, the tropical garden, the zoo, the canals, and the many other attractions of the place, they can spend a restful and helpful hour at the Gospel meetings, from which none may go away without some seed of living truth having been sown in the heart, where it may yet bear precious fruit.

The Recent Massacres in Armenia

DR. GRACE N. KIMBALL

THE telegraphic reports from the Moosh - Sassoun region of Armenia, coming last week by the way of Paris and London, brings back with ghastly vividness the horrible deeds of 1894, in that same locality. We can but hope that it is an unfounded or at least a grossly exaggerated report. So we hoped in 1894; until, with our own eyes we saw the homeless, hunted, sword-scarred refugees, and heard at first hand, things that no newspaper report could ever adequately portray.

Ten years ago the central government of Turkey, began the campaign of extermination against its most valuable subjects, the Armenians. A more short-sighted, heinously self-destructive policy was never inaugurated. Among all the nationalities held under the rule of the Ottoman Turk, there is no one so capable of being solidly and increasingly contributive to the economical welfare of the government as are the Armenians.

Estimated before their depletion by massacre, and by consequent emigration of large numbers of the survivors at about four million, they constituted par excellence, the farmers, artisans, merchants and financiers of the Empire. Their mercantile abilities made them the great trading class, and their acquisitiveness and shrewdness, furnished both the capital and the capacity, whereby they have always been the financiers of the Turkish Empire. Why exterminate such a race? And yet it may be asserted beyond a peradventure, that extermination and nothing short of it, has been the only remedy which Turkish statesmanship could devise these past ten years, for the discontent and protests of the Armenians.

The causes of this discontent and protest are known to all, especially to the many thousands who have contributed their money and interest and tears to succor the woes of a persecuted people. It is a long and sad list. Justice in the courts not only denied, but replaced by most flagrant injustice, oppression and extortion; facilities for carrying on their legitimate pursuits withdrawn more and more, while in every other country on the globe, these facilities were being marvelously increased. In proportion as business and labor were hampered by government restrictions, and by local lawlessness and injustice, taxation was increased, and not only the legitimate rates increased, but a free hand was given to extortion on the part of tax-collectors and police, whereby the taxes in countless instances virtually amounted to one hundred per cent.

Thus, not only were the Armenians ruined financially, but these very officers and agents of the government joined with Mohammedan neighbors, Turks or Kurds, in freely committing every crime against manhood and womanhood which their evil passions and propensities suggested. Rapine, murder, violation, abduction have been for years the common lot of the Armenians.

In 1894-'95-'96, a careful and conservative estimate of the number killed by massacre was 75,000, chiefly able-bodied men. In the eight years since then, murder has been even more rife than usual, in a country where to kill a Christian, was to a Mohammedan little more than killing a dog. And now, if this report from Moosh is true, it would seem that a revival of the process of wholesale slaughter was at hand.

As no pen is adequate to portray the sufferings of these poor people in those terrible years of massacre, so no human words can ever suffice to tell what comfort of heart and what physical salvation was brought to these poor, terrified, homeless, bereaved, sick, wounded and hungry creatures, by the gifts of Christian sympathy and love.

The richest experience which life has ever brought or can bring to me personally was the privilege of acting as almoner of some of these gifts. Never shall I forget that New Year's Day of 1896, when, in the away Armenian city of Van, there was handed me cablegram from Dr. Klopsch saying that I could draw on THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for $10,000!

It was utter destitution face to face with what seemed inexhaustible succor! In a few months' time over $18,000 from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD passed through my hands and was distributed to the necessities of thousands and thousands of sufferers—chiefly women and children, widows and orphans, driven from the homes in the villages, and wandering in nakedness, hunger and cold in the streets of the city. Had it not been for this and similar outside aid thousands would have perished. As it was I did not hear of a single death from hunger. At one time and for months THE CHRISTIAN HERALD was feeding in Van 20,000 people daily. What a table that was to spread in His Name furnished forth by thousands who read these words!

As I said, the newspaper clipping under date of July 27, 1904, telling of a massacre of some 6,000 persons in the Moosh region, I seem to be reading one of the scores of such reports published ten years ago. I shudder to think that yet again when Russia is so busy in the Far East, when England is still burdened with the debt of her African War, when the people of the Balkan States are taking breath, Turkey may seize the opportunity to carry another hideous campaign of extermination.

If she does, let us not be weary in well-doing—hopeless. Let us remember that these poor victims are men of like passions and necessities with ourselves, and that, if we cannot prevent the disaster we can, as Christian duty and charity demand that we do, mitigate the results and succor the suffering survivors. They be homeless, to be in terror of life, to be weeping for those nearest and dearest, cut off by horrible murder to be naked and cold and hungry—who of us are sorely beset?

Industrial Work Among the Zulus

REV. JOHN L. DUBE, founder of the Zulu Christian Industrial School, is at present visiting America in behalf of his work. Mr. Dube is an energetic and educated Zulu. In his early years he came under the influence of the American Zulu Mission, and attended a mission school at Amanzimtoti. Here he got converted, and, later on, he came to this country with Rev. W. C. Wilcox, who took him to Oberlin, where he studied and worked his way through school. He has since established a mission on the Inkamas Valley in Natal, but seeing the need of industrial education among his people, he came to America for further study, preparatory to opening the Industrial Mission. While studying, he gave addresses in different churches, and told the people of his desire to return to his native land to preach the Gospel and to establish an Industrial School. He visited Hampton Institute in Virginia, and also Tuskegee, and saw the methods used there for the training of negroes in America. A committee was organized and money collected, and then Mr. Dube returned to South Africa. Upon his return, he visited prominent chiefs and natives, and told them of his plan. Some gave money, and others contributed labor, and a building was soon in course of erection, a farm of 300 acres having been acquired for the purpose. A board of trustees, comprising six natives and one European, was organized to work hand-in-hand with the American committee. This building was intended only for fifty boys, and when opened there were twenty-five applicants more than could be accommodated. Some, rather than go back to their heathen homes, and give up the opportunity of receiving instruction, lay huddled together at night on the floor of the schoolroom, until additions were made. The boys contributed most of the labor in these new buildings.

These boys come from all parts of South Africa. There are now more than 200 pupils. Girls come only as day scholars, for there is no dormitory for them. The boys are taught farming, carpentering, building, stonemasonry, road-making and printing. A weekly paper in Zulu, printed and set up by students, does much good among the educated Zulus by putting before them Christian ideas.

"Recently," says Mr. Dube, "we had evangelistic services and 75 per cent of our boys and girls professed conversion. We emphasize to them the need of their going out as missionaries among their people, who have not the advantages of the Gospel, to tell them about Christ, and also to show them how to cultivate the soil, work at a trade, and become honest and self-supporting."

Rev. Sydney Strong, D.D., of the American Deputation to South Africa (1903), writes: "I have the pleasure of stating that while on the work of the Deputation to the Missions of the American Board in South Africa, Mrs. Strong and I several times met Mr. Dube and visited the school of which he is the head. We found him to be one of two or three leaders among the Zulu people, who are shaping the course of the life of his race. He probably stands foremost. From the very first we were drawn to him, and all that we observed and heard of him and his work strengthened the belief that he is a very capable and consecrated man, and that his work is very important. We believe that it would be a calamity should it fail for lack of sympathy or support. We take real pleasure in commending him and his work. He is called the 'Booker T. Washington' of South Africa."

Any reader of this journal interested in the work may address Mr. Dube, at 350 Broadway, Kingston, N. Y.

A TRAGEDY OF DRINK

A Rum-Crazed Bridegroom Batters in His Wife's Skull Because She Wouldn't Drink With Him

MARTHA DENNISON lay near death at Gouverneur Hospital all day yesterday, says the New York Sun of July 7. George Dennison, her husband, lay in a cell in the Tombs all that time and groaned and prayed loud that the good God would not let her die. George beat Martha over the head with an iron bar early yesterday morning because she would not drink whisky with him as cheerily and blithely as he thought she should. Three weeks ago Martha was a young widow for whom all the young men in her mother's boarding house were contending. She had two children. The young men didn't care. She was so altogether sweet and girlish that they were willing to assume the two babies as a marital handicap if they could only win Martha. George Dennison won her. He was an electrician. He got better wages than anyone else employed in Martha's mother's house. He was better looking than any of the other boarders. Last Monday the couple went to 310 Water Street to live. The landlady there observed at the time that George was very drunk and that Martha was quite unhappy. Martha told the landlady that the two babies were in a home where George, "who wasn't turning out very well," couldn't get at them. Tuesday night George Dennison came into the place and called up the stairs for his wife. Martha would not come down. He went upstairs and staggered around on the landing in front of their door and shouted for her once more. Still she paid no attention to him. George kicked in the door. A moment later he half stumbled, half fell down the stairs, dragging his pretty young wife after him.

"You think you're too good to drink with me!" he howled. Then he threw her down three or four of the steps of the stairs and cursed her and shouted again: "You will be too proud to drink with your husband!" The woman didn't say anything. The other folks in the house peeped through the cracks of their doors and went back to bed and said nothing.

Early next morning the Dennisons came in again. George was still cursing his wife for not drinking with him. He threw her against the wall again and again, as he thrust her up the stairs ahead of him. No matter how often he struck her, apparently he never let go of her skirt. She moaned a little now and then, but made no coherent outcry. The door of their apartment slammed. The house was quiet for a little. Then there was the sound of a fall.

"Hey, somebody!" shouted George Dennison, on the landing.

The landlady went up stairs. She found the Dennisons' door open. Martha Dennison was lying on the floor in front of the door. Her hair was all undone. There was a growing pool of blood around her head. George Dennison was sitting on a chair not three feet from his wife's body, looking at her with a sullen grin.

"You wouldn't, hey?" he said to himself. "You wouldn't! You would be better than your husband."

He looked up as the landlady looked into the room. He pointed at his wife's bloody head with a bloody iron bar he had been swinging between his knees.

"Say," he said, "fix her up and wash her so she won't look so like hell."

The landlady turned on her heel and walked downstairs.

George Dennison leaned over the rail and shouted to her.

"Say!" he called. "I meant for you to do that now. I can't stay in the room with anything that looks like this. I'll pay you. But hurry up about it."

The woman below hurried her pace to a run. Out in the street she found Policeman Doyle, who first telephoned for an ambulance and then went upstairs.

He could not find Dennison. With the ambulance came Detectives Raynes and Maher. They searched the house. They found Dennison on the roof, looking over into Water Street.

"I'd jump," they heard him say to himself as they walked up behind him, "except that it would hurt."

They told him to come to them. He whirled around and struck at them with the iron bar which he still had in his hand. They tripped him and wrested the bar away from him and beat his head with their short clubs. They handcuffed him between them and took him downstairs. As soon as he was overpowered, he began to weep noisily. When they reached the landing of his own rooms, the ambulance surgeon and the driver were bringing Martha Dennison out. The detectives had to wait. Dennison leaned over the railing.

"Hey, Martha," he called to the unconscious woman, "you won't tell 'em nothin', will you? I didn't mean to hurt you as bad as I did. I only did it to teach you to be better company with your husband."

At the hospital it was said that the woman would probably die as the result of her hurts. Her skull was broken in two places.

A Missionary's Appreciation

FROM Rev. John A. Stooke, the well known missionary in North China, comes the following spontaneous letter of appreciation of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD:

"It has been very refreshing to me in this far-off corner of the world to make the acquaintance of your valuable paper. I do not write puff letters, but I should like to make acknowledgment of a fact. When I turned to your page of Questions and Answers, I said to myself, 'Here is where I shall find out whether the paper is loyal to the grand old Book.' I am pleased to say I was not mistaken. You put matters so straight and clear that your words would cheer many lonely workers in China. I wish they could all have it, but there is very heavy extra cost of living in this country, and I fear that many who would like to have it will at present be unable to afford it. I know of several who would like it. In these times, when dangerous nostrums are deluding men and women at home, and even in the missionary field, I am glad to see that you are not among those who 'sit on the fence.' You are loyal to conviction, and I am convinced that wherever the paper goes it will do good. I cordially wish you all success."

Twenty Thousand Children

THERE are certain delightful occasions that come but rarely in a lifetime, and which all things, animate and inanimate, seem to conspire to make perfect and enjoyable in the highest degree. Such an event was the recent celebration of the tenth annual opening of our Fresh-Air Home at Mont-Lawn, and the laying of the corner-stone of The Children's Temple, which is henceforth to be the spiritual centre of the work. The story of this celebration, in which a large and brilliant company participated on the nation's holiday, is told elsewhere in this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Among the hundreds of guests present on that occasion, there were many who have been staunch friends and patrons of our Children's Home ever since its foundation.

Our absent friends—the thousands of noble-hearted men and women who, by their continued support of this beautiful benevolence, have demonstrated the genuineness of their love and sympathy for the poor children of the tenements—were not forgotten at this gala celebration. They were with us in spirit, and their mighty influence as a contributive factor in the growth of the Home and the success of its mission among the neglected little ones, was recognized by speakers and audience alike. Faithfully and lovingly, they have stood by the work from the time of its inception; and now, at the passing of the tenth milestone, they can contemplate with satisfaction the progress that has been made. Twenty thousand children have enjoyed their generosity; twenty thousand pairs of little lips have remembered them many, many times in prayer; twenty thousand young lives have been brightened and made better because of their benevolent friendship.

Many of the children who were our guests in the earlier years of the Home are now grown to manhood and womanhood. We frequently hear from them. Some have now homes of their own and are making a brave struggle to lead true Christian lives. And a great proportion of this multitude recall their sojourn at Mont-Lawn as the brightest and most helpful episode of their juvenile years, and in many cases as the moral turning-point of their lives.

In the face of such evidence, who shall say it was not "worth while," to reach out a hand of sympathy and encouragement to the waifs of the tenements? We may not all be called to do valiant service in the eye of the world; we may not possess either the talents or the opportunity for certain grades of Christian work; but there is not one of us in all this great land of ours who is so poor or so weak that we cannot help a child. Thus, in the simplest and most direct way, we may win recognition from Him who said, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, ye have done it unto me."

A Candid Critic

ONE of the subscribers to this journal sends us a letter dealing with the question, Why men do not go more regularly to church? The problem is a serious one, and statistics show that it is becoming more serious and more urgent every day. No one is more vitally concerned in it than the minister himself, so that this answer from the pew to the question merits attention. The writer, of course, speaks for himself alone, but it is possible that other people share his opinions, and that the causes which make his attendance irregular, may be keeping other people away, too. Our correspondent says:

Do you think a pastor is doing his duty to his people when his sermons are made up of exhortations to attend church more regularly and to contribute more liberally? Did you ever hear of a theatre manager telling his patrons that they ought to come more regularly to his house and pay higher prices for admission? If the owner of a store were to harangue his customers with arguments why they should pay more for the goods he has to sell and try to impress them with an idea that it was their duty to buy more from him—would that store prosper? I tell you the churches would be more nearly empty than they are if the congregation had not a clearer idea of duty than their pastor has. I say to the preachers, Preach how to live. Preach the Gospel; and the church and your salary will take care of themselves.

Our correspondent seems to have been unfortunate in his choice of a church home. We believe there are few churches in which the pastor's sermons are made up of such exhortations as he describes. It is true, that occasionally a pastor feels it his duty to remind his hearers of their obligations, and, with all due respect to our correspondent, it must be said that there are some Christian people who need to be so reminded—but few preachers make a practice of devoting their sermons frequently to that topic. Those who do, may profit by his hint.

We are not sure that his comparison of the church with the theatre and the store is quite fair. Men go to the theatre to be amused and entertained, and to the store to obtain goods at market rates, or below those if it is possible. They go to church to worship God, and it is quite within the minister's province to tell them that it is their duty to be regular, and to support the means of grace. The theatre manager and the store-keeper have no such duties.

In principle, however, there is justification for our correspondent's complaint. There are too many instances of a preacher being out of touch with his flock. A man who has been surrounded by temptation all the week, who has had to fight hard to maintain his Christian consistency, goes to church on Sunday morning, hoping to receive help. He wants to hear something which will tone up his principles. He wants to do right and he needs encouragement. He has to go into the world during the coming week and he needs to have his spiritual strength reinforced. The problems of life perplex him, and he needs light and to have his faith in God invigorated. Losses come and he fears he may be reduced to poverty, and he needs to be directed to Him who has promised to keep them in perfect peace who trust in Him. All such persons would be disappointed if the sermon was on the duty of regularity of church attendance and of liberal giving. They have the right to complain, because the benefits that the church was organized to confer have been withheld.

Many pastors are away from their churches now, taking their annual vacations, and might find it profitable to consider the complaint thus voiced.

The New Serial

IN next week's issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will appear the opening chapters of the famous new Serial, The Two Captains, by Rev. Cyrus Townsend Brady. Our readers will then have an opportunity of enjoying the most finished literary production of one who is, by general consent, recognized as America's foremost author in the field of historical tales, and who is now at the zenith of his fame.

As we follow the development of this wonderful story of the sea, it impresses us with its reality. The two great historic characters, Nelson and Napoleon, whom we are wont to think of as giant leaders in war, are shown to be very human after all, and not so different from other men, except as conditions and circumstances combine to raise them so high above their fellows, where intellect, courage and high ambition found field for exercise.

But it is around what would be called the minor characters of the story that the greatest interest clings. The greatest charm of Chaplain Brady's story is that it is a touching romance of filial devotion. The love of Louise de Vaudemont for the old Vice-Admiral, her grandfather, is one of the purest and most beautiful affections in fiction. The loyalty of the Breton peasantry—one of the finest racial stocks in the world—is exemplified in the character of Brebœuf, an old sailor, who does not say ten words in the whole story, yet who is always in evidence and who plays a deciding part in one of the great crises of the tale. "Silent Brebœuf" is a character who will win his way into the hearts of our readers.

No one should miss reading this tale of the sea and its battles, and of the land of love and romance—the masterpiece of a masterly writer.

THIS IS YOUR LAST OPPORTUNITY

Three Dollars for One

AT this season of the year, many enterprising publishers make special introductory propositions, entailing great financial sacrifice to themselves, with a view to gaining for their publication admittance into new homes, confident that when once fairly introduced, regular annual subscriptions will follow, and thus compensate them for the financial loss temporarily sustained.

Experience has demonstrated that it takes fully six months for a publication to do full justice to itself, and therefore July 1 has been fixed upon as the date best adapted for Trial Subscriptions, because:

First. It brings these Trial Subscriptions to a termination on January 1, the time when people naturally determine on the papers they may wish to read during the coming year.

Second. The latter half of the year lends itself better to rich, special issues, and of course includes the Thanksgiving and the Christmas issues, either of which frequently is worth the price of a whole year's subscription.

Third. A Trial Subscription at this season of the year usually proves decisive, as a subscriber whom the choice of issues of the year cannot hold, evidently does not want the paper, and his decision may be considered as final.

It is a good sign when a publisher has sufficient faith in the merits and drawing qualities of his publication, to make him willing to entail upon himself heavy financial sacrifice in order to introduce his paper, by offering trial trips at nominal figure, and the public, as a rule, appreciates the enterprise that puts within its easy reach, for perusal and examination, publications, which, but for the facility thus afforded, must have remained unknown to them.

Hence a publisher who adopts this liberal plan, finds his public already predisposed in favor of his publication, and in the end, the venture is more than likely to prove a profitable venture to him, provided, of course, his paper is adapted to his public.

July 31 is near at hand, and this year we have a more liberal proposition than ever before. Having arranged with two other publications for a six months' trial trip at greatly reduced price, we are enabled now to submit the following

Morocco's Prophet

ONE of the most impressive illustrations of the corrupt condition of the government of Morocco is the position occupied by Sheik Malain, whose picture, with that of his guard, appears on this page. Sheik Malain is the head of a powerful tribe, whose depredations are dreaded by the Moors and by European and American travelers on the outskirts of Morocco. The Sultan of Morocco practically admits that he is powerless to restrain the lawlessness of the tribe. With the principles of Oriental despotism, he resorts to a compromise. Sheik Malain receives an annual gift from the Sultan, which he characterizes as tribute, in consideration of which he undertakes to keep his ferocious followers in order. His influence over them is unbounded, and though he does not fulfil to the full extent his obligation to the Sultan, he acknowledges his accountability to him, and refrains from hostility against people whom the Sultan has taken under his protection. His followers entertain a religious veneration for the Sheik and regard him as a person of great personal sanctity. He never appears in public without a green veil over his face, to screen him from the gaze of the unbeliever. It is now probable that France will put an end to the anarchy by establishing a protectorate over the country, which will practically upse the despotism of the Sultan. It will be a change for the better, even for the Moors themselves, who are now so unprotected by their government that they neglect to cultivate their fertile land, or to engage in commerce to the extent that they would do, if they could be assured of protection and of justice in the administration of law.

When the righteous are in authority, the people rejoice; but when the wicked beareth rule the people mourn (Prov. 29: 2).

A Lover Dismissed

In searching through the heaps of papyrus in Lower Egypt, among which Messrs. Grenfell and Hunt found "The sayings of our Lord" described recently in this journal, their interesting documents shedding light on the life of people eighteen centuries ago, were discovered. One of them was a notice served on a lover, by the father of the girl to whom he was betrothed. It informs the young man that, "Forasmuch as it has come to my ears that you are giving yourself over to lawless deeds, which are pleasing neither to God nor man, I think it well that the engagement between you and my daughter Euphemia should be dissolved. . . . Wherefore, for the security of the said Euphemia, my daughter, I send you this deed of separation and dissolution." There are parents in our time who know something of this trouble that this father underwent eighteen centuries ago. It is not, however, all who have his decision of character and are more careful about the moral character of their daughters' suitors than about their financial rating. But the apostles' advice is still sound:

Be ye not unequally yoked with unbelievers; for what fellowship hath righteousness with unrighteousness (1 Cor. 6: 14).

Producing Life

An extraordinary claim is made by an eminent scientist at Anderson, Ind. It is that he has actually developed living creatures from chemicals. He has been experimenting for several years with the object of discovering the source of life, and he believes that at last he has succeeded. At his invitation a number of scientists met on June 29 in his laboratory, to witness a demonstration of his method. A few drops of milk-white fluid were put in a glass, which was placed in an airtight case. A microscope disclosed black objects arising from the fluid and fluttering about wildly. The experimenter withheld the analysis of his compound, but declared that he first prepared a compound as near to protoplasm as possible, to which he added a saline solution, including ammonia and alcohol. The union of two compounds, he said, arrested and controlled vibrations of luminiferous ether and produced the animal life. Insects and other forms of animal life produced, he declares, can be nourished into a higher culture to ascertain what they may propagate. This is the secret so long sought by the ancient alchemists, but we shall need better evidence than that yet produced before believing that it has been discovered. There were probably germs of life that he did not know of in the scientist's materials before he applied his chemicals. Life comes from God alone, and no man can create it.

Who hath brought life and immortality to light (II. Tim. 1: 10).

Russia's Admiral

The one man in the Russian service who has given evidence of real ability during the conflict with Japan is Admiral Skrydloff, whose portrait appears on this page. It is noteworthy that this genius should have appeared in the department in which a great leader was not expected. At the outset of the war it was thought that Japan would be victorious at sea, but would fail on the land, owing to the military skill of the Russian generals. Hitherto, however, the Japanese have proved the superior of Russia in strategy, as well as in military prowess. It would appear that if the tide is to be turned, the merit of beginning the new order of events will be with the sea forces under Admiral Skrydloff. He is reported to have fallen in with a Japanese squadron consisting of a cruiser and a number of torpedo boats, which were convoying a transport off Gensan. The Russians attacked the squadron and, according to their own report, they captured the transport and sank or drove away the protecting vessels. The Vladivostok squadron, which is under the Admiral's orders, has made its mark by its boldness and daring. The crews mean order, of whose skill and daring he will do well to be on guard. A dispatch from a correspondent on board the Vladivostok fleet indicates that the Russians have at last taken heart after their long series of disasters and, having confidence in their Admiral, are fighting with new hope and courage. The Japanese, on their side, flushed with their past victories, will undoubtedly fight desperately to maintain their predominance at sea, and there will probably be fearful loss of life in the near future. It is a grievous prospect, for which there is no hope of remedy but in God's interference, which will ultimately put an end to all such tragedies.

He maketh wars to cease unto the end of the earth (Ps. 46: 9).

A striking illustration of the need of Christian work in Equatorial Africa is the fact, stated recently by a missionary, that ten packets of hairpins are considered a fair price there for a wife.

A DAINY LITTLE AUDITOR

GATHERING ON THE LAWN FOR THE EXERCISES OF THE DAY

LISTENING TO THE SPEECHES

OUR CHILDREN'S HOME at beautiful Mont-Lawn has just passed through the rare and delightful experience of a triple celebration.

On July 4, it celebrated, in a single day's programme, the Glorious Fourth, the opening of the tenth year of the Home, and the laying of the corner-stone of The Children's Temple, which is to be henceforth the focus of all its activities. It was a day long to be remembered, and the great lawn, dotted with pretty tents and crowded with happy children and delighted visitors, presented a picture so full of bright color and movement that it would have delighted the heart of an artist. Never had the place looked so beautiful.

In preparation for the great occasion, the Home buildings had all been gayly decorated with flags and bunting. Early in the forenoon, the visitors began to arrive, some afoot and many in carriages. The Home stages met those who came by train to Nyack, and carried them up the long, sloping highroad that leads from the village to Mont-Lawn. Long before the exercises of the day were fairly begun, the wide piazzas of the main building and the lawn were crowded with visitors.

It was a perfect day, with the bluest of summer skies, and a cool, refreshing wind to temper the summer heat. When the formal exercises began at 3 p. m., there were between 500 and 600 present, including the children. The latter were seated in a wide semicircle on the grass in front of the main building, and immediately in front of the "speakers' stand," which was a little platform of turf, leading from the gravel path down to the lawn. Here chairs had been placed for the speakers and the principal guests of the day. All around sat visitors, some on benches, others on chairs, and many on the smooth grass. Overhead the great pines swayed in the summer breeze, and afforded cool and refreshing shade.

At three o'clock p. m., Dr. Klopsch opened the exercises in a brief speech of welcome, in which he explained the object of the assemblage. He said, in part:

We are gathered here to take part in the exercises incident to the laying of the corner-stone of the Children's Temple. In obedience to the divine command laid down in Isaiah 54:3. "Enlarge the place of thy tent, and let them stretch forth the curtains of thine habitations; spare not; lengthen thy cords and strengthen thy stakes," we have taken the first step in the direction of permanency, by planning a stone building, and it affords me more gratification than I can express, that this, the first stone edifice erected here, should be dedicated to the service of God. It expresses, in a practical manner, the fact that over and above all, we, of the Children's Home, regard as of paramount importance, the spiritual welfare of those entrusted to our care.

In times like ours, when religion seems to be at a discount, when commercialism invades the pulpit and the sanctuary, deadening spiritual life, making it subservient to temporalities, it is a refreshing and encouraging instance to find this model Children's Home so full of pleasure, of happiness and of joy; mindful, first, of the importance of the never-dying souls of its little guests; and successful in making its church services as attractive to the children as are its sports and its gymnasium. Ask the children whether they would have the evening prayer service, the Sunday School sessions and the good-night prayers around their little cots discontinued, and a unanimous and emphatic "No," would be the response.

Luther, at one time, dreadfully discouraged at the slow progress the Reformation was then making, was walking with Melancthon along the streets of his city, giving expression to the disappointment he felt, when they came to a chapel, from which the happy voices of the children were heard in cheerful song, and Melancthon, turning to Luther, said, "As long as the children sing our songs, our cause can never be hopeless."

I believe that when the church has thoroughly apprehended the secret of making religion attractive to the children, the cause of our Lord and Saviour will experience an uplift that will culminate in a world-wide revival, resulting in the ingathering of millions, making good the hopeful prophecy, "A nation shall be born within a day."

May God grant his blessing upon this undertaking.

After the opening prayer by Rev. Dr. Iglehart, a hymn, very appropriate to the occasion, was sung, all joining with a will in the following words, to the tune of "Old Hundred":

The perfect world by Adam trod
Was the first temple built by God;
His fiat laid the corner-stone.
And heaved its pillars one by one.

He hung its starry roof on high
The broad expanse of azure sky;
He spread its pavement, green and bright,
And curtains it with morning light.

The mountains in their places stood,
The sea, the sky; and all was good,
And when its first pure praises rang,
The morning stars together sang.

Lord, 'tis not ours to make the sea,
And earth, and sky, a house for thee;
But in thy sight our offering stands,
A humbler temple, "made with hands."

This was followed by a responsive reading from the 132d Psalm, after which came the Scripture lesson from 1 Cor. 39:23. Addresses were next in order. Dr.

SENATOR LEXOW ADDRESSING THE ASSEMBLAGE

Klopsch introduced to the assemblage the Honorable Clarence Lexow of Nyack, Ex-State Senator from Rockland County, who made a most eloquent and patriotic address. He drew his hearers' attention to the fact that 128 years ago, on that very day, the American people laid the corner-stone of another temple—the temple of Liberty—which meant freedom of thought and speech for all, rich and poor, and gave the right to worship God according to the dictates of conscience. It was eminently fitting, the speaker said, that this day of all days should have been chosen to lay the cornerstone of the Children's Temple. These little ones—the children of to-day—were to be the American citizens of to-morrow. He referred to the lasting influence of the Children's Home and its work upon the life and character of every child coming to Mont-Lawn, and paid a glowing tribute to the founder and management of the Home. His speech throughout was most brilliant, patriotic and scholarly, and he was frequently applauded.

Rev. Dr. F. C. Iglehart, of Peekskill, N. Y., was next introduced, and made an eloquent and appropriate address. The beautiful scene, the blue sky, the waving foliage, and the flowing Hudson were an inspiration to the speaker, as he carried the thoughts of his hearers from nature up to Nature's God.

Hon. A. S. Tompkins followed. "It is fitting and appropriate," he said, "that the laying of the corner-stone of this building, to be erected and dedicated to God and the religious training of children, should take place on the anniversary of the laying of the corner-stone upon which has been builded the American Republic, dedicated to political and religious liberty." Judge Tompkins spoke of the two most interesting anniversary days, December 25th and July 4th, and of their significance, and predicted that the spirit of charity and good-will, and not the spirit of war, would be the dominant spirit of the future in our country. He spoke of the many noble charities of the present day, and of the spirit that prompts them. Concluding, he said: "It is the same spirit that prompts this noble man to give his time, energy, and money to maintain this beautiful country retreat for the boys and girls born and reared in the crowded tenements of the great city; and if one single life is made brighter, happier, and better because of the influence of this Christian home, then indeed, will his work not have been in vain." His speech, which was admirable throughout, was warmly applauded.

Rev. C. H. Mead, who gave the closing address, placed himself on very friendly terms with all by his felicitous manner of telling a story with which he prefaced his speech. The good Doctor, at a Summer resort, became acquainted with a very winsome lady, who spoke of her son, whom she always referred to as her "lovely boy." Afterward Dr. Mead was visiting the city where she lived, and, remembering her invitation, called at her home. The lady welcomed him most cordially, saying, "I am so glad, Doctor, now you can meet my lovely boy." When the child came in, there came over the mother's face an expression of pure affection, which seemed to transfigure her. As to the boy, "Well," said Dr. Mead, in telling the story, "I think, without exception, he was the homeliest child I ever saw. His hair was red, his nose snub, and if every freckle upon his face had been worth a dollar he certainly would have been a multi-millionaire." "Isn't he a lovely boy?" asked the fond mother. Now the good Doctor was in a quandary. To have told a lie, would have been outrageous to his principles; and, to have told the truth, would have grieved the mother's heart, so the tactful clergyman replied: "Madam, I never saw one like him." This was the truth, and was also satisfactory to the mother. Many years afterward, Dr. Mead said, he was visiting a distant city, and, one Sunday he listened to a sermon which made a most profound impression upon him. He sought the preacher to thank him. It was then he discovered that this magnificent young orator was none other than the freckle-faced, hub-nosed boy of years ago. "Where did you get it?" asked the Doctor of the young preacher, "such eloquence, earnestness and true feeling, where did you get it?" "Do you remember my mother?" said the young man; "well, she just loved it into me. All that I am able to do to-day, and all that I hope to do, I owe to my mother." The application was so obvious, that even the children understood it—how love for them had prompted and carried out the plan of the Children's Home, and the many blessings that go with it; and now it was love that had dug the foundation, and was now laying the corner-stone of The Children's Temple, and which would cement the stones together, when the Temple was finished and consecrated.

This and similar felicitous anecdotes evoked the heartiest appreciation from children, and from adults also. The ceremony of the laying of the corner-stone was most impressive. Dr. Klopsch took from the table in front of the little grass-covered platform on which the speakers stood, the upper box which was to be deposited in the corner-stone of The Children's Temple. He then announced that it contained the following articles:

- Copy of the Certificate of Incorporation of The Children's Home.
- CHRISTIAN HERALD Life Subscription Certificate in the name of Mary Klopsch.
- Full set of newly minted coins of 1904, from a cent to a dollar.
- Copies of Nyack Star and Journal of June 6, with description of The Children's Temple, and print of architect's design.
- Copies of Nyack Star and Journal of July 2, containing programme of corner-stone ceremonial.
- Copies of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD containing description and design of Temple, and also plan of Life Membership Fund.
- A Red Letter New Testament.

"If it ever should happen," said Dr. Klopsch, "in some far off future day, that the descendants of the present generation should examine the corner-stone and its contents, they will have no difficulty in determining the exact time of the erection of The Children's Temple." He then handed the box to Mr. George H. Sanson, of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD editorial staff, who is designated to deposit it in the corner-stone. The platform party, followed by a large number of the visitors, then marched in procession to the chapel foundation at the west end of the lawn, and Mr. Sandison laid the box in its place in the corner-stone, on the southeast extremity of the foundation. Taking up the trowel he applied the mortar, and then, while the entire party stood with uncovered heads, solemnly pronounced the solemn words: "In the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, I pronounce this corner-stone well and truly laid."

The exercises then closed with the doxology and benediction, the latter being pronounced by Rev. Dr. McPherson, of Jane Street Church, New York City.

On this occasion there seemed but one thing more to be desired, and that was the presence of all the kind patrons of the Home who have made this grand work possible. If all the readers of this journal who have contributed toward the support of this veritable "Children's Paradise," could have been there and beheld the throng of happy children; if they could have listened to the inspiring words which fell from eloquent lips, telling of the love that prompted it all, it would have cream and cake was served later, to both children and guests, and the perfect day closed with a fine display of fire-works, that never-failing source of delight for young and old. Soon after the last rocket had soared aloft, the faithful teachers gathered their flock together in the cool, clean dormitories, and every white bed was very shortly tenanted by a weary but supremely happy child, who needed no lullaby to soothe to slumber. And as darkness and quiet fell on Mont-Lawn, and the lamps of heaven were lifted in the skies overhead, over all brooded the Spirit of Love, divine and deathless, which fadeth not away.

A Corner-Stone Hymn

Following the laying of the corner-stone, these verses were sung, the entire audience present joining heartily:

On this stone now laid with prayer,
Let thy church rise strong and fair;
Ever, Lord, thy name be known,
Where we lay this corner-stone.

Let thy holy Child, who came Man from error to reclaim
And for sinners to atone,
Bless with thee, this corner-stone.

May thy spirit here give rest
To the heart by sin oppressed,
And the seeds of truth be sown
Where we lay this corner-stone.

Open wide, O God, thy door,
For the outcast and the poor
(Who can call no house their own)
Where we lay this corner-stone.

Endowed Beds at the Home

Passing through the dormitories at the Children's Home at Mont-Lawn, one is struck by the number of neat frames hanging on the walls over the cots. These frames contain the names of donors who have endowed the beds for the season. They number ninety at present, and we are hoping to make it one hundred. Some are in memory of little ones who have passed away, others contain the names of classes in different Sunday Schools, and still other cots have been paid for by the united efforts of different bands of young people who have held fairs and sales, that these little ones might have the happiness of a visit to the "Children's Paradise." But whether these little white beds are supported by individuals, churches or Sunday Schools, they represent the most beautiful thing in the world—the love for little children, and the charity which "vaunteth not itself and is not proud."

One frame contains the pictures of two little boys whom their mother so loved that they seem ever near to her, although they went away many years ago. In their name she sent $42, inscribing on the pictures, "From two little boys who dearly loved the country."

It costs but $21 to support one of these beds for a whole season, and by that means seven little ones can have the benefits and happiness found at Mont-Lawn, for ten delightful days, and ten quiet, restful nights. $3 will send one child, and perhaps be the means of saving its life.

THE SCENE AT THE LAYING OF THE CORNER-STONE

Painted a scene upon their memories which neither years nor sorrow, joy nor grief could ever have dimmed. A goodly number of the patrons of the Home, however, were present, together with many who had never visited the spot before. All were loud in praise of the beautiful work accomplished by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, in providing this quiet haven of refuge for the heat and noise-tormented children of the tenements.

After the children's noon meal, a bountiful lunch was spread for the guests under the big marquee tent. Ice-

OUR CHILDREN AT THE NEW OPEN-AIR GYMNASIUM AT MONT-LAWN

THE Kingdom of Israel had thirty years of misrule in the reigns of Omri and Ahab, father and son. Omri reigned twelve years, and Ahab twenty-three. In the lives of these kings evil gained momentum, so that it was said of Ahab, "he did evil in the sight of the Lord above all that were before him." His name and the name of his wife, Jezebel, are synonyms of all that is base and despicable. Both Omri and Ahab were builders. Omri built a gorgeous capital, named Samaria, located on a hill of the same name, 1542 feet in height. He had bought the site of a man named Shemer—hence its name—and paid for it two talents of silver, equivalent to $1,076.60 when money represented much greater buying power than now. Samaria was the capital of the ten tribes for two hundred years until Israel was taken into captivity, 721 B.C. King Omri built this city for his own glory, and the prophet Isaiah afterwards called it "the crown of pride," in prophesying of its drunkenness and destruction. (Isa. 28:1).

King Ahab also was a builder. He might have emulated King Solomon and built a temple for the living God, but instead, he built temples to Baal and Astarte. His queen, Jezebel, maintained four hundred prophets of their vile, so-called "religion." That anybody ever considered vice a virtue might seem incredible if we did not have right in our own land the latest of these Thalic religions assuming to be the true Israel, and calling all disciples of chaste religions "gentiles." Modern Elijahs are already summoning its deceiving prophets to their Carmel trial and overthrow.

All that the Bible and nature and history have to say about wise and unwise building may serve as illustrative light and shade for this story of two unwise builders, who were prompted by pride and pleasure to build beautiful cities and temples, but who built their characters on the sand and mud, for certain overthrow (Matt. 7:27).

Omri's motive was pride—not so low a form of selfishness as the sensuality that made his successor yet more wicked; but pride is very sinful and very foolish. The sin of pride consists in giving to self the worship that belongs to God, and in displacing gratitude with egotism. Let it be said over and over again, the things we are proud of are usually the things for which we should be grateful.

Character is the autograph mark or image made by an engraver. A man's character is, therefore, his Maker's autograph and image, cut deeper and deeper day by day by his acts, his thoughts, and especially his choices.

I have read of a sculptor who for seven years had been trying to carve out of a piece of marble the statue of a king. He had completed the work, with the exception of some delicate touches about the eyes. Great crowds of specialists had come and looked on this wonderful piece of art. His name had been heralded abroad as being the finest sculptor of the age. But as he was putting on the finishing touch his chisel slightly slipped, and destroyed one of the eyes. The whole figure was ruined.

Omri in character building spoiled his own eye, which, by fostering instead of suppressing pride, turned inward instead of upward when he recalled the things he was privileged to do. His city of Samaria, with its beautiful buildings beautifully placed like a crown on a beautiful hill, seemed to be flawless, but its fault was that it did not point the people's eyes upward, recalling the psalm,

"Except the Lord build the house they labor in vain that build it."

"Except the Lord keep the city, the watchman waketh but in vain."

Fine buildings, beautiful cities have the same danger to-day in that they so often promote a foolish personal or national pride when they should only prompt gratitude. At the jubilee of the Yale class of '53, Mr. Charlton T. Lewis said: "If I could sum up in one word the burden of the hour, it would be a call to the generations of Yale never to subordinate manhood to work. It remains no less true to-day than of old and forever that in this universe there is nothing great but mind." Let us not think alone of beautiful cities and grand scenery, but seek to see, aye, to be, grand men and women. And the way we use our leisure hours influences and reveals character even more than the way we work and study under constraint. Our very "castles in the air" unconsciously built in day-dreams out of our unconscious innermost desires, show most clearly whether pride or passion or altruism and faith are our master-builders. This brings us back again to the definition of character as our innermost nature, the characteristics that have been cut into our very being by heredity and God and our own habitual choices. Dr. Henry Clay Trumbull has developed impressively the significance of character out of its literal meaning, in the following words: "The word 'character' is primarily the scratch, or stamp, or sign, by which an engraver marks his work as his own. It is the distinctive token by which a thing is distinguished from every other thing. The person as a person is what the man appears to be, in his ordinary exhibit of his characteristics before his fellows. The 'person' is, in its etymology, the actor's mask, the large-mouthed cover of the face through which an old-time actor was accustomed to speak—per and sonore, to sound through. The character as a character is what a man stands for in the sight of Omniscience; it is what will be disclosed in the day of universal disclosure, when the man will be known by all as he has been and as he is. Jesus Christ is declared, in Hebrews, to bear 'the express image'—or, more literally, the distinctive 'character,' impress, or distinguishing mark of God's substance, of God's individuality. The true character of Jesus was therefore the God-like character. And those whose characters are conformed to the character of Jesus approach more and more nearly to the image of God in which man was originally created. Dr. Johnson's character, for example, was not shown in his habit of nervously twirling and twisting his fingers, and of whimsically laying his hand on the top of every post which he passed in the street. Those were his eccentricities, his oddities. But his character was shown in his standing with bared head for hours out in the cold rain, at the old book-stall in Uttoxeter market, in self-imposed penance for his disobedience to his father long years before. 'Deeper than the judgment, deeper person, and is the mark of what he is; reputation depend upon others, and is what they think of him."

In the words of another, "Reputation is what men and women think of us; character is what God and angels know of us." One of the largest stones ever quarried, until recently, in this country was the monolith for the General Worth monument erected in New York. This shaft weighed one hundred and seventy-five tons when quarried. After was all ready for erection, having been quarried at an enormous expense, it was found to contain a defect, and the contractors were obliged to furnish another. It is not enough to seem right. Probably men will find out our faults at last however hidden, but in any case God will reject the defective character, cherishing wilful sin when forgiveness and a new life might have put it away.

Character building, good or bad, goes on constantly in us, whether we will or no.

Little builders, day by day, building with the words we say Building from our hearts within, tho'ts or good or tho'ts—sin.

Building with the deeds we do, actions ill or pure and true
Oh, how careful we must be, building for eternity.
Building, building, every day, help us, Lord, to watch and pray.

Ahab's character building had more than mental defects. He showed a bad character and made worse by marrying Jezebel, high priestess of Astarte the Syrian Venus, in whose groves the lowest vice was sold as worship for temple revenues. The next step was to substitute her corrupt groves for the altars of the true God all over the land. Not alone evil acts but evil words if only heard, and evil thoughts if not quickly driven away, build in us such temples of sinful pleasure as drove all true joy out of the lives of Ahab and Jezebel for both worlds.

Let us not be content with negative goodness, with not building temples of evil. Let us, like Nehemiah in spite of opposers, build or rebuild our Jerusalem noble character. The great words of Oliver Wendell Holmes, in "the Chambered Nautilus," quoted in part in a recent lesson, should here be given at length:

Build thee more stately temples, O, my soul,
As the swift seasons roll!
Leave thy low-vaulted past!
Let each new temple, nobler than the last,
Shut thee from heaven with a dome more vast,
Till thou at length art free,
Leaving thine outgrown shell by life's unresting sea.

We cannot alone build such a character. Its "Maker and builder is God." It is not by the old motto "Try, try again," but by the divine one, "Love, trust, obey, for there's no other way," that we return from captivity and build up the new temple of a Christlike character.

"Building for eternity!" That is the peculiarity of character building. Much of our building is intentionally transitory. We pitch our summer tent for a week or two. The World's Fair buildings, with all their brave show, are of stone but "staff," intended to stand but a few months. There is such transitoriness in much of our character building. A man secretly resolves to be good till he has secured the property of his good father, who might disinherit a wild son. He holds his sins in check lest he lose his business position, resolving to "make up for lost time" when he can do as he likes. Such goodness is built on shifting sand, and manifestly will not abide because it is not founded on the rock of innermost preference for good, the new nature that Christ gives. That new nature, if cherished and protected by right associations in people and books, becomes "second nature" at last, and so eternal permanence of good character often becomes fixed even in this world. Habitual inward preference for evil, even though overruled temporarily by the will for selfish ends, also comes permanent and fixed many lives long before death. Whenever such fixedness of character comes to that so the judgment day has already come, and the awful sentence self-imposed, "Guilty of eternal sin." You are, therefore, even now building an eternal prison or an eternal mansion for everlasting habitation, and the eternal building of character may be completed any day by final choice of good or evil. This is the profound meaning of the can not of character which man grows like God who "can not deny himself."

The only safety is to see it now that your good condition is founded, not on the sand of prudential considerations, such as "honesty is the best policy" but on "rock-firm God truth" which true followers of Christ seek to make the foundation of life from the very kindergarten. A philanthropic woman who had given and raised money for a "Children's Refuge," came with her plans to a business man for counsel, but it was only one more illustration of the proverb, "We ask advice when we mean approbation." She found she had a beautiful and well-arranged building in architectural plan, but was expecting to put it on the ground with no foundation, and he could not persuade her that building would not be safe in such severe storms as would sometimes test it. All went well for a time, but at length the rains descended and the winds blew and beat upon the house and it fell. Young men will laugh at her "womanly folly" and then repeat it in more serious character building.

PRESENT CONDITION OF THE CITY OF SAMARIA than the feelings, lies the sea of human character—in that which is the mystery of all beings and all things, in what we call their nature, without knowing where it lies, what it is or how it wields its power. In the long run a man's conduct must conform to, and so will disclose, his character; but this does not by any means make character and conduct identical. Conduct is one of the means by which character is made known to others; but many things are to be considered when judging of a man's character from his actions. Nor is reputation character, although the two terms are often used interchangeably. 'Character lies in or pertains to the

Our Household Circle

The Prize-Winners

THE family whose sons and daughters carry off prizes in school and college, has a right to be proud and complacent. As a rule, a good deal of faithful home-training is back of the successful student. A good foundation has been laid. Habits of application have been fostered, and the child has been accustomed to taking hold of work seriously with diligence and thoroughness. Occasionally a very brilliant boy makes a fair showing in examination papers, even when he is not a plodding or very earnest student through the term, but in such a case, though he win a prize, it is probable that he will fall behind in life's competitions. To have all one's goods in the front of the shop window is not a great advantage. There must be something worth having and holding in stock if one is to do well through the strifes of the coming years.

In a certain home the parents have made it their rule to accompany the children, step by step, through their preparatory work. Every evening when the supper is cleared away, the household circle is gathered around the lamp, and the tasks for another day are taken up with purposeless intention. The boys have never carried imperfect lessons to school. The girls have stood at the head of their classes. As a direct consequence, in college the children of this home have come out ahead of others less sedulously trained, have achieved distinctions, which are rewards of merit, and, having left college, have at once taken front rank in the encounters of business, or in their chosen professions.

We hear a good many flippant comments on the futility of prize-winning. It is true that some precocious students exhaust their brain-power too soon, waste the oil in their lamps, and are not ever able to replenish either the physical or intellectual stamina they have lost. Yet these are exceptional. The rule of nature is progression, and those who begin well are likely to continue bravely in the race. While we must not despair of the man who is near the foot of his class, it is folly to discount the attainments of the man who is at the head, and our congratulations are in order when our friends, the Browns or the Robinsons, tell us of the laurels won by their clever and pains-taking sons and daughters at school.

A Needed Point in Home Training

In home training, vigilance should be exerted against negligent heedlessness. Children are permitted to do every possible careless thing, and when they say "I didn't mean to," the excuse is accepted. Probably very few of us, whether young or old, engage in acts of deliberate mischief. This is fitly regarded as malignant and wicked. But many of us, every day we live, are wilfully careless, and it is a wonder that dreadful results do not follow far more often than they do.

For instance, a woman cleans a soiled garment with naphtha or gasoline in the same room with a lighted stove. A boy experimenting with his camera, takes a lighted match into a closet full of combustible chemicals. A man forgets to unload his pistol, and later, supposing his chambers free, shoots himself or somebody else. A person sweeping the stairs leaves a dust pan on the steps, three removes from the bottom. A daily record of the heedless things done and passed over in any home would open the eyes of the housemother, who cannot shirk her responsibility in the matter.

The other day an elderly gentleman slipped on a banana-skin on the sidewalk, thrown there by a thoughtless boy. Three days after, he died of apoplexy, and the doctor said it was caused by a jar or shock that had weakened the thinning walls of the arteries, and made ready a big break at any moment.

What had this to do with the housemother? Why, the bearing of cause on effect is obvious. The lad who threw the banana-skin had not been trained well, or he would have found another way to dispose of it. In most towns in this time of excellent town-housekeeping, there are receptacles here and there for all sorts of debris. If none is near, a person who eats bananas in public (for anybody of good breeding a doubtful proceeding), should find somebody's kitchen range, and ask the owner's consent to burn up the troublesome rind.

Evil is wrought by want of thought,
As well as want of heart.

Train the children not to consider mere thoughtlessness a venial sin.

Boys and Housework

Boys are the better for having a practical acquaintance with housework. There is no reason why a boy should not learn to cook, to make coffee and tea, to sweep a room and to make a bed properly. If a mother is delicate and often tired, why should she not call equally upon her sons and her daughters to give her a lift in the domestic drudgery. The lad who learns what energy and skill and outlay of strength are expended in the simplest routine of the simplest home, will have more appreciation of woman's work than the one

The Lad in Business

"GENE went to college, and what has he ever amounted to? He has never been worth his salt."

This argument against a liberal education for the son of the house is constantly heard, enforced by the illustration of some boy who has made a failure in his manhood. The people who urge it lay the blame, in good faith, at the door of the college, where it does not belong; not at the door of the boy, where it does. A weakling in character, a useless, incompetent, lazy or vacillating person, whose will is as brittle as glass, will inevitably make no mark among men, not because he has had advantages, but because there is nothing in him. A pint cup cannot be made to hold a gallon.

Granting native ability and resolute determination to succeed, the lad who has been trained in a good school, or a fine college, will take hold of business better and reach promotion more rapidly than the one who steps out of the grammar school and works his way up. Yet it is, after all, just a question of the boy.

In a certain large and prosperous business, three years ago, a place was made for a young man, fresh from a New England university. He had maintained a fair standing in his class, but had carried off no special honors. The Dean called him a good all-round average student. To-day, so rapid has been his advancement, owing wholly to his own merit, that he is manager of the business.

A few years ago, an ill-dressed, hungry-looking lad applied for a place in a law office in Manhattan. He was just out of the high school. Whatever drudgery of sweeping or dusting or copying or running errands there was, he did not shirk it. Not a moment of this time was unemployed. Being a wideawake lad of force and energy, he picked up law as chickens pick up corn; he studied in the office, and has recently passed the rigid tests of the State examinations, and been admitted to the Bar.

The problem must be solved in the personal equation. If your boy amounts to anything, the very widest and deepest education you can give him will help not hinder him. Collaterally, the university furnishes a man with the manner, and the ease, and the savoir-faire of a gentleman. It also gives him the open sesame to cultivated society, and supplies him with friends who may help him in his career. But if the boy cannot have what the college has for her sons, he need not despair. The strong man is bound to climb. It depends on pluck, unselfishness, energy, and a clear aim set before one and steadily sought, whether in this world we succeed or fail.

Adjustments

A young woman, unhappy at home, where her chief complaint is that she has a mother who dislikes company and a father who hates music, fancies that she would be perfectly contented if her environment could be changed. In common with others like her, she feels that she is misunderstood, that her innocent longings are crushed in the bud, and that she has no room for her being's flower and fruitage to expand and develop. Her preparation for a battle with the world has been imperfect, and she has an undisciplined mind, hysterical or emotional. Yet this girl offers herself as companion to an invalid or elderly lady, and looks to that situation as the peri looked when standing by the gate of Paradise.

A mother who dislikes company is of course rather trying, especially if her dislike extends particularly to boys and young men who are somewhat given to late and lingering calls. A father who wants the piano shut and frowns upon the mandolin is an irritating personage, though his neighbors doubtless bless him behind their own doors. Who that has suffered from the pounding, beating, hammering and strumming of the average girl on the average piano, has not in moments of desperation wished that piano and girl might be wafted to the ends of the earth, or set down in the middle of a vast wilderness? Who that has passed the twenties has not wearied of the sentimental youth who never knows when to take leave? One's sympathies go out to the parents of the young lady though one sees her point of view very clearly.

But elderly ladies are generally more difficult than parents. They have set ways of their own. They require no end of personal service. They do not engage a companion as a parlor ornament. The pretty girl who goes out as a companion, is often in an anomalous position, with society neither above stairs nor below. Invalids are capricious and exacting, and tax the patience of the skilled care-taker: much more the strength of an inexperienced attendant. The question of adjustment is often a most puzzling one.

The bond of friendship should not be easily broken. Blood is thicker than water. Our own people, the homely folk we have lived with our lives long, with all their faults we love them still. We criticise them now and then, but we spring to their defence if others do so. There are worse things than querulous relatives, though even they may be annoying enough at times.

Questions & Answers

Mrs. D. V., Housatonia, Mo. Which is a Christian woman's duty—to attend Sunday School and church while the husband needlessly stays at home, or stay at home with him, and try to win him to Christ by that means?

We do not believe she does wisely to neglect her own religious privileges because her husband neglects or despises his. She should go to church, and thus give him the example of a consistent Christian life. Talk with him, pray for him, and entreat him; but let him know that you love God's house and Word too much to neglect either.

A. S. Dunklin, S. C. Will you kindly explain the significance of the term, "Sealed orders," which is so often quoted by different writers? for instance:

None knew the port she sailed for,
Nor whither her course would be;
Her future course was shrouded
In silence and mystery.
She was sailing beneath "sealed orders,"
To be opened out at sea.

"Sealed orders," as the words clearly convey, are instructions given under seal (which is the sign of a sacred trust), to the commander of a vessel, the nature of which he will not know until he breaks the seal and opens the letter, in presence of his official subordinates next in rank, at some given point at sea. The purpose of this secrecy is (1) that there may be no interference with the mission before its departure and no attempt to change its destination, since the latter is known only to those who gave the orders, and (2) that the commander, when he opens the orders far out at sea or in some distant port, may proceed to carry out the same without such danger of interruption as might have been anticipated had his destination and object been known. The orders, therefore, are simply designed to keep the purpose absolutely secret until the moment for action arrives.

John I., Dallas, Texas. Does the Bible teach us that the world is to grow better, as time goes on, or worse?

It teaches that, though sin will continue to prevail among men, the true Church of Christ will extend in spite of persecutions and tribulations. "Better," and "worse" are relative terms, and can hardly be properly applied here. The Divine plan and purpose may at times be apparently obscured; but it goes on steadily and irresistibly nevertheless, and God is surely leading the race forward to that time, when, under Christ, it will be ready to be lifted up to the full privilege of perfect spiritual reconciliation and union.

F. B. A. Sharon, Mass. Yours is the old question of the origin and authorship of evil, in a new form, but the conclusion is pure sophistry. The Creator has laid down certain laws to govern his universe. Fire, air, water, in their own proper places, are not destructive but harmonious agents; but when man, in contravention and defiance of the simple laws of nature (as we sometimes call God's unwritten statutes), does things which destroy this harmonious action, it is not the law but the law-breaker that is to blame for the results that follow. In the Slocum case: (1) inflammables were recklessly exposed to fire; (2) boats, life-belts and other recognized protective apparatus, were criminally defective; and, (3) the blazing boat, instead of being beached quickly, was driven two miles in a fresh breeze, which fanned the conflagration. Thus, at every point, the natural laws, divinely established for man's protection from danger, were set at naught. Had they been observed in the first place, there would have been no fire and no loss of life.

A. B. B., Austin, Pa. 1. How can a man best overcome a besetting sin? 2. Is it harder for a backslider to return, than for a sinner to be converted?

1. It depends somewhat on the nature of the sin. In general, the best way is for the man to study the situation, with the view of discovering the circumstances which lead to its commission, and avoiding them. If certain places, certain society, habits of eating or drinking, habits of reading and thinking, can be definitely recognized as producing an inclination to the sin, or a decrease in the power of resisting temptation, those things should be shunned. A man in such case is bound to do all in his power for his own deliverance. His main reliance, however, is on God's help, for which he should pray. His own effort, only shows his sincerity. 2. It is useless comparing them. If the backslider was sincere in his profession, and was really a Christian, he will easily return, because he will be unhappy in sin, and will be drawn by the Holy Spirit and the memory of past joys, which he has lost. His return may be painful, but it will be in harmony with the Earnest Inquirer, Johnstown, Pa. Under what authority can a Supreme Court Judge pronounce an observed law of the State "obsolete?"

I assume that by "Supreme Court Judge" is meant a Justice of the Supreme Court of the State, and not of the United States Supreme Court. Cases where a law is disregarded or ignored because it has become "obsolete," are relatively very rare, and usually the fact will turn out to be that a later law has repealed the law thus regarded, by implication. Judges will sometimes say that a law is "obsolete," when they really mean that it has been repealed by implication, or superseded by a later law covering the same subject. Strictly speaking, no established law can cease to have effect until it has been repealed or superseded, and superseding a law is only one form of implied repeal. In New York State perpetual leases of land were lawful before the Revolution. For seventy years and more after the first Constitution (1777), the legality of such leases was in dispute, and there was frequent litigation. Finally the courts settled down in favor of the illegality of such leases, on the ground that they were contrary to public

Mrs. A. H., Detroit, Mich. 1. Where and how did Pilate die? 2. Also give me some information in regard to Herod's fate.

1. In the traditional and apocryphal writings there are various accounts given of the death of Pilate. One is that he was summoned to Rome, tried before the Emperor Caligula, and condemned to be confined for life in a cave, and that he was accidentally slain by an arrow, shot by the Emperor. Another is that he drowned himself in Lake Lucerne, where a certain promontory—Mont Pilatus—still bears his name. Josephus says he committed suicide. 2. Herod was a titular appellation, like Czar or Emperor, and there were many who bore it. The Herod of the Bethlehem slaughter of infants died in Jericho B. C. 4, aged 69, of a loathsome disease.

John K., Selma, Miss. 1. Among the earliest known historians and biographers are Herodotus, Pliny and Plutarch. You would do well, however, to read standard histories of Egypt, Greece and Rome, which you can procure through any bookseller, if a library is not available. 2. Josephus is regarded as the greatest of Jewish historians: He wrote of the historical events of the world from the beginning up to his own time (A. D. 37—100); but gave special prominence to all matters relating to the Jews. He wrote several books, the greatest being his Antiquities of the Jews. 3. There are many, but probably Edersheim's Life of Christ would be most suitable for your purpose.

C. R. Aspen, Colo. Are all nations called "Gentiles," except Jews?

The word, in the Hebrew, originally meant "a people," or a crowd, and was used in a general sense of any people. Later, however, the Jews, regarding themselves as a nation set apart, applied the term generally to all other peoples, implying that they were semi-barbarous, idolatrous and unclean. In the New Testament, it simply denotes non-Jews of any race or tongue.

THREE months ago, we offered 900 slightly damaged sets of our wonderful Crown Encyclopedia, consisting of five volumes, containing 3,000 pages, 500 illustrations, 96 beautifully colored maps, all bound in rich cloth and genuine gold, at the low figure of $1.00, simply to clear out the entire lot to make room for new stock. To our surprise, over 2,800 orders reached this office, and rather than disappoint our customers, we filled the surplus orders from the regular stock.

Since then we have discovered some more slightly damaged sets; and others, misdirected at first, have been returned by the express companies, so that we are enabled once again to repeat our offer of three months ago.

When our subscribers bear in mind that, in the first place, we printed 50,000 sets, aggregating 250,000 volumes, they will readily understand how, even with the greatest care, many of these books or sets, must necessarily suffer slight damage; not enough to hurt the encyclopedia proper, but to render it unavailable as absolutely new and undamaged stock.

We can now offer a little over 200 sets, and we repeat our proposition of three months ago as follows:

The insides are perfect in every respect, and the damage to the covers in no case exceeds the ordinary wear and tear incident to a single month's use.

(These sets, neatly packed, we will sell at ONE DOLLAR, charges collect at your end, or at $1.50, delivered free.) If you live at a great distance from New York, you will do better to send us $1.50 and let us prepay the charges, but if you live nearby, you can save money by sending us only $1.00 and paying express charges on delivery of goods. The set weighs seven pounds.

It goes without saying that you must act quickly if you wish to benefit by this offer. To-day is better than to-morrow, as to-morrow may be too late. Your money will be refunded should the supply be exhausted before your order reaches us.

principles of his nature, and remorse will be relieved by the joy of pardon. The conversion of the sinner is affected by so many conditions as to early life and his own nature, that there is no basis for a uniform opinion.

A. O. C., Penfield, Pa., writes:

Permit me to call your attention to a question and answer in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of June 8, which was asked by R. E. P., Campbellsville, Ky.: "Plant your potatoes in the light of the moon." As a farmer I may throw some light on the subject. "The light of the moon" is by us thought to be the time it shines all night or nearly so. Now, if I plant my potatoes, or anything else, so that they will come up in that period of the moon when it does not give any light at night, the young plant, being in the dark, will rest at night and grow in the daylight, and by the time the moon again gives light all night, or nearly so, it will be strong enough to grow without a rest. On the other hand, if I plant so the crop will come through the ground when the moon gives light all night, it will grow all the time, which is too much for the young plant, its roots not being strong enough to furnish it with sufficient nourishment. It will probably turn yellow and look sickly, which condition will last until the dark nights come to give it a rest.

policy, and that the law which originally sustained them had become obsolete. The real reason was, however, that perpetual leases were of feudal origin, and the policy of the State was against them.

S. D. Nelson, S. C. Why did Christ tell the blind man to whom he had given sight (Mark 8: 26), not to tell any one how he had been cured?

The people were only too ready to think of Christ as a mere wonder-worker. On the other hand, he was anxious that they should regard his miracles merely as evidence of his spiritual commission. They were his credentials. He did not come into this world to work miracles but to lead men to God. He would have liked the blind man and those who witnessed the cure, to be so impressed by it, that they would have sought spiritual sight at his hands. He would have been disappointed if the only result of the miracle was to bring him a number of other sufferers seeking healing. Probably he foresaw the latter result, and sought to avoid it by the prohibition. Another reason may have been, that the notoriety it would bring him might

Dynamite in Deadtown

By REV. C. H. YATMAN

C. H. YATMAN

CHURCHES, cities, and citizens are much alike. Some need Sunlight; others Dynamite. You cannot sweeten a cesspool with cologne, nor thaw out frigid indifference with tepid water, even though it be religious.

The Rev. Mr. Lighthouse, pastor of the First Church of Deadtown (of whom we have heard before) was celebrating his fifth anniversary as chief shepherd of that flock. The record of a half decade was enough to satisfy any ordinary mortal in the ministry—but, you see, he was not ordinary.

Instead of delivering a long discourse, eulogistic of the five years and its fine fruitage, to the immense crowd, he said: "I have been spending the past week in close study of Deadtown Christianity and its Relation to the Beatitudes of Christ and the Ten Commandments. And this is the opportune moment of telling you the truth.

"It is possible that both the officials of this church and its members may want a change in the pulpit after I have spoken; be that as it may. Listen to me now. Outward conformity to church law is not proof of inward Christian life; many of you love the church and love me, but the Love and Law of God does not dwell in you.

"I have the positive proof; before me are men who contribute well to our church expenses, so we show a clean balance sheet, with no bills unpaid, but your workmen are poorly paid; their wives and children complain to me of their bitter lot in life. And I find it to be true; awfully true. No man can oppress the poor and be a real Christian; understand that.

"Again, many of the women of this congregation are as void of the spirit of Christ as apples of Sodom are void of nourishment. Your church life is like a garment you are able to put off and put on. The element of sacrifice—the positive human proof of your new birth—is lacking. You do nothing wrong, maybe; but neither do you do any good.

"You keep the weeds of wickedness low, but there is no harvest of good works to glorify your Father in Heaven. Plenty of fuss and stir and doings that call attention to you or your church, but little or none of that soul sacrifice begotten of Him that gladdens the pent-up prisoner in some kitchen, or visits the sick. Many and many an hour you have beguiled yourself in the church, when you should have been taking care of someone's burden that they could have filled our pew.

"You recite the creed and commandments well, and read the Scriptures, too; but neither recitation nor reading of them is of any account unless you live them out.

"How many of you this hour have a deep, intense hunger to be good—that is, blessed—who thirst after righteousness? He said, 'Blessed are the peacemakers,' but you rush to bargain counters that are breeders of sweatshops and makers of white slaves. You men buy labor as you buy logs, and back of the discontent of our day among the multitudes is the fact that 'the strong shall help the weak' is not applied. You read it on Sunday and bolt it on Monday. I have seen with mine own eyes the shades of the Hebrew merchant's store pulled down on Sunday, and you Christian men flying our window advertisements with glaring boldness on that day. For shame! For shame!"

Words like these came pouring from the big preacher's lips like coals from the furnace. I confess I became so intensely awakened to the real conditions of the town, its Christians and myself, that much of the moral dynamite he flung out burst above my hearing. I called myself back to listening with huge effort. I noted scarlet faces about me, and frowns and tears were on many cheeks. I saw many hands on the backs of the pews in front of them, eager listeners, not willing to lose one word.

Two men over by the second iron pillar of the south aisle had risen up; they were unconscious of it; you could tell that by their faces. I heard a suppressed groan from a director of our leading Trust company.

How long he preached I cannot tell. There was no hymn following the discourse. You can sing out many a truth. There is a time for song, but it does not come after such a message. They had expected Sunlight, and lo! he gave them Dynamite! When everyone expected "a review of the great work of our church," he dealt sledge-hammer blows, not against men of straw, but against us! He did not deal in generalities, such as would have pleased us, but Nathan's "thou art the man" was no more direct than his truth to the men and women before him. It was hard to tell whether he had used the pruning knife or the hoe that pulls up the very roots.

When he had finished preaching, there was a pause of a full minute, his head fell low till his chin touched his breast, his hands were on the Bible he had closed with his last sentence. I think he prayed—for the life of me I cannot tell; then, lifting his face, he said:

"The mid-week anniversary service will be devoted to business of importance. You are asked to come," and pronounced the benediction.

In my opinion the organist wanted to play the "Dead March from Saul," but the keys were silent, by the pastor's orders.

The Big Preacher never put a ton of announcement to a pound of fact in his work, so the mid-week anniversary meeting had more than the large church could hold. No one had seen him on the street or elsewhere since Sunday. He evidently knew the power of seclusion and silence, little known nowadays.

"Business of importance!" I rather think it was. A preliminary hearing to the judgment day is not easily forgotten. I was glad I was forced by the crowd out of my regular seat in the middle aisle to one in the gallery. I could see both the preacher and the people. What psychological law had been at work making our people come dressed more modestly and in keeping with worship, I don't know. We were noted for "our style."

There are queer laws in this old world. No one had told it; the preacher himself had given no inkling of it, but as sure as you can tell the oncoming of day, so that crowd felt the approach of power, of duty or doom, of a resistless energy that works on human hearts as sunlight works on seed in the soil for golden grain.

The vestry door opened, and some elders came in, but no preacher. What was the matter? Deacon Shaw said the pastor begged to be excused from the opening exercises, which consisted of hymn, Scripture and prayer, followed by an anthem from the chorus choir. All this done, there was evidently nothing else for Mr. Shaw to announce. He and the elders and the congregation looked longingly to the vestry door. It opened quietly, and in he came, pale and nervous, but calm.

I said at once, "That man has been fasting, weeping, too—look at his eyes!" He did not bow his head for prayer, but with a simple "Good evening" to all, he handed his Anniversary Address to the church clerk for reading. It was a brief, concise, interesting document of church history as made by the work of the workers.

The clerk sat down, and he arose. How he began it would be difficult to describe; the fact is, I don't believe he began. His "beginning" was long before he entered the church door that night. Another fact is, the whole thing was without beginning and certainly without end.

There was a true setting forth of why Christ came into the world, and what he came for; what it meant to the individual, here and hereafter; what his church stood for and meant to civil government and society; its relation to him as Bride, and the character it must possess to be thus related; its membership, and their relation to commerce and the community.

"The sins of this city are dreadful;
The government of this city is baneful;
The piety of the city is doubtful;
The corruptors of this city are powerful;
The pleasures of this city are questionable;

The reputation of this city is hateful;
The morals of this city are sinful;
And the church in its membership has social, financial and political power enough to change it all, and it does it not!

"It professes the presence of One who came to destroy the works of the devil, and lo! our young folks are devoured like sheep by wolves.

"We declare the abiding aid of the Holy Ghost, who is both omnipotent and omnipresent, and yet wickedness—open and disgraceful, secret and damning—is rife.

"Harken, my people and friends! It is all so, because we are so.

"Hundreds of you women are society gamblers: business men before me, in corporate capacity do astounding things of swindle and robbery; parents permit pleasures that our pilgrim fathers would pronounce indelicate and indecent, and neither culture nor usage have altered their real character nor their bad effect on the young.

"The deadness of Deadtown has crept in on us till thousands think it right to do wrong; others are hard on that way—and wish it were.

"Separation from the world is called silly; firm principles and religious fervency are called fanaticism. Restoration has swallowed up retribution. Love has displaced all law, and the goodness of God means an abridgement of the Ten Commandments, at least to the diminishing point of 'don't steal if it won't pay,' and the guilt is in being found out."

A woman fainted in the middle aisle of the main floor, but apart from a friend with her, no one paid any attention.

Then came from the preacher's innermost soul words that will never be forgotten. Never!

"The people in this house, this hour, are partners in all this. Saint and sinner live precisely alike. The Bible has given way to the novel and magazine; its fundamental truths are doubted. Family prayer is neglected; patriotism suffices for piety; communion with God by his Spirit is a lost art.

"Eat, drink and be merry, for to-morrow we—oh bother to-morrow; let us live to-day," is the rule of life; and I assure you, moral chaos with eternal anarchy will follow it all.

"We are satisfied with a few hundred converts, who soon partake of the nature of the moral atmosphere they breathe. When the absolute need is a revival that will change both the character and conditions around us. The church itself, with indifference and sin, is an abhorrence to Jehovah. His wrath will be enkindled against us unless we repent. Hear what he says:

"To what purpose is the multitude of your sacrifices unto me?" saith the Lord: "I am full of the burnt offerings of rams and the fat of fed beasts, and I delight not in the blood of bullocks, or of lambs, or of he goats. When ye come to appear before me, who hath required this at your hand, to tread my courts? Bring no more vain oblations; incense is an abomination unto me; the new moons and the Sabbaths, the calling of assemblies, I cannot away with; it is iniquity even the solemn meeting. Your new moons and your appointed feasts my soul hateth; they are a trouble unto me; I am weary to bear them. And when ye spread forth your hands I will hide mine eyes from you. Yea, when you make many prayers, I will not hear; your hands are full of blood.

"Wash you. Make you clean; put away the evil of your doings from before mine eyes; cease to do evil. Learn to do well; seek judgment, relieve the oppressed, judge the fatherless, plead for the widow."

"Hear my final words. If the officials and members of this parish will join me in a ministry that means purity of life, peace of conscience, both toward God and man; power from on high to sacrifice to save the city, as well as our souls; to live and do—not what he would do if he were here, but what he would have us do because we are here. If you will join me thus, I will remain and serve you as best I can; but if you will not, then I leave you, for I will not be partaker of these sins, to answer with you at the bar of God, who will hold each of us to account for the deeds done in the body.

"Before each one is the balance of life, death, judgment and eternity. I have decided irrevocably for myself. So must you."

What it will be to stand before a great white throne to be judged by the Almighty, I cannot tell; but that hour, that crowd—myself included—stood within hearing distance of it, without doubt.

He bowed himself on the pulpit and wept. His suppressed sobs were thunderbolts of love. I knew then how Jesus felt when his lamentation over Jerusalem was made. Three men rushed up by the communion table, the leader our wealthiest pewholder.

"Oh, pastor, don't leave us! Don't! We are lost if you do. Hell has an awful grip on us; but it will swallow us up completely if you go!"

"Stay by us! Stay by us! Oh don't leave us! Don't! don't! don't!"

Scores rushed forward. The aisles were crowded. Then the pews became penitent forms. Once the preacher looked up and around, then he sobbed louder than ever; but it was not the same. I cannot tell the difference. I do not know; only I knew there was a change; bitter tears are not like blessed ones.

It was morning before all had left that house of prayer. Some went home and then came back. Many, very many, heard of the happening and went to the church doors and looked in. Conviction seized hold upon them. They went in, and they, too, were converted.

Individuals would break out in a most pitiful cry of repentance. Some hidden sin came up. Some agonized over the necessity of a surrender that meant the paying back of ill-gotten gains. Hundreds knew what they must do to be saved, and to meet the conditions they prayed for God's help for hours.

Saloons closed for lack of trade; brothels were empty as Sodom after the destruction; old feuds and family quarrels were buried beyond a resurrection; dirty shows shunned the town as if it had the plague; there was no gambling, for the gamblers, fashionable and otherwise, were either converted or confounded. Politicians found that insincerity was nothing more than "playing the double," and to do it was to be politically doomed. Taxes were lowered, insurance rates went down, property sold better. Streets were cleaned; strikes ceased, and a fine library went up.

Lo! It was discovered that it was not false but fact, that when He—the Christ—came, it really meant "Peace on earth, good-will to men."

The Oldest Pulpit In America

ONE of the first sermons preached by Bishop Wilson, of the Methodist Church, after his elevation to his present office, will be memorable in the history of this denomination, for the reason that the Bishop occupied what is probably the oldest pulpit in existence in the United States—the one in which Robert Strawbridge stood when the Methodist Episcopal Church of America was organized in 1766.

BISHOP ASBURY
From a very old painting

This venerable pulpit is very simple in construction, consisting merely of four upright posts, connected at the top by side-pieces and a board, which was used as the resting-place for the Bible and hymn book. The posts are fastened into a platform, standing about a foot above the ground, and the enclosure is hardly large enough for a man of generous proportions. The wood is hickory and the pulpit bears many marks of age.

It has had a very interesting history, for it has not only been tried by time but

by fire. As is well known, the meeting which resulted in the formation of the church was held at the home of John Evans in Carroll County, Md. Until a few years ago, the pulpit was stored away in the old Evans' house, until accidentally found by Rev. C. D. Smith, pastor of one of the churches of the neighborhood, who brought it to Baltimore for safe keeping. About the same time, one of the oldest known paintings of Bishop Asbury was found in Baltimore, covering an abandoned fireplace. The family, not knowing the value of the picture, had cut a hole in it, in which to place the stove-pipe passing into the chimney. Pulpit and portrait were stored away in the Methodist Hall, with a pair of saddlebags used by Bishop Asbury when he was a circuit rider. During the great fire in Baltimore, the Methodist Hall was reduced to ashes. Rev. E. L. Watson, pastor of Harlem Park Methodist Church, remembered that the venerable relics were stored away in the building, and hastened to the place with Rev. C. W. Baldwin, just in time to prevent them from being destroyed. Rev. Mr. Watson procured a wheel-barrow and wheeled the pulpit to the post-office, where it was kept until the danger was over; but so narrow was its escape from destruction, that the wood was actually scorched in places by the heat.

Work Among Latin Peoples*

LYING nearer to us than the famous mission fields of India, China, and Africa, the work among the Latin races has never attracted the interest of the American church in the same degree. One reason for this is probably the consciousness of the hold the Roman Catholic faith has obtained, and the fierce opposition to Protestantism which the attempt to effect an entrance develops. The reports, however, which reach us from Mexico and the countries of South America, show that there is need as urgent there for Gospel work, as among the heathen of the South Seas. It is not the Roman Catholicism of our own country that prevails there, but an ignorant and superstitious type, which has little hold on the men, and a debasing hold upon some of the women. Of true, vital, intelligent knowledge of the Gospel, there is little in any of those lands, and it is only at the risk of persecution that it can be imparted.

In Mexico, thanks to the firm rule of President Diaz, the missionary is protected, but the social prejudice against his work and the indifference to his teaching renders the field exceptionally difficult. In Brazil, Mr. Reginald Young and his devoted wife are laboring with great success and with ever widening opportunities of usefulness. Other missionaries also are working, but all too few to reach the population of nearly eighteen millions in that land in which the converts number less than eight thousand. In Peru there has been fierce persecution, and the Bible Society's agent has been imprisoned and the venerable Dr. Wood has been in danger. Uruguay, Argentina and Chile, nominally Catholic, have an aggregate population of ten millions, yet at last accounts, the number of missionaries was about one hundred. It is not really Catholicism that opposes them, so much as agnosticism and a religious indifference, which is the product of intelligence rejecting Catholicism and not knowing of the pure Gospel. The field is wide and the laborers few.

AT SUNSET

DOWN the long avenue we're looking to-day,
The vista of long gone years;
While lengthening shadows lightly play
With memories of joys and tears.
Down the long avenue when years were
And life a page unread, [young,
Did the spirit of prophecy ever tell
Of burdened days now fled?

Down the long avenue faintly sounds
Sweet songs of long ago,
Floating on breath of summer air
In soft and rhythmic flow.
Down the long avenue the western sun,
With crimson, slanting rays,
Foretells a morrow yet to come,
Promising glorious days.

When silent ones shall sing again
The wonderful songs of yore,
And in rapture list to harmonious strains
From those who ne'er sang before.
When Right shall appear in garments of
And Wrong be buried from sight, [grace,
While Beauty and Love walk hand-in-hand,
And Sin be banished with night.

"The book is fine. Mr. Morrison has surely demonstrated that the world appreciates a pleasing personality, a manly courage and an unflinching purpose to overcome difficulties. We are all delighted with his pleasant way of telling the story of his travels."

Gall sores and blisters cause the horse much pain. They come from heat and friction under the collar or saddle. The parts should be carefully cleansed with a pure soap that will not smart. Ivory Soap with warm water, is excellently adapted to this purpose. This soap is peculiarly efficient where it comes in contact with sores, as it is mild and pure. While cleansing thoroughly, it also soothes and heals.

The Hawthorne Centenary

IF Nathaniel Hawthorne had lived until July 4, 1904, he would have been 100 years old on that day. Yet, so swiftly does time fly, that it seems but a few years since the greatest romancist America ever produced, was laid to rest in the beautiful cemetery of Sleepy Hollow, at Concord, Mass. Here, in the days of Hawthorne's simple living, in the Old Manse, he used to wander under the grand old pines, weaving in imagination the beautiful thoughts which afterward took definite shape in his writings. This habit of taking long walks alone was his from early boyhood, and he used to declare to his mother that sometime he should go so far away that he never would return.

When preparing for college, young Hawthorne amused himself by publishing a manuscript periodical, which showed much vivacity as well as talent. Quite prophetic was his answer, when, asked by his mother what profession he would like to follow. Speculating upon this, he said in a letter to her, "I do not want to be a doctor, and live by men's diseases; nor a minister, to live by their sins; nor a lawyer, and live by their quarrels, so I do not see that there is anything left for me but to become an author. How would you like some day to see a whole shelf full of books written by your son, with Hawthorne's Works printed on their backs?"

Nathaniel Hawthorne was born at Salem, Mass., where his centenary was recently commemorated, as it was also at Concord, and at Bowdoin College, where he graduated in the class of 1825. His life was one of great and interesting contrasts. He was a shy and sensitive man, and the need of appreciation came to him, comparatively late in life, after a number of his works had been published, and scarcely noticed. For years he was employed in the Custom House in Salem, and it was here, standing in front of an old, high, wooden desk, that some of his greatest tales germinated, and were worked out, in intervals between the prosaic tasks of weighing and measuring coal, salt, and other bulky commodities, on foreign vessels.

The great body of the reading public almost ignored Hawthorne's first writing, and his first public recognition came from England. One of the editors of the Athenaeum republished three of his characteristic tales. In 1837, S. G. Goodrich brought out a collection of the author's writings, under the title of Twice-Told Tales. Longfellow, a fellow-student and life-long friend, generously reviewed this work, recognizing that it came from the hand of a genius.

It was not until the publication of The Scarlet Letter, in 1850, that Hawthorne became famous. He afterward wrote the House of the Seven Gables, The Blithedale Romance, and other tales, but his fame rests upon that study of what might be termed the dark days of New England, the tragic story of Hester Prynne. Born in the town where the narrow streets were eloquent of the narrow minds which made the burning and hanging of so-called witches possible, it seems but natural that the author should have become the interpreter of certain of these Puritan characteristics.

In 1842, Hawthorne married one of his earliest and most enthusiastic admirers, Miss Sophia Peabody. Their domestic life was most beautiful, and Mrs. Hawthorne always remained her husband's devoted worshiper, though it must have been very trying to the good New England housewife, when, after months of frugal living, her husband would come home joyfully bringing an oil-painting under his arm, for which he had expended the greater part of the money that his wife was depending upon to settle the bills for household and other necessary expenses.

Thoreau and Emerson were often Hawthorne's companions. Hawthorne's genius was of an order most delicate, he regarded and so spoke of himself, as the most obscure man of letters in America; but reputation came at last, though belated, and the author found himself hailed as among the men of genius of his day.

The writings of Hawthorne deal with some of the most subtle and elusive phases of the life of the soul, and they show keen insight into motives which control the actions of men, of whom he was a keen observer. Lacking only the accomplishment of verse, he was a poet in the highest sense, and his writings possess grace, charm, and exquisite purity of diction, ranking second to the work of no other American writer. He died at Plymouth, N. H., May 19, 1864.

Gospel Work in Burmah and Siam*

MORE than ninety years have passed since Burmah became the scene of the labors of that devoted missionary, Adoniram Judson. Several missionaries had preceded him by about six years, but they were prevented doing effectual work, and few inhabitants of the country had heard the Gospel. The story of Dr. Judson's labors, of his long imprisonment and torture, of his heroic devotion to the cause, and of his final triumph, has been often told. After six years unremitting labor, he baptized his first convert. That was in the year 1810. Time and again he was driven away, his converts were persecuted, and he had to remove from place to place to escape his enemies. But he never deserted Burmah, and for thirty years he lived and labored and prayed for the conversion of its people. The thriving Baptist mission with its many stations and its thousands of Christians, is the outcome of the work he commenced. Not only the Burmans proper, but the neighboring tribes of Shans, Karens, and Pakus, have been evangelized, and recent reports indicate a most hopeful prospect of further progress.

Like Burmah, Siam lay in the undisputed possession of the Buddhists, and the demon worshipers, until the arrival of the Christian missionaries. In 1828, Dr.

Gutzlaff, of the Netherlands Missionary Society, and Mr. Tomlin, of the London Missionary Society, began work in the country, but both were obliged to abandon the field after a brief period. The American Board then sent Dr. Abeel there, and the Baptist mission spared an American missionary from Burmah, Rev. J. T. Jones, to labor in the field. Three other missionaries were sent out shortly afterwards by the American Board. One of these the Rev. Jesse Caswell, made the acquaintance of the heir to the throne, and through his influence was able to gain concessions for the missionaries, which have led to most beneficial results, opening the way to a widespread propagation of the Gospel.

Reaching the Non-Church Goers

Rev. Walter Reid Hunt, a pastor of Orange, N. J., has a novel method of increasing the influence of his pulpit. Those who for any cause, are at present cut off from church affiliation, receive by mail, once in two weeks, a sermon, a report of some interesting conference, or a list of new books. Once in two months a printed pastoral letter is sent by the minister to the members. Once each year, a full, printed order of service, hymns and prayer, is mailed, and all are asked to read it at the same hour. In these ways he hopes to stimulate the feeling of brotherhood and unity among scattered and lonely lives. On the part of members, he expects that each will write him at least four times a year.

A BACK LICK

Settled the Case With Her.

Many great discoveries have been made by accident and things better than gold mines have been found in this way, for example when even the accidental discovery that coffee is the real cause of one's sickness proves of most tremendous value because it locates the cause and the person has then a chance to get well.

"For over 25 years" says a Missouri woman "I suffered untold agonies in my stomach and even the best physicians disagreed as to the cause without giving me any permanent help, different ones saying it was gastritis, indigestion, neuralgia, etc., so I dragged along from year to year, always half sick, until finally I gave up all hopes of ever being well again.

"When taking dinner with a friend one day she said she had a new drink which turned out to be Postum and I liked it so well I told her I thought I would stop coffee for a while and use it, which I did.

"So for three months we had Postum in place of coffee without ever having one of my old spells but was always healthy and vigorous instead.

"Husband kept saying he was convinced it was coffee that caused those spells, but even then I wouldn't believe it until one day we got out of Postum and as we lived two miles from town I thought to use the coffee we had in the house.

"The result of a week's use of coffee again was that I had another terrible spell of agony and distress proving that it was the coffee and nothing else. That settled it and I said good bye to Coffee forever and since then Postum alone has been our hot mealtime drink.

"My friends all say I am looking worlds better and my complexion is much improved. All the other members of our family have been benefited, too, by Postum in place of the old drink, coffee." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Ten days trial of Postum in place of coffee or tea is the wise thing for every coffee drinker. Such a trial tells the exact truth often where coffee is not suspected.

SICK DOCTOR

Proper Food Put Him Right.

The food experience of a physician in his own case when worn and weak from sickness and when needing nourishment the worst way is valuable:

"An attack of grip so severe it came near making an end of me left my stomach in such condition I could not retain any ordinary food. I knew of course that I must have food nourishment or I could never recover.

"I began to take four teaspoonfuls of Grape-Nuts and cream three times a day and for 2 weeks this was almost my only food; it tasted so delicious that I enjoyed it immensely and my stomach handled it perfectly from the first mouthful. It was so nourishing I was quickly built back to normal health and strength.

"At the present time I am preparing a paper for 2 medical journals in which I mention my own case and speak particularly of Grape-Nuts, great value as food to sustain life during serious attacks in which the stomach is so deranged it cannot digest and assimilate other foods.

"I am convinced that Grape-Nuts more widely used by physicians will save many lives that are otherwise lost from lack of nourishment." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

SUMMER CHURCH-GOING MADE COMFORTABLE

THERE seems to be no longer any well-grounded excuse for staying away from church, at least in the State of New Jersey. A nursery has been opened by Mrs. Thomas A. Edison, wife of the famous inventor, for the care of babies, in connection with the Orange, N. J., Methodist Church. Many mothers find it impossible to attend church, because there is no one to stay at home and take charge of the babies. So Mrs. Edison, who is superintendent of the primary Sunday School, and president of the Woman's Guild, concluded that the children could be brought to church, and cared for in a special room.

There may have been a quiet purpose in this project, to leave the father bereft of his last rational excuse for absenting himself from church, as he could not plead that he was obliged to stay at home and take care of the baby, so that his wife could go. There would seem to be a field for such nurseries in other places besides Orange, and in other States than New Jersey.

One of the preachers that stick to their pulpits during the hottest weather, is the Rev. Robert M. Aylsworth, pastor of the Simpson Methodist Church, Jersey City. He says that experience has told him that one of the reasons why men do not go to church, is that they hate to dress up in suits of solemn black, with stiff, starched shirts and high collars, when they can stay at home and be comfortable in cool negligee. Not long ago, putting his idea into practical form, the pastor posted this notice in the church vestibule:

With the opening of the heated term, the pastor will be gratified if our ladies attend public worship, especially in the evening, without their hats, and gentlemen would be in good form should they adopt negligee costumes, that all may worship in comfort.

Dr. Aylsworth says: "I have been preaching the gospel of common sense in these matters for years. At first, church attendants and other preachers were inclined to poke fun at my little reform, but I persevered, and the results have rewarded me. My congregations sit in comfort, their minds on what I am saying, full of religious contemplation, while in other churches, squirming, suffering audiences mop their brows, fry, sizzle and hope the preacher will cut it short."

Songful Christians

Though they may forget the singer,
They will not forget the song

Not long since, a small party of friends were climbing a mountainside with the purpose of conducting a prayer meeting at the home of a family who are in a way "shut in." The day was warm and the climb hard and tedious; but one of the climbers kept singing on the up grade. Another member of the party, referring to it afterward in a joking way, spoke of the singer as one who could sing climbing a mountain. But are not all Christ's true followers trying to climb the steep of life. And may we not all say: "He has put a new song in my mouth." If we are seeking the higher levels of life, let us sing, no matter how hard the way.

National Degradation

By MRS. M. BAXTER

ALL the kings of Israel, without exception, were idolaters; all followed the sins of Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, who made Israel to sin. Omri, the founder of the fourth dynasty, built Samaria as his royal city, and this is the only thing which has made his name notorious, except his exceeding wickedness. Omri wrought evil in the eyes of the Lord, and did worse than all that were before him. For he walked in all the ways of Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, and in his sin wherewith he made Israel to sin, to provoke the Lord God of Israel with their vanities. God says to Samaria and Jerusalem by the prophet Micah, who lived one or two generations later, speaking of his own time, "The statutes of Omri are kept, and all the works of the house of Ahab, and ye walk in their counsels, that I should make you a desolation, and the inhabitants thereof a hissing" (Micah 6: 16). And yet God did not leave himself without witness. During these reigns God sent prophet after prophet: Ahijah, the Shilonite, who spoke to Jeroboam; Shemadiah, the man of God, who spoke to Rehoboam; a man of God out of Judah, who also spoke to Jeroboam; Iddo, the seer, probably Obadiah; Elijah, who spoke to King Ahab, and Micahiah, the son of Imlah, besides Jehu, the son of Hanani. These kings of Israel were not left in ignorance; they might have known the true God.

Ahab outdid even his father, Omri, in sin. He reigned twenty-two years in Samaria. "And Ahab the son of Omri did evil in the sight of the Lord above all that were before him." "The statutes of Omri" imply that this king must have instituted an idolatrous system of government in direct opposition to the statutes of Jehovah. It was open warfare with God and with all which was holy. But Ahab went further and took for his wife "Jezebel, the daughter of Ethbaal, king of the Zidonians, and went and served Baal, and worshiped him." Jezebel, from the allusion to her in Rev. 2: 20, as "that woman Jezebel, which calleth herself a prophetess, was probably a priestess of Baal, and a woman having great power over Ahab, who was a weak man and who had sinned greatly in yielding to her." God taxes him with the responsibility, thus: "And it came to pass, as if it had been a light thing for him to walk in the sins of Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, that he took to wife Jezebel, the daughter of Ethbaal." He brought this influence from beneath into the Lord's land, and God was provoked to anger.

Having gone thus far in sin, he could not stop. On and on Satan drives his slaves, from one wickedness to another, and men who yield to him lose power over their own will, and cannot stop at their own pleasure or exercise self-control. Oh, how much evil comes from one wrong step! Jeroboam could not trust God to keep his people loyal to him, and so he made the golden calves, and eighteen successors followed in his ways, and two hundred and fifty years idolatry among the people of Israel, God's chosen sons grew out of that one act of unbelief and disobedience. How awful sin is! At the great white throne, when Jeroboam stands to answer for his sin, how many generations will rise up and call him cursed, and how awful it will be for this man to meet then the hundreds and thousands whose eternal loss lies in great measure at his door! The Lord, in loving mercy, warns us of the beginnings of sin! And let us watch unto prayer, lest we be tempted and fall unawares.

Things went from bad to worse. Under the influence of his wicked wife, "Ahab reared up an altar for Baal in the house of Baal, which he had built in Samaria." Probably this was in distinct opposition to the temple of Solomon at Jerusalem. "And Ahab made a grove. And Ahab did more to provoke the Lord God of Israel to anger than all the kings which were before him." It seems to have been a time of open defiance of Jehovah. Baal-worship, with all its abominable rites, was the state religion. And this was in Israel, the people whom God had chosen, and separated from the nations to be his peculiar people! "Shall I not visit for these things, saith the Lord? Shall not my soul be avenged on such a nation as this?" (Jer. 5: 8, 9). And this was the king with whom the pious Jehoshaphat had made affinity, and it was Athaliah, the wicked daughter of the wicked Jezebel, who had married Jehoram, Jehoshaphat's son!

Questions & Answers

Reader, Bridgeport, Conn. If Christ was perfect when he came into the world, what is the meaning of the statement in Heb. 2: 10, that he was made perfect by his sufferings?

There can be no doubt of Christ being perfect. His life in the flesh proved that. But in order that he might be specially prepared for the work he is now doing, as the Head of his Church, the High Priest of his people, he had to undergo temptation and suffering, that he might be able to help the tempted and comfort the sufferer. What they bear, what their struggles are, he could learn only from experience. That he did learn, that he bore all so nobly, was a proof of his being perfect. The man who has encountered temptation and has triumphed, belongs to a higher order than the innocent man who has never been tested. His holiness has been proved by his trial. The physician who knows how to treat yellow fever, is better able to deal with the disease after he has passed through an epidemic of it, than he was before he put his theories to a practical test.

Embarrassed Christian, Brooklyn, N. Y. Three years ago I became engaged to a young lady who is a teacher in the Sunday School in which I have a class. For about a year past I have realized that the engagement was a mistake. I am not attracted by any one else, but I have ceased to love her and I am not happy in her society. Ought I to break the engagement or abide by my promise?

You are in a painful position and need to exercise extreme care and delicacy. A perfectly frank talk with the lady may relieve you of your embarrassment. There must be some reason for the change in your feelings, unless your engagement was made before you knew her well. Perhaps the cause of the change may be removed by an explanation. Certainly it would be folly to marry her if you have ceased to love her. Better for both of you to separate now than to enter on a loveless marriage.

J. S. M., Wichita, Kans. 1. Why did Christ tell Mary not to touch him when he appeared to her after the resurrection? 2. Can a Christian know when he is sanctified?

1. The question has often been asked, and is not easy to answer. We can imagine, however, that Jesus wished Mary to understand that the old relations of familiar intercourse were changed. When he ascended to the Father there would be a close fellowship, but of a different kind from that which had subsisted in the past. Christ's body was a spiritual body after the resurrection, different from the fleshly body in which he had mingled with his friends. The same body, but spiritualized, and to be treated with reverence rather than with the freedom of ordinary association. 2. He may know it by his power to resist evil, by his growth in grace, by his humility and devotion to service. If he is proud and Pharisaical, he has good reason for doubting whether sanctification has even begun in his soul.

M. F., Walla Walla, Wash. How many soldiers all told are there in the United States army and navy, respectively?

In the army, there are in active service, under the Act of Congress of Feb. 2, 1901, a total enlisted strength, staff and line of 59,866, exclusive of the provisional force and the hospital corps. The Act referred to limits the army to 100,000. The total enlisted force of the navy is 28,644 men, exclusive of the marine corps.

L. P., Macon, Mo. Did the law of Moses provide that judges should be recompensed for service rendered in that capacity? How much were they to be paid?

The judges were chosen from among the patriarchal seniors for their moral fitness. (See Ex. 18: 14-24; Josh. 4: 2-4; and 22: 14, and 24: 1). They were invested with princely and almost royal dignity, and being usually chiefs of their tribe or house, they were doubtless already wealthy. The office of judge was one of honor rather than emolument, and often came as a reward for special service to the tribe or nation. It was akin to the position of Emir among the Arabians, or Khan among the Persian Tartars. The judge was usually assisted in his duties by the chiefs of families and other subordinates who formed his council, in matters of State policy, and aided in carrying out his decisions in civil and criminal cases. The office of judge was held during life, but was not hereditary. The judge could enforce, but not enact laws. There was no income attached to the office, nor any appropriation for expenses, but it is probable that the incumbent was generally allotted a large share in spoils of war, or in tribute coming as gifts to the tribe or nation (see Judges 8: 24). Moses in his long farewell exhortation to the Israelites (see Deuteronomy), which Josephus gives very fully, enumerates the functions of the judges, but makes no mention of salary being attached to the office.

R. L. C., Hominy Creek, N. C. 1. Is the belief that Jesus is the Son of God all that is necessary at the beginning of a religious life? 2. Is the Holy Spirit given at conversion or at a later period in the converted person's life?

1. No, it is not all that is necessary. Many persons believe it without entering on a religious life. If a man starts with that belief and proceeds to the logical inferences from it and acts upon them, it may be the beginning. Thus: Christ, being the Son of God, must have had a purpose in coming into the world and suffering and dying; that purpose was to save sinners; I am a sinner in need of salva-would be better than settling on your own plan for getting relief and asking him to bless that. He may influence the person's mind as you wish, or he may send deliverance through another channel, or he may see that it is best for you not to have the money at all. The best way is to put your difficulty in God's hands and trust him to deal with it as he will.

Reader, Brooklyn, N. Y. 1. Viewed from a spiritual standpoint alone, is the world growing better? 2. I understood a preacher to state in his sermon "there is not a heathen temple in all Europe." Is this true?

1. See answer to John L., Dallas, Tex., in July 26 "Mail-Bag." 2. Turkey in Europe is filled with the temples and shrines of the Mohammedan faith, which, though recognizing God, is yet practically heathen in form and teaching.

E. W. P., Salem, Ore. We do not believe that undraped figures are necessarily "high art." The finest productions of the greatest masters in painting and sculpture are, almost without exception, artistically draped and are pure and chaste in sentiment. There is a class of art, it is true, which takes the opposite view, but it violates good taste and social convention by dragging into public gaze that doubtless a convenience to many, those who buy for cash, or "do without," are the better off.

Workingman, Kansas City, Mo. Why do ministers flatter the rich in these days, instead of condemning them as Christ did?

Christ did not condemn the rich. He said their riches made it hard for them to enter the kingdom, and he warned them not to trust in riches. When he bade the rich young ruler sell all he had and give to the poor, he was merely showing a man who thought himself perfect that there was a defect in his character. He wanted him to see that there were things he valued more than his salvation. Ministers of the Gospel have no authority to condemn the rich on account of their riches, but they are justified in condemning them if they do not make a proper use of their wealth. It is character, not possessions, which determines a man's standing before God.

Jessie D., Rahway, N. J. What do the words "shan," "chen" and "cheng," which we read in the foreign dispatches, mean?

"Shan" is hill or mountain; "chen," a market, and "cheng," a town. "Hien" means town of the third rank; "chan," one of the second rank, and "fu," one of the first or highest rank.

Inquirer, Pittsfield, Mass. Does the prohibition of adding to or taking from in Rev. 22: 18 apply to that particular book or to the whole Bible? If so, have not the revisers disregarded it?

It applies to the book of Revelation, as shown by the reference to the plagues. It would not be likely to apply to the whole Bible, because it is improbable that all the Bible was completed at the time that verse was written. The Epistle to the Hebrews and the Gospel of John are two books that give evidence of a later date. Any one who tampered with any part of the Bible would, however, incur an awful responsibility. The revisers are not affected by the prohibition which did not apply to a translation. The revisers did good service in trying to render the original more accurately into English.

Dr. D. M. Gillespie, Clay Centre, Kan. writes:

In your "Mail-Bag" of July 6, I notice what you call an "unique suggestion," from C. O. C., Binghamton, N. Y., in which he proposes the raising of funds for the purpose of providing homes for the poor. The idea is not altogether new. The Christian Co-operative Association has this as one of its main objects; but it will aim to keep in possession the ownership of all real estate, charging the users a nominal rental for same, to be used in providing homes for others; as most people given a home or other property, would be unable to hold it, being inexperienced in the battle of life. This society also has a beneficiary feature, by which it will aim to assist those in need.

The Late Asa W. Twitchell

Asa W. Twitchell, the well-known artist, passed from this life on April 27, 1904. Mr. Twitchell was born at Swaney, N. H., but for over fifty years made his home in Hartsfield, near Albany, N. Y. The artist's work consisted mainly in portrait painting, in which he was most skillful. One of Mr. Twitchell's pictures entitled "Moses," won him much distinction, a reproduction of this was published in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD 50 years ago. The artist was an honorary member of the National Academy of Design, and exhibited many pictures in New York. Mr. Twitchell was most conscientious worker, as may be gathered from a remark of his, in speaking of portrait painting, "A portrait should give the person who looks at it an idea of the most prominent traits in character of the subject, to accomplish this is a light task. Few understand how the artist has to work with his brain before he can interpret characteristics of a person, as they are expressed by his features." Mr. Twitchell was a man of Christian character, and much beloved for his gentlemanly and pleasant personality.

tion; I will place my case in his hands. 2. The Holy Spirit convicts of sin and leads men to conversion. But that is not all he does. After conversion he sanctifies and leads men into the truth and to holiness of life. He also endows them for service. We gather from your letter that the gift to which you refer, is the latter. If so, it is received after conversion.

L. M., Ceryl, Nebr. Are lightning rods a sure protection against a stroke of lightning? Is it advisable to rod our buildings?

Exposed buildings in the suburbs or the open country always should be protected by rods. Where they are shaded by tall trees, it is not so important, as the trees act as conductors. In nineteen cases out of twenty, properly placed rods will protect a building.

L. C. R., Toronto, Ont. I gained considerable light from your answer to a correspondent who asked about prayer for definite blessings. I would like your opinion about a special case. I need money for a certain proper purpose and am about to ask a person to advance it to me. Am I right in praying that God would influence his mind to accede to my request?

There can be no objection to your doing so. The spirit of our former answer to which you allude, would, however, rather lead you to lay your difficulty before God in prayer and ask that he would supply your need. This which properly belongs to the artist's studio or the life-class. There is no more reason why such art should be paraded in public than there would be for holding a medical clinic in public. Besides, to the young and untrained mind, there is a danger which it is our duty to guard against, and for their sakes, if for no other reason, all art that is in the smallest degree liable to suggest wrong ideas, or to excite abnormal feeling, should be excluded from public places, and from the home.

Reader, Newark, N. J. In some of the letters published in your recent interesting symposium on "The Problem of the Poor," the writers mention the "instalment plan" as one of the stumbling-blocks in the way of the honest poor. Do you so regard it?

While the instalment plan is certainly a great boon to many a one who cannot pay outright for his purchase, it is true that it is a heavy burden on the debtor. One who buys on instalments usually pays from 25 to 50 per cent. more than he would pay in cash. This is asked by the dealer to cover the risk of losses by fire, evasion of liability by buyers who change their places of residence, etc. In a large instalment business, such risks are considerable and must be taken into account, otherwise the dealer would lose heavily. While buying on the instalment plan is

WHEN A CEYLONESE GIRL WEDS

FROM A SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT

DURING the same year in which Martin Luther nailed up his theses to the church gate at Wittenberg, the Christian religion was introduced in Ceylon, "The Shining Land," through the landing of the Portuguese at Colombo. The Portuguese held more or less complete control of the coasts of Ceylon for one hundred and fifty three years. The chief results of their occupation may be found in the numerous Portuguese words incorporated into the native language, and more especially in the wide prevalence of Catholicism. Two hundred and forty-six years have elapsed since Ceylon came under Protestant rule, yet to-day there are more Roman Catholics than Protestants in the island.

After the Portuguese came the Dutch, who ruled the coast provinces one hundred and thirty-eight years, or until 1796. The Dutch were greedy for gain; but at the same time they were ardent Protestants, so they attempted to stamp out Catholicism, and to establish the Protestant faith, largely by force. A regulation prescribed that no native could hold office under the Government unless baptized into the Dutch Protestant church. The Hindu temples in some parts of the island were destroyed, and the people were forced to attend church at the point of the bayonet. This fact explains the existence of those immense stone church buildings, the remains of which are still seen here and there throughout the lowlands. In many places these old buildings have been repaired and are now used by missionaries.

Permanent advancement may be said to have begun with the English occupation of the island in 1796.

It is true that, under the religious freedom granted by the English, Hindu temples have been rebuilt and old-time customs re-established; but it has been a free contest between conservatism and progress, and the great advancement which has been made has all the marks of permanency.

In Jaffna, the northern district of Ceylon, the advance, though slow, shows encouraging signs of solidity. When the American missionaries arrived in 1816, but little had been accomplished, the English Wesleyans having arrived only two years earlier. Now there are many self-sustaining churches, with neat one-story houses of worship built by the people themselves, the pastors entirely supported by their congregations, and the general business of the church conducted without help from the missionaries. The benefits of the church are being extended to outlying districts through a home missionary organization. A foreign mission society, called the Student's Mission, has opened work in a needy district over in India. Educational interests have been developed, until there is now a network of schools over the district, ranging from the lowest grade, up through the high school to the B. A. course in Jaffna College. If the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD could see the loyal work done by the college boys in their Y. M. C. A., they would think with us that there was good hope for the future of Christianity in this part of Ceylon. Besides the American Mission, also the English Wesleyans and Church of England, are carrying on extensive and successful work. In their social and domestic life, the Ceylonese are still remarkably primitive. In agriculture and all that relates to the affairs of the household, the ancient usages still prevail. Ploughing and reaping are done after the manner of centuries ago, and the great variety of industrial occupations peculiar to the country have undergone little if any change in the passing generations.

Marriages in Ceylon are conducted after the manner that has been followed from time immemorial in Hindu lands. Betrothal is as binding as marriage itself. From the day a girl is betrothed she can no longer be seen with propriety by any man save her father and brothers.

The marriage ceremony is tedious. All the rights are performed in Sanscrit, which is recited by the officiating priest with great rapidity. The marriage is usually solemnized in the house of the bride's father. Thither the bridegroom proceeds, attended by his friends, and from thence conducts the bride to his home in a grand procession, usually by night, with torches and rejoicings. On both occasions considerable expenditure is incurred in feasting the friends and relatives, and in providing ornaments, music, processions, and illuminations. The wealthy spend freely, and the poorer classes often incur debts which burden them for many years.

Writing of marriage in India and Ceylon, Rev. E. Stoarow (a missionary), says: "In Ceylon, as in India, parents look out for suitable marriage alliances among their neighbors and friends; but since their opportunities for this and acquiring all necessary information are very limited, the services of the ghatiks (or matchmakers), are engaged—a class of women and men who make it their business to gather all the information possible of eligible brides and bridegrooms, keeping, in fact, a kind of registry office of all such cases for a whole neighborhood, for its convenience and their own profit. When the most eligible person on the list is selected, negotiations are commenced by the ghatik, and then by the fathers or some other members of the families, until all the tedious and intricate conditions as to time, ceremonies, and expense are settled, or the negotiations broken off. The actual marriage may be delayed for months, or even years."

WHAT WE OWE TO THE BIBLE

A Sermon by the Most Rev. Randall T. Davidson, Archbishop of Canterbury*

LET there be light. It is at once the motto and the condition of all progress that is worthy of the name. From chaos into order, from slumber into wakefulness, from torpor into the glow of life—yes, and “from strength to strength,” it has been a condition of progress that there should be light. God saw the light, that it was good. That surely is the thought which is ours to-day. We thank God for his revelation in the Bible, and specially to-day, with thousands who in other lands are gathered like ourselves, we are thanking him for this—that he is making these joint prayers and praises possible, and practical and intelligent by means of our having in our hands throughout the world, “every man in his own tongue wherein he was born,” the written record of the story of our Father’s love. That is our special thought this morning. Not the infinite marvel of the Gospel message; not the significance of the cradle at Bethlehem, and the uplifted Cross on Calvary, and the open grave, and the Pentecostal gift; but something more limited than that—the deliberate recollection and the thankful acknowledgment of what we owe to the written record—humanly compiled, but divinely ordered and guided—the record of that stupendous fact in the world’s story, and of the preparation, and the discipline, and the prayers which had gone before.

Divine in its Origin

It is just in proportion as the divinely ordered record has been known and read of all men—just in proportion as those on whom rested the responsibility of guidance have let it make its way and do its work, and bear its message straight to the heart of gentle and simple, of the learned and the ignorant, that its power has become patent, and that its fruitfulness for good—inexplicable otherwise—has proclaimed to every thoughtful observer the Divinity of its origin. And yet in the checked story of the Bible’s life, since first as a written Bible for the people’s use it was delivered and expounded to the listening crowds of men, and women, and children from Ezra’s pulpit of wood, “in the broad-place that was before the water-gate” at Jerusalem, at sunrise on a September day, 2,350 years ago—since first that happened it has again and again been true to say that men, consciously or unconsciously, have loved darkness rather than light, or, at least, that the light has shined in the darkness, and the darkness apprehended it not.

Go back in thought, and picture the scene enacted upon this very spot less than four hundred years ago, when on Shrove Sunday, 1527, a great platform was erected in the nave, whereon sat the high potentates of English Church and Realm. Opposite the platform, over the north door of the cathedral, was a great crucifix, a famous image, and at the foot of it, inside a rail a fire was burning, with a multitude of condemned books ranged around it in baskets, waiting for the flames. What were those books? They were the “Testaments” in English, the very translation of which forms the basis of that which we have read to-day.

The Burned Books

We are not met here now to pass judgment upon the opinions or the prejudices of other days and other men. They may have been as conscientious as our own. But at least we can thank God for the ampler light. The baskets were cast upon the flames, not because those who burned them wished to withhold from any man the Word of God, but because they honestly believed the form of these vernacular translations to be erroneous, or their circulation to be misleading, and, therefore, harmful. What stood in the way was darkness and prejudice, rather than any deliberate intention to mar the Divine purpose or to withhold the Divine message. Princes—our Sovereign himself had health allowed—princes and clergy and people meet to-day within these walls to thank God for the distribution to every nation under heaven of just such Bibles for the use of man and woman and child as those which so good Christians as Bishop Fisher and Sir Thomas More committed with solemn censure to the flames. By degrees the light spread, and “God saw that it was good.”

We are all, I imagine, persuaded in our minds that among the means of extending that light, the Bible itself has for centuries taken the foremost place. But with man’s proneness to distort or misuse even the grandest of God’s gifts, this very privilege has had a peril of its own. People have forgotten, in the using of it, the manner in which the book, under the guiding hand of God, came to take the form in which we know it now, and have neglected the help thus given to us for understanding how to use without abusing it, how to accept it as both human and Divine.

Some here will remember a notable sermon by one of the greatest preachers of our own or any age, in which he compares the double aspect of Holy Scripture, as the Word of God and the word of man, with the two aspects in which his contemporaries looked upon the earthly life of the Lord Jesus Christ himself—“The Word became flesh, and dwelt among us, and we beheld his glory.” But some taking the lower view asked, “Is not this the carpenter?” You may dwell on the human side; you may dwell on the Divine. Realize one of these alone, and you will fail to apprehend him aright. And the mystery of the Incarnation of the Son of God—the living Word—has its parallel in the mystery of the inspiration of the written Word of God.

The Bible is God’s Word. “As truly and as certainly as in Jesus Christ dwelt the fulness of the Godhead bodily, so truly and so certainly in the hearts of those who gave us this Book dwelt the Divine Spirit of God.” God, who speaks to us in the Bible, spoke first in the souls of those whom he stirred to give us these words.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY

Who is about to visit America

They are, therefore, their words as well as his. God was speaking through the lips of real men. “It was the tender thought, the glowing aspiration, the lofty hope, the trembling fear, the solemn awe, the stern indignation of men moved to the very depths of their nature by the power of God working in them, that shaped the words which live and burn in the pages of scripture to this very day, and which stir our hearts because they first stirred the hearts of those who uttered them.” It is because men, it is because teachers in the Church of God, have forgotten this, that half our perplexities about the Bible have arisen.

The Church has sometimes so insisted on the true Divinity of the written Word that she has almost forgotten its humanity. And hence men have trembled at reasonable, intelligent, reverent criticisms, which seemed to them profane, “instead of meeting them by the simple, straightforward admission that they are, in many cases, at any rate, quite valid, but that they only prove to us what we knew already, that this Word is truly human, and that, in spite of them, we hold it to be also truly Divine.”

Mistaken Inferences

“Let there be light.” No man, I suppose, will admit, probably no man ever did admit, even to himself, that in these matters it is daylight that he fears. But has it not been true, nevertheless, and true of many of the best and most devout souls, as the Christian centuries have run their course, that—albeit unintentionally or unawares—they were setting themselves, however, impotently, to thwart the Divine purpose. “Let there be light.” What else can we say of the persistency with which—untaught by past experience—the guardians and champions of orthodox belief as based on Holy Scripture have, times without number, on the authority of their own interpretation of the Bible, denounced as presumptuous or even blasphemous error, the discoveries and aims of scientific men?

It was on the strength of Biblical text that the scheme of Christopher Columbus was condemned the Spanish Junta in 1490 as vain and indefensible. 1616, Galileo’s teaching that the earth moves round the sun was formally censured by the consulting theologians of the Holy Office, “because expressly contrary Holy Scripture.” A generation or two afterwards English students were warned by high authority against the investigations of so true and profound a Christian thinker as Sir Isaac Newton as being “built on fallible phenomena, and advanced by many arbitrary presumptions against evident testimonies of Scripture.” A the lives of Roger Bacon, Copernicus, of Kepler, and many more, down even to our own day and to incidents fresh in the recollection of many of us, suggest to the thoughtful student of Holy Scripture the imperative need of a reverent and humble-minded caution in our attitude towards every controversy of the kind.

Religion and Science

We have been oftentimes reminded that it is only the foundation of God that remaineth sure, and on that foundation have been built also the irrefragable conclusions of science. We are not, indeed, required to accept at once every unproven hypothesis, or to mistake for absolute science mere assertions about that which is unknowable. Some of the votaries of science have had as little right to speak in its name as theologians speak authoritatively and finally in the name of God. True science and true religion are twin sisters, each studying her own sacred Book of God, and nothing but disaster can arise from the petulant scorn of the one or from the timidity or the tyrannies of the other. “Let there be light.” From the Father of light cometh every good and every perfect gift.

And as with the scientific knowledge which has been so strangely supposed to be contradictory to Scripture rightly used and rightly understood, so, too—must we not say it to-day?—so, too, with every reverent and honest investigation into the history and the character of the sacred volume itself. “Let there be light.” I wonder sometimes whether those who find themselves depressed or distraught because the investigations of modern students, as devout and honest as themselves, have suggested a re-setting of some of our traditional opinions about the dates and composition of the ancient Hebrew books of our Bible, and who feel such resting to be audacious, if not profane, have ever asked themselves quietly and with real deliberation, upon what authority it is that they base their firm beliefs to these questions of authorship and date—nay, as the contents and the limits of the Scriptural canon itself. Upon what authority, for example, do you draw the line which includes the Book of Ecclesiastes, Esther, and excludes the Book of Wisdom, or which includes the Second Epistle of St. Peter, and excludes the Epistles of St. Clement? I am not for a moment disputing the correctness of the line we draw. I believe it to be perfectly right. But who drew it? What is the authority upon which you rightly trust it.

New Light on the Bible

To ask ourselves such questions is helpful, I think as a reminder to us that upon some of the largest and deepest problems of date, or of authorship, or of what is called canonicity—in which we perhaps accept a particular theory as a matter of course, and are even shocked if it be challenged—we can hardly claim divine or infallible authority for the answer which, on the basis of our present knowledge, we rightly and even unhesitatingly give. As regards the Old Testament, we have had access in these latter days, under the overruling providence of God, to a wholly new range of facts about the dawn of civilization in the ancient nations of the world. Egypt and Assyria now vie with each other in their once undreamed-of contributions to the elucidation of our Sacred Book. And every fresh discovery every new disinterment of significant tablet or cylinder or inscription from its resting-place of literally the sands of years, seems, to me, at least, to do something more towards the strengthening and deepening of our belief in the genuine inspiration of the written Word of God, and in the distinctive glory of its divinely ordered message. We can give a new application to the Gospel sentence, “If they hear not Moses and the prophets, neither will they be persuaded, though one rose from the dead.”

“Let there be light.” If it be true, as one sometimes fears it is, that there is less of the deliberate, prayerful, devotional study of the Word of God in our homes and on our knees than there used to be in days gone by, is certainly true, I think, to say, that there never was time when so many people as now were bringing to the whole power of trained intelligence, and of cultured thoughtfulness to bear upon its every part. And this sustained effort cannot but be fruitful, cannot but react in its turn—and react healthfully for us and for our children—upon the other mode of Bible study, the

WORSHIPING BY THE SEA

OCEAN GROVE'S SUMMER PROGRAMME DRAWS
MULTITUDES TO THE GREAT RELIGIOUS RESORT

OCEAN GROVE, the beautiful "Mecca by the Sea," is this year crowded with a vast multitude of worshipers and more are constantly arriving. Bishop Fitzgerald preached a soul-searching sermon to a large audience at the opening service of the season, "Sanctify yourselves" being his theme. The summer programme is full of interest. Prof. Tali Essen Morgan, seeing the possibilities of making the Grove a leading musical resort, as well as encouraging the spiritual life, has within the last five years achieved a great success. He organized a permanent orchestra of sixty-five pieces, and a choir of from five hundred to eight thousand voices. Oratorios have been sung, as well as simple choruses, in which all the congregation have been able to join. The concerts are attended by a large audience.

On Sunday mornings, at an early hour, hundreds wend their way to Mr. Yatman's Young People's Meetings. On the outside of the Temple these words meet the eye:

And the hour shall be filled with music,
With songs, and praise, and prayer;
And the burdens of life be lifted
For all who enter there.

Over the great platform Mr. Yatman has placed these words in large letters:

Sow a thought, reap an act;
Sow an act, reap a habit;
Sow a habit, reap a character;
Sow a character, reap a destiny.

Thousands gather in the Auditorium to hear the new Bishop of the Methodist Church, preach. Luther Barton Wilson, D.D., is the youngest Bishop in the M. E. Church (he is forty-five years of age), and one of the most popular. He is a Baltimorean, but has been assigned to Chattanooga, Tenn., as his official residence. His text was from Matt. 12:12. He gave God's estimate of man. He paid an eloquent tribute to the heights of attainment to which man may come. He said: "I believe that Ocean Grove has a sane idea of what a man is worth, and is adapting itself to develop the best in man." He deplored the fact that the aged mother, or the old soldier—both worn in service—should have the question asked of them so often: "What are they worth?"

The "Beach Meetings" too, are attended by thousands. Dr. Ballard is in charge, and Rev. C. H. Yatman is usually one of the speakers. He told of a man who had emigrated to California, from the East, in order to make a living. He secured three acres of land, which he planted with cabbage. A friend came out to see him, and looking out upon these fields of cabbage heads said: "Why man, what are you doing?" He answered, "I am trying to make my living by raising cabbages." The other laughed, and told him: "Why, what do you mean? Do you know that you are in a gold country, and with little effort you could realize a fortune? Give me a spade"—and turning up a handful of earth, he showed gold-dust enough to pay for all the cabbages. Mr. Yatman said: "Harken, men, many of you are only bringing to perfection cabbage heads, while you ought to be digging in the mine of gold—even the blessed Word of God, and shaping your characters thereby."

One of the recent features was a patriotic oration of General O. O. Howard, which was prefaced by the reading of "The Declaration of Independence," by Dr. Fred. S. Shepherd, Principal of the Asbury Park Schools. Seats were reserved for the Grand Army of the Republic in front of the platform.

On July 22, 23, and 24, the Silver Jubilee of the National Temperance Society was celebrated. Among the speakers announced were Bishop Fitzgerald, Rev. D. S. Dodge, Rev. O. R. Miller, Rev. Hervey Wood, Rev. T. L. Poulson, and Rev. Dr. Locke.

The regular meetings at the Grove will occupy the days to come. Bishop Fitzgerald has charge of the Holiness Meeting, nine o'clock every morning. The Sunday School Assembly began July 5, and continued ten days. Rev. Dr. Munhall, of Philadelphia, has charge of the Sunday Afternoon Bible Class. Mrs. Skirno is at the head of the Primary Department. The oratorios of "Stabat Mater," "Elijah" and "Messiah," will be sung during the summer, with Professor Morgan as leader. A Musical Festival will be given by the children, Aug. 11, when a thousand children are expected to take part. The Temperance, Foreign, and Home Missionary Societies will hold their meetings in August. The ministers and laymen who will take part in the services at the Auditorium are Rev. R. I. Cooke, Governor Alexander, Bishop Bashford, Rev. Cortlandt Myers, Fred. I. Stanley, Secretary of the American Sabbath Union. A Bible Conference will be in session four days July 26, and the Spiritual Culture Society, August 15. August 19, the great Camp Meeting will begin, and will close August 28. Elim Cottage, a home for ministers and their families, is in a flourishing condition, under the new management of Mrs. Raymond. The Elim Association is composed of the leading ladies of Ocean Grove, Mrs. Rev. Alfred Cookman being President. Many a tired minister, missionary, and Christian worker, finds rest in this sheltered home by the sea.

The labors of the Ocean Grove Association have been blessed of God, and with grateful hearts we see his purpose in opening a resort where music in its influence, eloquence with its force, and above all spiritual power, may be brought in touch with the people, without the evil that is in the world.

mode which shapes itself in prayer. For this surely is unquestionable—he who sets himself in faith and hope to evoke from the Bible such secrets as it will disclose about the story of its structure and its growth, will find himself, so to speak, forced to his knees by the very divineness of the message of guidance and of revelation which it will impart to his inmost soul.

A Living Message

If there be, here and there, a "removing of those things that are shaken," it will be in order "that those things which cannot be shaken may remain." Bring to the study of God's Word every implement which you possess of intelligence and education to aid you in the task, but remember that what, after all, matters most, is that you should learn how God meant, through that life of other days, to speak to your own life now. It is in the truest sense a "revelation," an unveiling of some One who is now alive and near, and who has, every whit, as truly as in Bible times, a message for your daily life.

It is in order to make the learning of that supreme lesson, the realization of that Divine presence, more possible in the households of every land that the great society, for whose centenary we give thanks to-day, has applied itself single-heartedly to the task of placing within the reach of old and young the opportunity of possessing for themselves the written message of the Word of God. Various teachers will in different ways interpret that message, and from widely different standpoints will bring its lessons home. From every corner of the mission field—from every kindred and people and tongue—comes the grateful recognition of this elemental provision of the material or the weapon on which each Christian teacher must rely. As we trace the story of the Bible Society's successive conflicts for a hundred years with the giant obstacles of poverty and distance and language, we look upwards and outwards and onwards. We thank God and take courage. The object of it all is one—"That they might know Thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom Thou has sent."

I end with words spoken from this pulpit fourteen years ago, by the most eloquent, perhaps, of its countless occupants:—"As we drift—along the swift, relentless current of time—towards the end of life; as days, and weeks, and months, and years follow each other in breathless haste, and we reflect now and then for a moment that, at any rate for us, much of this earthly career has passed irrevocably; what are the interests, the thoughts, ay, the books, which really command our attention? what do we read and leave unread? what time do we give to the Bible?

The Incomparable Book

"No other book, let us be sure of it, can equally avail to prepare us for that which lies before us; for the unknown anxieties and sorrows which are sooner or later the portion of most men and women; for the gradual approach of death; for the passage into the unseen world; for the sight and sounds which then will burst upon us; for the period, be it long or short, of waiting and preparation; for the Throne and Face of the Eternal Judge. Looking back from that world, how shall we desire to have made the most of our best guide to it? 'O Lord Thy Word endureth for ever in heaven; Thy Truth also remaineth from one generation to another.'"

CHAPTER I

THE MARQUIS AND THE PEASANT

THE marquis stepped daintily through the narrow wicket door, walked a few yards, drew a short line in the ground with his cane, and waited. The man clambering up the rocky eminence toward the marquis carried a bit of white cloth in his hand, which he waved as he drew near.

There was a great contrast between the man and the marquis. The latter was dressed in the very height of a fashion that had passed. Nothing had been so thoroughly revolutionized by the revolution in France as the fashion. "Other times, other clothes," was a Republican maxim. The marquis and the man were cases in point. The man approaching was a tall, burly, rough-looking person, with a sinister cast of countenance which was not without some evidence of courage and force, although utterly devoid of any kind of breeding or of kindness.

He was clad in a coarse, ill-fitting, long-skirted uniform of blue and red, with white trousers and black gaiters. From a belt over his shoulder depended a formidable ship's cutlass. Another belt around his waist carried a brace of huge pistols. On his head, in place of a hat, he wore a kind of knitted cap, a Liberty Cap, it was called.

Peasant was writ large all over him—but peasant free! Unfortunately, his liberty had blossomed, as liberty often did, into excess. The marquis, who had been surveying him with a mixture of amusement and contempt, broke the silence.

"You can come nearer, Jean Garron," he said loftily. "There! Plant your feet on that line."

In spite of himself, the man moved forward to the place indicated.

"Yes, Monsieur le—" He recovered himself just in time. "Citizen Vaudémont," he said harshly.

"Pardon," said the marquis, "you will address me as you started out or our conference terminates immediately."

"The Republic," growled the man savagely, "has abolished all titles, cit—" "Not that!" interrupted the older man.

"Oh, as you will," answered the other, with affected carelessness; "there are none to hear anyway, and where no one knows there is no harm in breaking the law."

"That, doubtless, is a convenient code of conduct for Jean Garron; but you did not ask this parley to give me your views upon ethical questions I infer, and as I do not wish to hold any further conversation with you than is necessary, you would better state your business, if you have any, and retire."

The manner of the marquis was intensely aggravating. Swallowing his wrath as best he could, Garron began:

"Yonder are my forces. There are two hundred brave sansculottes, patriotic, liberty-loving citizens of the Republic—"

"I have observed those worthy citizens," interrupted the marquis caustically.

"I have received word from General Carteaux that Admiral St. Julien has sent me a battalion of marines, with a field-piece. I am a captain in the navy of the Republic, cit—Monsieur L'Amiral—"

"The Republic must be in desperate straits to make you a captain, monsieur."

"You can call me 'citizen,'" growled Garron; "'tis the order of the Republic."

"I shall call you anything I want, Garron," responded the marquis contemptuously. "You a captain! You on the quarter-deck! You are not fit to take charge of a cock-boat! You are just what you always were, an insubordinate, insolent, common sailor! I have not forgotten that I had you well flogged on Le Tonnant on our last cruise."

The marquis did not mince words. What he thought that he said, and his speech evidently was not agreeable to his auditor.

"No," cried the other fiercely, "and I have not forgotten it either! I'm going to see that you pay for it now!"

"I always strive to discharge my debts," replied the marquis equably, taking snuff as he spoke, "and my only regret is that my obligation to you is not heavier. I let you off too easily. Do not step over that line!" he added sharply.

"Why not, pray?"

"Well, really, I do not see that any explanation need be made you. My wish should suffice. But possibly There!" said the marquis pointing, "the sunlight fall upon it. Do you mark it?"

"A gun-barrel!"

"Yes."

"And behind it?"

"The best marksman in France."

"Brébœuf!"

"Just so. And he has orders to fire if you cross the line! You were never nearer death than at this moment, Jean Garron. Yes, you may well shrink back. 'Curses on you!' cried the man. 'I trusted to your honor.'"

"You did well. But if I had trusted to yours, Pouf!" The marquis smiled and made a little air gesture. "I know you, you see, Garron. Honor in France died with the king. God rest his soul!" said the old gentleman, lifting his hat. "Is the interview over?"

"Name of a dog, no! I have not said anything that I intended to say."

"Yet, my good Garron, you have talked not a little and you have occupied some time. The conversation is tiresome to me, and my time I would devote to other things to better advantage. Unless you have something to say of importance I will bid you a revoir."

"I have something important to say," answered Garron, "and I will say it bluntly. You have a granddaughter."

"I suppose," said the marquis reflectively, "that there is no way by which can prevent you from speaking about her. But I give you my word that if you had not trusted to my honor would run you through like the dog you are, for daring to mention her name."

"Talk," said Garron sapiently, "break no bones. I am here to say something, and say it I will!"

"Go on."

"I love your-granddaughter."

If the earth had suddenly opened beneath his feet the marquis would not have been more astonished.

"You!" he cried.

A thousand years of overwhelming overpowering, assured domination was packed into the monosyllable.

"Even I," answered Garron, boldly. "Why not? I am a man if I was born a peasant. I am a man if you did fling me at the gangway. The Republic—"

"Someone," interrupted the marquis in unconscious prophecy, "will blow that Republic of yours out of existence with a whiff of grapeshot some day."

"That may be. It stands firm enough at present. It will last my time, I fancy. It has made us all equal. Indeed, there be any favored citizens they are the patriots, who, like myself, have bared their breasts to the enemy for its defense."

The marquis laughed. He had recovered his imperturbability, and the situation even seemed humorous to him.

"You may laugh, monsieur," exclaimed Garron hotly, "but your fate is in my hands. You are an émigré who has returned to France. Sentence of death has been passed upon you and your whole brood. I stood by la mère guillotine when the young captain d Vaudémont had his head taken off. I dipped that rag in his blood," he cried, drawing forth a grimy ominously stained piece of cloth from his breast and throwing it at the old man's feet. "I have kept it to show you. 'Twas I who laid information against him."

"Brébœuf!" cried the marquis sharply, infuriated at this terrific exhibition.

There was a sudden movement of the gun-barrel through the loop-hole in the wall.

"Monsieur," cried Garron, "I trusted to your honor!"

"Do not try me too far!" said the marquis. "Say what you have to say and be gone!"

"'Tis this. You and that brat of a boy, your grandson, shall be beheaded, the woman I shall take for my wife when I have taken the tower. Now, I offer you and the boy and anybody else you may have within those walls, saving one, life, a boat on the shore in

"See!" Cried Garron, pointing down the Valley

I can serve my king and country better by allowing you to live and fill that position to which your talents have elevated you, than by having you killed."

"I don't understand," interrupted Garron.

"It is very simple. You can do more harm to the Republic in command of one of her ships than you can dead. Therefore, I again advise you not to step over that line."

"Why not? In two bounds I could be on you, and you would be nothing in my hands."

"Before you took those two bounds, however," continued the marquis suavely and imperturbably, "or, to be more accurate, between the first and second leap you would be dead."

"How?"

"Shot!"

"By you?"

"Cast your eyes to the right, Monsieur le Capitaine.

sheltered cove below here—your own boat, for I have taken St. Martin; he's feeding the fish now. You may go anywhere you will and I will honor the woman by marrying her. Otherwise—"

"Have you done?" asked the marquis quietly.

"Yes."

"Hear me, you dog. I would kill her with my own hands rather than see her fall into yours! As to taking the tower, you have tried for a week."

"Not with a field-piece, monsieur. See!" He pointed far down the valley to an opening in the mountains. A little cloud of dust hung over the wood. Through it the sunlight gleamed on spear-points and bayonets. "There they come! Be advised. Give me the woman. I will—"

"Brébœuf!" called the marquis in a loud voice, "I am going to count ten. If, when the count is completed this person is not half way down the hill I order you to fire."

"But—" began Garron.

"You have heard," said the marquis. "One!"

Garron hesitated, his face a picture of rage. He glanced from the marquis to that threatening gun-barrel.

"Two!" said the marquis.

The man shook his fist at the old gentleman and turned on his heel.

"Three!" said the marquis.

Garron started down the hill.

"Four!" said the marquis.

He quickened his pace.

"I said half way down the hill," cried the old man, counting five.

The rapid walk broke into a run. The marquis counted ten, but Garron had almost reached his camp before the number was completed.

The marquis picked up the bit of cloth at his feet, glanced contemptuously at the flying man, apprehensively at the approaching soldiery, and then quickly retraced his steps and re-entered the tower through the wicket gate.

CHAPTER II

THE SILENT BRÉBŒUF

THE Chateau de Bollène had been a famous stronghold five hundred years before. For centuries its barons had levied tribute on land and sea. The abrogation of the feudal privileges of the great provincial nobility had brought about the abandonment of the rude pile of stone upon the edge of the Mediterranean. It had been dismantled, and was, in 1793, little better than a ruin. Indeed the only portion of it left habitable and consequently defensible, was the low tower into which the marquis had just entered.

Within the tower, which was about twenty feet in diameter and circular in shape, there was a single large room, with a low, heavily beamed ceiling. The walls were pierced with loopholes on all sides. A dilapidated stone stairway led to a second story. On the roof there was a crumbling parapet in which an improvised flagstaff had been fixed for the temporary support of the white banner of France. There was no furniture of any sort in either the upper or lower room. The lower was dimly lighted from the loopholes and from the opening in the ceiling for the stairs. There were windows in the upper room, but the openings gaped as empty as the family fortune.

In the room there were three people. One of them was bending over his gun, which was still thrust through a loophole nearest the spot where the marquis had parleyed with Garron. This was an elderly man of gigantic build. He was dressed in the peculiar and distinctive costume of the Breton peasantry, save that he wore shoes instead of sabots. Out of deference to the other occupants he had removed his hat, and his long gray hair fell upon his broad shoulders. He neither turned, moved, nor spoke when the marquis entered. Bending slightly, the better to see through the narrow opening, he kept his eyes fixed on the enemy.

Musket in hand, at another loophole some distance from the man, stood a woman, tall, sturdy, powerful. She wore a small cap upon her head. Her short dress disclosed a pair of stout limbs and heavily shod feet. Her sleeves were rolled up and her naked arms looked almost strong enough to match those of a man. As the marquis entered she allowed the butt of her musket to drop on the stone floor, and turned to look at him.

In the middle of the room, also gun in hand, stood a second woman. She was not quite so tall as the other and was cast in a finer mold. In cut and fashion her dress was like that of her humbler sister although more elegant. In material it was much richer. From her appearance she might be eighteen years of age. She had by no means attained her full development. It was evident that she bade fair to become a tall and beautifully proportioned woman when she had reached her appointed stature. What she lacked in mere physical strength as compared with the other she made up in nervous force.

The older woman at the loophole was excited and trembling. The weapon in her hand shook with her agitation. The younger, in the centre of the room, was as calm and composed as the marquis himself. Indeed, in many ways she resembled her grandfather, although he was not so tall for a man as she bade fair to be for a woman. Waiting to be spoken to she said nothing; only the relief in her eyes, and their eager, questioning look proclaimed at once her satisfaction and her interest. The marquis glanced at her with natural pride. Then he turned.

"Watch your loophole, Aurore!" he said sharply.

"Yes, Monsieur le Marquis," she responded volubly, glad of a chance to speak. "I thank God, Monsieur le Marquis comes back alive from his interview with that méchant Garron."

"I was in no danger, my good Aurore," returned the marquis smiling, "so long as Brébœuf attended to his duty."

"Oh, the immaculate Brébœuf!" rattled on the maid, who, being her young mistress' foster-sister, was a privileged character. "He always attends to his duty."

"He does," retorted the marquis dryly. "Now do you attend to yours."

There was a shake of Brébœuf's broad shoulders, a sort of silent laugh, which showed that he at least appreciated the retort of his master. Abashed for the moment, Aurore lifted her gun and turned once more to her station.

"Mademoiselle," said the marquis, bowing low to his granddaughter—he was quite as courteous to the women of his household as to those of any other—"allow me."

As he spoke, he slipped off the laced coat with its blazonry of orders that he had worn, and laid it carefully in the portmanteau.

"The Republicans," he remarked lightly, "have abolished distinctions and decreed extinctions not only of the gentry but of the noble family of valets as well. Every man is his own lackey—"

"Let me, sir—" interrupted his granddaughter.

"By no means," said the marquis quickly. "I did but jest, Louise. I am a sailor, accustomed to wait upon myself—if I have to. If that were all the Republic had done for France we might forgive it."

As he spoke he donned the plain blue naval uniform with its red facings, exchanged his buckled shoes for a pair of serviceable boots, picked up his musket from the wall where he had rested it, and stood shorn of all his finery save his jeweled sword.

"Now," he remarked, "I am ready for them again. Were you alarmed, like Aurore, for my safety, my dear?"

"No, sir."

"Ah, then you trusted to the honor of Monsieur Garron?"

"No more than you did, sir; I trusted to your tact and courage."

"And Brébœuf's marksmanship."

"Of course," answered the girl, looking at the broad shoulders of the ancient servitor with a faint smile of approbation.

"Could you hear what was going on?"

"You gave me no permission, sir. I did not listen."

"That's well! Should you like to know what Garron wanted?"

"If it please you, sir," said the girl, inclining her head.

Again her grandfather looked upon her with pride and satisfaction. These were the manners he liked. The ancient deference of a child for father, or grandfather, the unquestioning obedience of youth for age, the respect of tender years for rank and position. The submission of femininity to manhood—already old-fashioned in France.

"My dear child," he said, "he came to offer terms."

"Terms, monsieur?"

"Yes. He will let us all go if we yield to him the woman whom he designs to make his wife."

"Give me leave, my lord," cried Aurore, who was keeping a better watch with her ears than her eyes, at the same time dropping her gun to the stone floor with a tremendous clatter and coming forward with arms akimbo, "I would do anything else for you, but marry Jean Garron I won't!"

"Not even to save me, woman?" asked the marquis quietly.

"Oh, as to that," said the other halting lamely, "well, I—I will agree to even that for you and mademoiselle. But leave me your pistols, Monsieur le Marquis, that I may kill him and myself in the bridal chamber."

"I will not have Aurore sacrificed to that brute, grandfather," interrupted Louise.

"Oh, mademoiselle, for you I—"

"Peace, woman!" said the marquis sternly. "Keep to your loophole! He does not want you!"

"Not me!" gasped the woman with her mouth open. "Who can it be—"

"'Tis mademoiselle," said the marquis suavely, "upon whom he deigns to bestow the honor of his name."

"Impossible!" cried the girl.

"It is even so."

"Why didn't you kill him where he stood?"

"I was inclined to do so, but he was under the safeguard of my honor. One must keep faith even with these assassins."

"Monsieur!" called out a boyish voice from the roof above; "a body of men in uniform have joined the camp. There are horses among them. The sunlight shines upon a cannon."

"You keep good watch, Honoré," returned the marquis raising his voice. "Garron told me he expected a field-piece. It has come. Report to me anything further that you may see. Do not expose yourself needlessly."

"Very well, sir, I shall be careful," replied the young count.

"Poor boy!" said the marquis softly. "Do you see anything, Brébœuf?"

The old man was chary of words? He turned his head and nodded.

"Has the boy seen correctly?"

Another nod.

"Go you to him above. Watch with him there. You served me faithfully a moment since," he added, as the man withdrew his gun and marched toward the stairway, saluting his master as he passed him. "But then you have served me faithfully all your life. I suppose your fingers itched to pull the trigger?"

Brébœuf, nodding a third time, mounted the stair.

"Well, some day, please God, you may have a chance at that dastard," continued the marquis.

"Grandfather," said the girl, "if they have a cannon they can batter down this crumbling old tower. You said yourself after the attack of yesterday, that if they had a heavy gun we could no longer defend the place."

Another man would have dissembled to another woman. Not so the marquis. Gentle blood in France had faced too many appalling dangers in the recent past to quail at the thought of another, however imminent and terrible.

"You are right, my child. If they put a field-piece on that hill just out of range of our muskets they can knock the tower to pieces."

"And then?"

"Then we can die as become nobles of France, servants of our king."

"Oh, if Captain St. Martin were only here! He swore he would be here with a boat. We have come across the width of France from Paris through every danger without mishap, thinking to find a boat to take us to Italy, to Austria, anywhere, to safety, only to be trapped at last! Has Captain St. Martin proved a traitor?"

"My dear child," said the marquis quietly, "he has proved his fidelity with his life. Garron learned of the plan some way. He seized our friend, killed him, scuttled the boat, or at all events made off with it, and, voilà! here we are."

"Is there no escape?"

"None."

"What did you say to Garron's proposition, monsieur?"

"I gave him just ten seconds to get down that hill," answered the old man grimly. "You should have seen him run!"

"Monsieur," said the young woman earnestly, coming closer and laying her hand on his shoulder, "you are one of the great nobles of France. A vice-admiral in her navy, a man of experience, ability and courage. You bear a great name and have a rank and position upon which to rally adherents to the support of our boy king, Louis XVII. I am only a girl. My life is of value to no one. I will go to this Jean Garron. I will agree to his terms. I will consent to be his wife. What said Aurore? Our marriage day shall witness his death and mine."

"Oh, mademoiselle!" cried her foster-sister deprecatingly.

"Not even for France, my dear child, would I consent to that," said the marquis. "I despair of the land we love. The people have gone mad. I am an old man. There is but little I can do. If I could not attend my king to the scaffold, at least a death here will not be unfitting. What is there to live for?"

"Another king; a king dies but royalty lives. The land changes masters, but it is still France. For you, and for France, I will go to Jean Garron and—"

"Louise," said the old man drawing from his breast the blood-stained piece of cloth, "you cannot even pretend with him. This man is immediately responsible for the death of my son. To sate his inveterate hatred of the family, he dipped this in the blood of your murdered father at the guillotine."

"Alas! my father!" cried the young comtesse, shrinking away from the greswome object in the old man's hand.

"You see it is impossible."

The girl hid her face in her hands and shuddered. Aurore burst into sobs where she stood.

"Come, my child, no more of this," said the old man tenderly. "There is nothing else to be done. We must face death as we have faced life, with smiling countenances."

CHAPTER III.

THE COMTESSE TAKES COMMAND

GRANDFATHER," cried the boy from the room above, "they are running the gun over to the hill nearest the tower."

"I suppose so," said the marquis, stepping over to the loophole and glancing hastily through it.

As he spoke, there came faintly into the room a muffled roar. An instant after the sound was followed by the crash of a heavy shot against the upper wall of the tower, which fairly shook the place.

"A heavy gun!" exclaimed the old man coolly.

Aurore screamed, but the comtesse said nothing. There was a rain of stone upon the floor from the impact of the shot.

"Brébœuf!" called the marquis sharply, "come down you, and the comte, at once!"

"Can we do nothing at all, sir?" asked Honoré.

"At present, nothing but wait. Have all the pieces charged, and if the rascals make a practicable breach in the walls, and any of us survive the process, we can give them a warm reception when they attempt to storm the tower!"

While the guns were being reloaded by the careful Brébœuf, by the direction of the marquis, the two men retreated to a position where the stone stairway which happened to rise on the side which was receiving the battering, gave them some additional protection, where, indeed, save for the flying pieces of stone, they were reasonably safe until the inevitable attack was delivered. Brébœuf and the marquis stood withdrawn from the probable line of fire, but at the loopholes, whence they could see what was going on and be in a position to fire should the enemy approach within range of their small arms. By his grandfather's side young Honoré took his post.

For a time no one said anything. The siege gun was served with accuracy and rapidity. The battering on the tower wall was practically continuous. It was a terrific strain for the inmates to remain in quiet inaction and see their only bulwark of defense battered to pieces. But there was nothing else to do. The way they severally bore it was in consonance with their characters and dispositions. Brébœuf stood resting upon his musket, with a gloomy, saturnine countenance, expressing nothing. Aurore sank down on the stairs and whimpered piteously. The boy was quivering with excitement. The old marquis was as composed as if he were attending a levee at Versailles or St. Germain. Once he took out his snuff-box from his pocket, elaborately helped himself, stepped over to his grandson and offered him a pinch with a profound bow. He had noticed the youngster's emotion, and the simple action reassured and strengthened the boy, and he emulated his grandfather by taking a pinch. To take a pinch of snuff gracefully under any circumstances was a part of the marquis' religion, and he narrowly watched the comte to see how he acquitted himself. He smiled with approval when he found that his grandson did it extremely well, with a manner exactly like his own.

Then the marquis, with unheard-of condescension, turned and offered the snuff-box to Brébœuf. The old seaman started back in surprise, waving his hand deprecatingly.

"We live," said the marquis, "in the days of the Republic, my good Brébœuf. All men, so our friend Garron informs us, are created equal. There are no longer gentle and simple in the world outside. They all belong to the aristocracy. Inside let us be of the fashion. If fidelity and long service are forgotten, and loyalty is an unregarded virtue in France, I, at least, am not unmindful. Brébœuf, will you honor me?"

With a gleam of pride on his craggy countenance, Brébœuf thrust a huge forefinger and thumb in the dainty box, helped himself to a generous pinch with a gesture singularly like that of the marquis, bowed before him, straightened himself up, struck the barrel of his gun with his hand and resumed his watch.

"Grandfather," said Louise, "will it be long?"

"Not long, my child. See! The wall is already crumbling. A few more shots like that last and we are open to the enemy."

There was a silence in the room for a space, and then the voice of the girl broke it.

"We have no priest. Would you consider it impertinent, sir, if I said a word of prayer?"

"Prayer always becomes the nobles of France," said the old man gravely, removing his hat, while the voice of his granddaughter uttered the prayer. Before it was completed, however, a final and well-placed shot striking the weakened and shattered wall at exactly the right spot, tore out a large section of it. Bits of stone and mortar almost as hard flew in all directions throughout the place. One of them struck the marquis on the forehead, hurling him to the floor. Enough of the wall had fallen to afford an easy entrance into the room. With a cry the girl went to the side of the old man.

"They are coming!" cried Honoré, who had run to the nearest loophole without noticing his grandfather's condition.

Brébœuf looked uncertainly at the young girl. The marquis was senseless. Naturally the leadership fell to her. She rose to the emergency in an instant.

"They will fire no more with the cannon," she cried. "We will go to the upper room. Brébœuf, do you carry your master. Come, Honoré. Come, Aurore."

Lifting the old man tenderly, the seaman bore him up the shattered stairs. The upper room was a ruin. Large sections of the wall had been knocked to pieces. The roof gaped to the skies. By some lucky chance, however, the parapet from which the flag fluttered, yet remained intact. Heaps of debris on the floor gave convenient concealment to the men, the boy and the two women. Gently laying down his burden, Brébœuf knelt behind the natural barricade, musket in hand.

"The marquis!" cried the girl, who had been the last to come up. "Is he dead?"

Brébœuf shook his head.

"They are coming, Louise! They are coming!" cried Honoré.

After a momentary glance the girl dropped to her knees by the side of the sailor. If her grandfather was dead he was spared assassination. If he were yet alive there would be time to succor him. Meanwhile she had one life at least left in her gun. Another in the weapon at her waist.

The Republicans were scampering rapidly over the intervening ground toward the tower, brandishing their weapons, and filling the air with their cries. In the lead was Jean Garron, who, to do him justice, was no coward. As he came within range Brébœuf took careful aim at him. Fate was kind to the Republican leader. Just as the Breton pressed the trigger, Garron stumbled and fell. The man immediately in his rear pitched forward dead.

"You got them both, Brébœuf!" screamed Honoré, wild with excitement.

The old man shook his head.

"Missed!" he growled.

He had seen Garron scramble to his feet. He snatched a musket from Aurore and fired again. Another man fell. Now Comte Honoré's piece cracked. Less skilful than Brébœuf he only struck his man in the arm. The old sailor stepped back and took the marquis' gun. As he did so, Louise pressed the trigger of her musket. Before Brébœuf could fire a third time, however, the roar of a heavy cannon from seaward burst in their ears through the torrent of shouts and cries and crackling musketry.

Two men were struck dead by an eighteen-pound shot, that came tearing through the huddled men now close by the tower. Before the Republicans could recover from their consternation at this extraordinary intervention, the first shot was followed by a second, a third, a fourth. The last one dismounted the field-piece. The ranks of the assailants halted in confusion, and at this opportune moment Brébœuf discharged his last musket-shot into the hesitant men, snatched the pistol from Aurore's belt, fired it, received another from the hand of the young comtesse, and with it counted for still another enemy.

By this time the Republicans were in full retreat. The besieged scarcely realized what had happened. That they were safe for the time being was all they knew. So soon as the assailants retreated, the girl fell on her knees by the side of her grandfather. She wiped the blood from his face. Aurore bravely ran to the room below for some water, and soon the old man opened his eyes. Another shot boomed out from seaward.

"A ship's gun!" murmured the marquis. "A heavy piece."

"A ship, a ship!" shouted Honoré, who had run to the other side of the tower and was gazing out to sea.

"What ship?" asked the old marquis faintly.

"An English ship by the flag, sir. Boats are putting off from her."

"We are safe," said the old man; "yet I had rather it were any other than an English ship. I do not love the English. What of Garron and his mob?"

"They are running down to the river bank, below the tower," cried Honoré. "Boats are pulling for the shore," he continued, turning his gaze to seaward again. "The men are landing. They are fighting! They run!"

"Who run?" asked the marquis.

"The Republicans."

Brébœuf had been busy charging the weapons. He fired them in rapid succession at the enemy. One final shot gave him especial satisfaction.

"Winged!" he cried, in hoarse triumph.

"The English are mounting the cliff toward the tower," cried Honoré, who was recklessly exposing himself that he might see the action. At the same instant there was a battering on the door below.

"I will go down and admit them," said the comtesse, "Honoré, do you and Brébœuf stay here and protect me with your guns. Come, Aurore," continued the girl springing down the stair.

CHAPTER IV.

THE CAPTAIN OF THE SHIP

HAD the wind been other than it was the ship would have been perilously near the land. The weather, however, was settled, a steady land breeze was blowing, there were no shoals to be feared, the water was deep under the cliffs, and there was always a chance for an exchange of shot with a French battery or an opportunity to turn loose a broadside upon some Republican camp. Consequently they hugged the shore.

That portion of the Mediterranean littoral along which they had been running since they left Naples was peculiarly gloomy, forbidding and desolate. Back of the shore line rose the summits of the towering mountains? No evidences of habitations were visible save here and there a few wretched fishermen's huts in some sequestered cove near the water's edge.

The coast to starboard and before them trended sharply to the southward in the shape of a long, rock tongue of land, about half a mile ahead of the ship. This promontory shut off the view in the direction of their present course. The handsome ship-of-the-line under easy sail was slowly drawing nearer to it. The time had about arrived when a touch of the helm and a pull of the braces would be necessary to swing her head away from the present course, so that they could give the cape a wide berth as they passed by it to discover what lay beyond.

The quiet of the morning was broken by the muffled report of a cannon. The noise instantly awakened every man on the ship to alert attention. The seamen in the gangways and on the fore-castle crowded to the weather side of the ship, looking eagerly in the direction of the sound. The desultory conversation among the officers on the quarter-deck stopped; one or two ran for glasses, and the others approached nearer to the windward side, a place reserved by immemorial custom for the officer of the watch, as they stared and stared toward the shore.

Above them all the little captain, who had been leaning listlessly against the rail, suddenly straightened up, and walked rapidly to the break of the poop. He surveyed his ship for an instant, a flush of pride mantling his cheek. He had said that the Agamemnon, although not a new ship, was the finest sixty-four in the service, and certainly he was a judge.

At first glance the little officer looked like anything but the captain of the ship. He was about five feet five inches in stature, and his fragile, delicate habit of body made him seem even smaller than he was. This not to say emaciated, with a pallor in his face, his appearance gave no promise whatever of bodily vigor.

He had taken off his hat a moment before and passed his hand across his brow. Had anyone been near to observe he would have seen a great mass of dark hair, a careless "shock" his friends called it, pushed back from a noble forehead. His eyes were deep set and hollow. They were changeable eyes, sometimes so melancholy, appealing, almost feminine; again hard, cold, brilliant, almost terrible. His thin but youthful face, unhealthily pale, was somewhat marked with lines, whether of suffering or of decision a casual inspection could scarcely determine. His nose was slightly aquiline and decidedly strong. His lips were full and pouting and subject to the same change as his eyes. Sometimes they entreated, as those of a child might have done; at other times, they straightened and contracted under pressure into a thin, rigid, resolute line. There was not much humor or merriment in the face, which was, nevertheless, appealing and strangely attractive.

There was something womanish about the appearance of the whole man. That he was variable, changeable, whimsical, a shrewd student of physiognomy would have instantly divined. That he was vain, in harmless, innocent way, and therefore susceptible to flattery, was apparent.

Only the eye of keen intuition or wide experience could read beneath all these things another man. When the exigency demanded, the frail and feeble body became suddenly able to sustain fatigues and endure nervous strains that might have crushed a giant. The gentle, vehement, half feminine, sensitive nature took upon itself characteristics at once of brawny fury and Viking courage, and the variable, hesitating habit gave place to a determination as persistent as was invincible. In the crisis of danger he became cool in his fighting as if he had never heard of nerves.

A creature of contrasts, he, with his womanish eyes, his child's lips and his lion heart, the captain of the Agamemnon looked no hero, though no man could better claim the title. He seemed no heaven-born commander, although no one now questions his right to the highest place. But no Viking that ever lorded it over the narrow seas had more of the real man in him than the little captain of the Agamemnon, standing upon her deck that sunny morning surveying his ship. For this was the greatest man of his class that the world had ever seen.

Bible Training in Canada

THE BIBLE TRAINING SCHOOL, TORONTO

REV. JOHN MC NICOL, B.D.

REV. WM. STEWART, D.D., PRINCIPAL

THE past fifteen years have witnessed a greatly revived interest in Bible study. Not only has the Word of God been introduced as a textbook in many colleges, but special schools have been established for training young men and women in the knowledge and use of the English Bible. One of the most successful of these is the Toronto Bible Training school, which was opened ten years ago with an enrolment of twelve students.

Since the opening of the school, an abundant blessing has continued to attend the work, and certainly the results are such as to call forth devout gratitude to God. During these ten years, 376 different students have been enrolled in the Day Classes, and 1,120 in the Evening Classes. Already more than 140 have gone forth to definite fields of labor. This is exclusive of very large numbers who are engaged in Sunday schools, Missions, and other branches of church work in their own localities. Sixty-five have gone to the foreign field under ten different missionary societies; twenty-six have entered the Christian ministry in Canada, the United States and England; eight have been working among the aborigines of the Dominion; seven became Secretaries of Young Men's Christian Associations; while several others are now employed as Pastor's Assistants, Catechists, Bible Women, City Missionaries, and in similar departments of Christian and philanthropic work. Foreign missionaries have come from the school to China, India, Japan, Jamaica, East Africa, Nigeria, Palestine and South America.

In the day classes the full course of study extends over two years. The instruction is Biblical and practical, and has as its special aim these three great ends: A consecrated Christian life, an adequate knowledge of the Word of God, and effective use of Holy Scripture in Christian service. The following subjects are carefully and systematically presented and studied: Outlines of the Books of the Bible, Scripture Doctrines, Christian Evidences, Inspiration and Canon of Scripture, Old and New Testament Exegesis, including the careful study of certain books and passages, preparation of Gospel Sermons and Addresses. New Testament Greek is taught to those who can profit by the study. Instruction is also provided in vocal music and the elements of medicine. Lectures on methods of Christian work are given by missionaries, pastors, professors, Sunday School specialists, evangelists, and other successful Christian Workers.

The students do a large amount of evangelistic and city mission work during the session. Several places outside Toronto have been supplied with preaching, and on some of the fields gracious revivals have been experienced, resulting in large additions to the membership of the churches. During the last session an evangelistic band was formed by a number of the young men, who conducted successful services in different churches of the city and neighborhood.

The School was organized in 1894, and incorporated in 1898, when a new building on College Street, admirably adapted for its purpose, was opened free from debt.

Its evangelical and interdenominational character has been prominent from the beginning. On the board of Incorporation, the General Council, and among the officers, instructors, examiners and students are representatives of ten different Christian denominations, and yet all have been "one in Christ Jesus," and have worked together throughout in perfect harmony. The school is not intended to be a rival to any theological seminary, but is designed for those who have been called of God to Christian service, and who, from age or other reason, cannot pursue a full collegiate and theological course of study.

Members of any evangelical church who have a real desire for Christian work are welcomed as students. They must come recommended by their pastors, churches, or other responsible persons, as possessing an approved Christian character and giving promise of usefulness in the Lord's service. They must have acquired a fair English education, although in special cases instruction is provided for those who are deficient in the ordinary branches. Tuition is free, only a small fee being charged for incidental expenses. Students can obtain board in Christian homes at from three dollars a week upward, and there is also an outlay of three to five dollars for books. The school is maintained at a cost of about $4,000 a year. In providing this amount the officers of the school trust that many of God's people will be prompted to have fellowship with them. The next session will open on Tuesday, September 20, 1904, and continue till the end of April, 1905. All correspondence about entering the school may be sent to the Principal, Rev. Dr. Stewart, 110 College Street, Toronto, Canada.

FIFTY BEAUTIFUL YEARS

HOW MR. AND MRS. STEPHEN MERRITT CELEBRATED THEIR GOLDEN WEDDING

ON June 7, 1854, Stephen Merritt and Miss Mary Eliza Shinnstone were married in the old Bedford Street Methodist church. The young couple took passage up the Hudson, on their bridal trip, to Albany, on the steamer Isaac Newton. The boat was new, and Mr. and Mrs. Merritt were the first couple to occupy the bridal stateroom. From Albany they went to Saratoga, and after visiting a relative in another town, they returned to New York, for," said Mrs. Merritt, in speaking of this bridal trip of so many years ago, "you know we could not stay away from New York too long, as Stephen must get back to Class Meeting, he being the leader." And the good lady smiled, proudly and fondly, at the recollection of the fact that not even a bridal trip could take precedence over her young husband's religious duties.

"Now tell me, Mrs. Merritt," said the representative of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, "all about this second bridal trip—this golden wedding journey. Did you go over the same round, stop at the same places, as on the first trip?" "Pretty nearly," she replied. "Of course, we couldn't go in the same boat. The Newton would be very antiquated now, if it were in existence, but it was the pride of the Hudson then. We were a little undecided how to celebrate our golden anniversary. Our house would not begin to accommodate our friends, and we did not want to leave any out; so we decided to go on a golden wedding journey, and it was rather a curious coincidence that we should take passage on a new steamer, the C. W. Morse, and be the first couple to occupy the bridal stateroom, as was the case on our original trip. We intended to go over the same ground, but changed our plans somewhat, on account of a dear little grandson, who is at school in Williamstown, Mass. The little fellow sent us a letter, in which he said, 'You and dear grandmother were married a long time ago. I think fifty years ago. . . . I found Saratoga Springs on the map. It is not very far from Williamstown. Come down and see me and my goat before you go back home.' Could a grandfather and grandmother refuse such an invitation as that, specially when the dear little boy sent us in the same letter fifty hugs and fifty kisses? So our way diverged from that of fifty years ago, and we had a most delightful visit to the school after leaving Saratoga. The old hotel at that place, where we stopped at first, was gone; but we stayed at one as near the original spot as we could.

"We've had delightful letters of congratulation from our friends, and many beautiful remembrances. One son-in-law said that the bride always got all the presents, so he gave the groom this beautiful carved chair, Stephen and I are a pretty good-sized couple, but I guess we could both sit in that chair at once. I'm going to make a handsome cushion for the seat," she added, smiling. "One of the loveliest remembrances of the day was a bunch of magnificent roses, fifty of them, accompanied by a sentiment which is most lovely; there was no name, but I found out who it was that sent the gift. The note read:

To Stephen and Mary Merritt, June 7, 1904.
Fifty roses, not half as beautiful as the years they typify; years full of sharing and forbearing; years full of love, kindness and tenderness, each to the other, and to both from God! May the fragrance of these blessed years, sweeter far than the scent of these roses, permeate and pervade the many years which we all hope are yet in store for you. This is the earnest wish of many sincere friends, and among them
THE WRITER.

"We sent the roses to a hospital in Albany," continued Mrs. Merritt, "because we had so much love and blessing that we felt we must share it with others, and I thought how much comfort those lovely blossoms would bring to the sick.

A dear friend sent a purse of shining gold half eagles, and I know you will admire this pin, which one of my daughters gave me."

The writer was shown a pin of amethyst and pearls, a combination of jewels that seemed especially appropriate for the wearer, with her snowy hair and soft blue eyes.

The ladies of the Five Points Mission sent a beautiful palm, indicative of the green spot held in their hearts for their good friends.

Nothing could better express the beauty of the fifty years which Stephen Merritt and his wife have spent together than an extract from a granddaughter's letter, written from college:

"To think," she writes, "that the day has come which sees my dear grandmother and grandfather married fifty years! Could anything be lovelier than such a long life together?"

I was telling one of the girls about you two—your great love for each other—how dear and noble you both were, and how vigorous and active, and she said: 'Oh, Mollie, no wonder yours is such a happy family, if you've had such a spectacle of love and happiness before you all.' And that's what I think. You have given us something we shall never lose, an appreciation of things we could not otherwise have had, but for growing up with two such loving grandparents near us. . . . No one ever had such a beautiful, sweet and young seventy-one year old grandmother, nor such a funny, vigorous, adorable grandfather."

Mr. and Mrs. Merritt live, where they have made their home for many years, in the pretty village of Nyack-on-the-Hudson, and where they are universally loved and respected, and where all echo the wish that they may live to celebrate their diamond anniversary.

For many years the Rev. Stephen Merritt and his Christian work, as preacher and philanthropist, have been well known to the readers of this journal. His name, among thousands of the poor of New York, is a familiar one, and his ceaseless efforts, through a long lifetime in behalf of the unemployed and neglected men and boys of the metropolis, are widely known. By his activity in every form of religious work, his earnest preaching of the Gospel and his abounding charity, he has become endeared to multitudes throughout the land.

Hands Off the Temple!

FROM a press dispatch to a New York journal, we learn that a novel and ingenious plan has been devised by the minister of a church in a Western city, to solve the problem of obtaining money for church purposes. The church was in need of renovation, and the requisite funds were not available. The minister, doubtless impressed with the enterprise of the merchants and manufacturers of the neighborhood, offered them the privilege of advertising their wares on the interior of the walls of the church. The offer was so extensively accepted that sufficient money was obtained from this source, not only to decorate the church but to lay an asphalt walk around it. We are not told whether the advertisers were satisfied with the result of the speculation, or whether the increase in their business traceable to the advertisements, compensated them for their outlay. That, of course, was a business risk; but the church collected the charges, and its treasury was filled. It would have been interesting to learn, too, whether the minister was satisfied with the experiment. If his hearers were reading the advertisements while he was trying to get their attention to his sermon, we can imagine that he must have been annoyed, but perhaps the thought of the new decorations and of the asphalt walk, which would come from the money paid for the advertisements, may have consoled him.

What could have suggested this scheme to the mind of its originator? Is it possible that it was an adaptation of the course of the officials of the Temple in the days of Christ, who permitted bankers and vendors to set up their stands in the outer courts of the sacred edifice? It belongs to the same order and is an application of the same principle. Perhaps business men in that day did not advertise, otherwise they might have done their business at their own stores and so escaped the castigation they received at the Master's hands. The modern method is certainly more orderly and decorous and avoids the noise of bargaining, which would disturb the services. Their course was more vulgar and unblushing, but the result was the same. The people who came to worship could purchase their commodities on the spot, while in the Western church, they were merely notified where they could be purchased. Perhaps if the custom is generally adopted, it may be further developed, and dry-goods merchants and tailors may, for an additional sum, have the privilege of distributing samples of their goods. A system that will provide funds to decorate a church and lay an asphalt walk around it, is one that has endless possibilities of development.

How must such a scheme appear in the eyes of the Master of Assemblies? His promise was that where two or three were gathered in his name, he would be among them. Would it please him to see on the walls of a church dedicated to his service, an announcement of a bargain sale, or an invitation to the people who had come to worship, to visit some grocer's establishment? It is sufficiently difficult for the worshiper to withdraw his thoughts from business concerns while he is in the Lord's house, without the minister assisting the evil spirit to distract the attention of his audience. There is not a word to be said against legitimate business, or the system of advertising which attracts business, but in the name of all that is reverent and devotional, let the advertiser keep his hands off the Lord's house and refrain from an attempt to turn the worship of God into a means of business revenue.

The Value of Criticism

IN the voluminous mail which reaches this office every day are many letters of cordial appreciation, which it would be ungracious to pass by unacknowledged. There are also letters from friends having the warmest sympathy with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in its wide field of religious and philanthropic work, and who occasionally afford us material aid by their kindly and well-meant criticism. We value all of these communications, since all are written in the same frank and helpful spirit. It is a high privilege for a journal to enjoy the confidence and respect of its readers to the extent to which we believe these are enjoyed by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. They are sharers with ourselves in every spiritual and benevolent enterprise; they enter with genuine heartiness into all our plans for religious and humanitarian work, and they have given us not only continuous stimulus by their timely letters of cheer and encouragement, but to them we are indebted for many hints and suggestions that have proved of practical service to the great world-wide family circle of readers, of which they form a part.

Thus, we value their well-meant, candid criticism as highly as their approbation, and we trust that no reader will ever hesitate, through motives of delicacy, to communicate at any time his views or opinions concerning THE CHRISTIAN HERALD or its contents. We would be pleased to hear from them all, when occasion arises, and the more frankly they write, the better we will like it. Time may not permit us to reply to such letters individually, but all will receive due consideration, and our readers will thus have the assurance that their labor has not been in vain, as the practical outcome will result in benefit to all.

Krueger

ONE of the most pathetic passages in the life of Paul Krueger, the "grand old man" of the Boers, who recently passed away in exile, is that which relates how, when his country was on the verge of bankruptcy, the news was brought to him of the great gold discoveries. "Thank God!" he exclaimed, "now my country is saved!" The reverse, however, proved to be true; for the story of the fabulous wealth of the mines was quickly spread, and the gold, the discovery of which he had so gladly welcomed, ultimately became the means of his country's undoing.

That Krueger was a patriot, brave, fearless and sagacious, and a statesman of great natural abilities, the whole civilized world now acknowledges. "The South African Lion" unquestionably had his limitations; but these should be laid more largely to the account of lack of early opportunities for the culture that broadens and refines, than to natural disposition. He had no love for the "outlander"; but it should not be forgotten that his whole career, from the day he joined the "great trek" into the Transvaal, until the last expiring struggle of the little inland African republic, a few years ago, had been a series of embittering experiences.

While the scattered remnants of his people will mourn for him as for a beloved father and patriot, the world at large will remember him as the stern, old Bible-loving preacher-president, who, like another Moses, led his people through many trials successfully, and founded in the Central African wilderness a government on lines of almost patriarchal simplicity, which would in all probability have been flourishing to-day, had gold never been discovered in the Transvaal.

Queens of the Home

HOW much the mother means to her home is never better exemplified than in the tenement house life of New York. On the crowded East Side, where families live in close proximity, yet where each little apartment of three or five rooms may be, and often is, a self-respecting home, the mother is the dominant influence in the family. To her the wages of father and children are brought as a matter of course, and she takes care of the income, pays the rent, buys the food and clothes, and saves whatever can be laid aside for a coming rainy day. If the father be a drinking man, the mother has the harder task; but she accepts it without complaint. She takes wonderfully good care of her daughters; the East Side young girl is looked after with as judicious and loving care by her mother as is the portion of the millionaire's daughter in a luxurious home. Sometimes, in the middle of the night, this hard-working mother is up washing and ironing the neat shirt-waists and crisp skirts in which her girls go to the business office, or, if it be a holiday, to the picnic or boat trip, which means so much when one has few outings.

The mothers who were suddenly snatched from their children when the Slocum took fire, were of the thrifty, capable, loving type, who have left a great loneliness behind them. No one who has talked with the grieving sons and daughters who are left to mourn, can fail to have a new conception of what motherhood means among the poor.

The mother is the court of last resort. "She decided everything," said one young girl, "I always asked my mother what was right." She nurses the children in sickness, cooks their food, makes their clothing, goes with the boy, or the man, when he buys a suit for Sunday, and is the general caretaker. If she is a religious woman, whatever her creed, the family life is pervaded by her reverence and her goodness. If she is bright and merry, there is laughter at the simple board. Many a "Mrs. Wiggs of the Cabbage Patch" resides in down-town tenements in the big metropolis. If she is obliged to go out to work, and she often must, she undertakes this cheerily, hoping for the better day when the children will grow up and her way will be easier.

A thousand homes have reason to mourn when such wives and mothers as have lately perished are taken suddenly away.

The Mission of Wealth

IT is a wonderful and inspiring story which we publish to-day, from our London correspondent, describing the vast and far-reaching charities of the English metropolis. It reveals the fact that a great commercial nation, amid all its busy enterprises at home and its distractions abroad, still considers it a prime duty and a delightful privilege to help, in a thousand different ways, to make life happier and more worth the living to the multitudes who are born among surroundings of poverty and suffering.

In every great city on the civilized globe, the continued multiplication of public benevolences proves that ours is an age of increasing thoughtfulness and care for "God's poor." Wholly irrespective of all other considerations than those of humanity and a common brotherhood, the possessors of abundance are making progress in the practical realization of the great truth that wealth is a sacred trust, to be used not for self-aggrandizement or indulgence, but for the glory of God and the good of their fellow-men. Great fortunes that once were jealously hoarded, are now generously poured out in varied benefactions, that bring joy and blessing to thousands.

In our own land, this idea is taking firm root, and men and women are realizing, in their own lives, the rich spiritual gain that comes from a recognition of this great principle. "Wealth," wrote Miss Helen Gould in a letter to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD several years ago, "is a sacred stewardship," and her admirable example in making her own great fortune a means of enduring benefit to others, material as well as spiritual, has since then been followed by an army of consecrated men and women in many States.

Remember the poor; reach out a helping hand to those who are in need; do something to gladden some cheerless life; bring a ray of sunshine into a heart that is heavy and sad; transform sorrow into joy; make the smile chase away the tears.

The rich who use their wealth for such purposes disarm envy and win the love and gratitude of those who are struggling under poverty's heavy burdens. They inherit, too, the blessing of God, whose message by his prophet was: "If thou draw out thy soul to the hungry and satisfy the afflicted soul; then shall thy light rise in darkness and thine obscurity be as the noonday. The Lord shall guide thee continually and thou shalt be like a watered garden, and like a spring of water whose waters fail not."

Fighting in Thibet

LATE news from Thibet shows that the negotiations between the British and the Grand Lama who rules Thibet, have failed. The armistice agreed upon pending the effort to secure peace, ended on July 5th. It was found that in the interval the Thibetans had re-occupied the fort of Gyantse, which they had surrendered, and were remounting their guns. The fort, which stands on an elevation of 13,000 feet, commanded the British camp in the plain below, about a mile away, and the Thibetan guns opened fire upon it. Before sunrise on the following day the British forces began climbing the rock to attack the fortress. The artillery firing over their heads, bombarded the walls on the west side, the other sides being impregnable. Late in the afternoon the upper part of the wall was wayed and fell. The Indian troops, led by a British officer, clambered up the wall and swarmed in through the breach. They found the Thibetans on the house-tops, from which they fired on the troops below, and threw down heavy stones. There was prolonged hand-to-hand fighting, but before midnight the houses were cleared, and the British held undisputed possession of the fortress. On July 13, the march toward Lhasa, the capital of Thibet, 120 miles away was commenced.

Inquiries have been made by our Government as to the British objects in invading Thibet. The answer received was courteous, and is said to be satisfactory to Secretary Hay. The British Government disclaims any intention of a permanent occupation of the country. It promises to retire as soon as the Grand Lama fulfils the promises made in the treaty of reciprocal trade. He is also required to receive the official representative of Great Britain at Lhasa. Our Government's interference was based on the stand it took four years ago, when Mr. Hay insisted on the integrity of China, which Great Britain conceded. The pledge to retire from Thibet as soon as the purposes of the expedition are achieved, fulfils, therefore, all the conditions. The Grand Lama doubtless believes that the expedition is sent to conquer and annex his country. If he could be convinced that no such purpose is contemplated, but only the arrangement of peaceable mercantile relations, he would, unless he is utterly foolish, take the course which our Lord described:

While the other is yet a great way off, he sendeth an embassy and desireth conditions of peace (Luke 14: 32).

Butchers on Strike

A strike which appears likely to affect the whole country, began on July 12. The employees of the meat-slaughtering industry in Chicago, Kansas City, Omaha, St. Joseph, and other cities laid down their tools and left their work. Their example was speedily followed in New York and the chief centres of the trade throughout the country. In one day no less than 45,000 men were idle and the business of supplying the people with food was paralyzed. It appears that the matter in dispute was a question of wages. Unskilled laborers were being paid eighteen and a-half cents an hour. The leaders say the men could have lived on that wage, if they had regular employment, but there were periods when they were working only half-time, and in some months they had only thirteen hours of work in a week. A demand was made on the employers for a minimum rate of twenty cents an hour. It was met, according to the report of the strikers, by a reduction to fifteen cents. Efforts to settle by arbitration failed and resort was had to a strike. A panic has ensued in the great cities and a fear is prevalent that a meat famine will be caused, as, at this time of year, there is little stock on hand. The price of meat has already been advanced twenty-five per cent., and as purchasers are making up the deficiency by ordering fish or poultry, the prices of those two substitutes also have been raised. As to the merits of the dispute, we shall doubtless hear more as the struggle proceeds, but to the outsider it does seem that a basis of agreement might have been reached had there been a disposition on the part of the disputants to come to terms. A strike is always deplorable, involving loss to both sides. There is in this day more than any other need for the prayer of the Psalmist.

Incline my heart to thy testimonies, and not to covetousness (Ps. 119: 36).

Paul Krueger Dead

One of the most remarkable men of our time passed away on July 14, when Paul Krueger, familiarly known to his family, who were killed in the war. Though he had an enormous fortune, variously estimated at from five to twenty-five million dollars, it seemed to give him little comfort. He was prohibited by Great Britain from returning to South Africa, and he could not be happy anywhere else. He was born there on a poor Dutch farm, and during his early years struggled under many hardships. He was in the great trek of 1836, and took a prominent part in politics under the early Presidents until 1880, when, after the shocking battle of Majuba Hill, he was himself chosen President. The events of the great war, in which, though he did no personal fighting, he was the leading spirit, are well-known. Small concessions made before it broke out would have averted it, but Krueger was stubborn, and he underestimated the power of England. When he was beaten, he fled from South Africa, a broken-hearted man. The Republic he had labored so hard and so long to build up had lost its independence, and he had nothing left to live for. He brooded over his misfortunes, and never ceased to denounce the men whom he held responsible for them. All is now ended, and he shares the condition which, as the ancient preacher pointed out, is the lot of even the greatest of men:

Their love and their hatred and their envy is now perished, neither have they any more a portion for ever in anything that is done under the sun (Eccles. 9: 6).

Father and Warden

In a recent article on prison discipline, a magazine writer tells a pathetic story. He says that the warden of a prison in Connecticut employed his son, a bright young man, as his clerk. It was his duty to keep the prison accounts and draw the checks for expenses. Notwithstanding the many examples he witnessed of the consequences of dishonesty, the young man became a defaulter. His system was to raise the amount on the various checks passing through his hands and keep the difference between the sums for which the checks were originally drawn, and the sums to which he raised them. He was detected, and sentenced to four years' imprisonment. As he entered the gates of the prison with the other prisoners, he looked anxiously into his father's face, but the father, who, as warden, was waiting to receive the prisoners, did not show that he recognized his son. To him the young man was only one of the prisoners committed to his custody. With the customary signal of a wave of his hand, the warden turned the file of handcuffed men over to the deputy, who led them away to shave and bathe them, and measure them by the Bertillon system. Within an hour the young man was learning the lock-step with the other prisoners. It is said that he is bitterly disappointed. His father had been a loving and indulgent parent, and the son had unbounded faith in the continuance of his affection. He forgot that his crime had placed him in a new relation to his father, whose duty to the State required him to treat him as a convict and not as a son. There is reason to fear that many people are cherishing similar hopes as to their eternal future. While it is true that God is love, it should not be forgotten that he is also just.

Then shall ye begin to say, We have eaten and drunk in thy presence and thou hast taught in our streets. But he shall say, I tell you I know not whence ye are; depart from me all ye workers of iniquity (Luke 13: 26).

BRIEF NOTES

Liquor dealers must, in future, not confine their hostility to the church. There is a movement begun to exclude them from the Masonic fraternity. The Iowa Grand Lodge of Masons at its recent meeting in Sioux City, declared that no liquor dealer, except a druggist, can hereafter become a member of the Order in that State.

The Tent services at Broadway and Fifty-seventh Street, New York, have been resumed. Rev. G. W. McPherson is the Superintendent. Among the ministers who have promised to preach are Dr. R. S. MacArthur, Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman, Dr. Louis Albert Banks, and Dr. John Robertson.

PRINCESS OF WALES
The Patroness of Many London Charities

LONDON is a mass of humanity, pitchforked together by a seemingly careless fate. Every man is a stranger to his next-door neighbor. Yet in no city in the world, so much as in this very heterogeneous London, does public charity manifest itself on so liberal a scale, or in so many varied forms. At this season of the year, every citizen, from the king to the humble clerk, puts his hand in his pocket and gives.

buildings, such as the Crystal Palace and Albert Hall. A dozen Fresh-Air Funds (like THE CHRISTIAN HERALD's Children's Home work), are being applied to sending children of the tenements to the country and the seaside. Hospitals are making good their annual deficits, and orphanages are raising funds to extend their operations. Princesses are acting as saleswomen at bazaars, and women of the middle class are passing around linen bags, to be filled with anything you choose to give for the needy.

First of all, I shall show that this wholesale giving to the poor on the part of Londoners is an absolute necessity; second, that the manner of enlisting public sympathy is not haphazard, but admirably businesslike.

As to the necessity. In this centre of the world's business, there are more abjectly poor people than can be found in all the remainder of Great Britain. The returns for the last week in June show that 109,494 London paupers received aid during the year. On a single day the number of vagrants relieved was 1,200. On "Hospital Sunday" an announcement read in the churches showed that the number of patients treated during the year reached the stupendous number of 2,280,578. To take care of all the poor in England and Wales alone last year, the enormous sum of $70,000,000 was spent. This does not include $3,000,000 for loans. This is at the rate of nearly $2.00 a head for each person in the population of England. For poor relief last year the British taxpayer paid the sum of $12,000,000. All the vast remainder of the $70,000,000 for the poor came in the form of voluntary contributions.

Now for the businesslike manner in which the voluntary contributions are raised. It must be remembered that practically all the hospitals, orphanages, homes, relief funds, shelters, rests, etc., are not under state or municipal control, but that these enterprises act independently. Hence the necessity for independent appeals, precisely like those issued by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. It is most interesting to note that the principal method of appealing by the various independent institutions is by advertising—a method employed by this journal in times of famine or widespread distress. In magazines and newspapers, both religious and secular, I see from day to day the advertisements of all sorts of charitable enterprises, setting forth their purposes, and appealing for funds "urgently needed," or, as they sometimes read, "painfully needed."

The principle of this form of eliciting public sympathy is that the money spent for advertising yields a far larger return than any other method of appeal, and is therefore not only a practicable business method, but a paying one.

In response to these advertised appeals come not only contributions in the form of mites from those who give of their little all as a Christian duty, but contributions in the form of vast sums from Christian philanthropists, many of whom give thus of their plenty while they still live, instead of leaving the money by will. The total such philanthropic gifts last year exceeded $7,000,000. Baroness Burdett-Coutts, who the other day celebrated her ninetieth birthday, has endowed in the course of her life no fewer than three bishoprics, nine hospitals, five orphanages, five children's homes, six homes for women, and probably a score of charitable institutions of a miscellaneous character. All appeals sent to her for ass-

Charity in London is, indeed, a business led by royalty, and followed up by the masses.

That this is the busy season in the business of providing for the poor, is evident even to the casual eye of the tourist. In the principal streets, banners, just like American political banners, are stretched from house to house. In the houses of the rich, charity concerts are held almost daily. Bazaars are now being held in many great public

The list of charitable bequests in Whittaker's Almanac, for 1904, occupies a whole page, and it includes gifts of $50,000 or more. Thus gifts pour in for every form of public beneficence in London; for every instiin for curing disease, alleviating suffering, relieving the indigent, or soothing the later years of those who have seen better days.

Most active, in the sense of personal attention and personal gifts, in caring for London's poor, are the King and Queen. The King, especially, takes a particular interest in discoveries of a cure for cancer and tuberculosis; and if ever such a cure is discovered, it will be due, in a large measure, to the encouragement he has given to research into the causes of these mysterious diseases. As for the Queen, her name appears as principal patron of at least half of the institutions named in the official list of London charities. She opens fairs, buys from the stalls, makes things to be sold, visits hospitals and homes; and, following from the course of her daily movements as chronicled in the Court Circular, she certainly gets the most of the hours of her active day to the poor. While the Salvation Army Congress was in session here, the Queen visited one of the halfpenny restaurants conducted by the Army, ate the halfpenny dinner, and said she liked it. It is reported that the King once said that whenever he saw the Queen looking through the newspapers, he knew that she was reading either about a Child's Home or a hospital; and that the happiest moments of her Majesty's life was when she could discover some new institution for the help of the poor, or the cure of sick children. Last week the Queen opened the great charity bazaar at Albert Hall, the greatest charity event of the season. She herself was a contributor, not only of money, but of a book-cover which she painted, symbolical of the volume, The Christian Year, for which it was made. Moreover, the Queen has presented a Prayer Book or Hymn Book, with the cover worked or painted by herself, to those charitable institutions of which she is patron. Last week, too, the King presided at the anniversary festival of the Orphan Working School, and while chatting with two of the boys who stood behind the royal chair, he said: "I hope you and your friends enjoy the holiday I begged for you."

The Prince and Princess of Wales are no less active in their august sires. Yesterday they gave a garden party for the benefit of the League of Mercy, raising the day about $50,000. Not long ago their Royal Highnesses gave an entertainment in aid of the Lifeboat Fund. Again, they journeyed far from town to open the Sanatorium in connection with the Hospital for Consumptives. Once more, they very quietly and unobtrusively visited the workmen's dwellings at Westminster. And every time these distinguished visitors appear at an institution, the visit signifies Royal approval and induces funds from Christian England.

After the Prince and Princess of Wales comes the activity of the King's sisters. Foremost among these is the Princess Christian, her favorite institutions being the Royal School of Needlework, the Windsor Nursing Home, the Royal Infant Nursery, the Cripple Boys' Holiday Home, and various Fresh Air enterprises like your own Mont-Lawn. Then comes two more of the King's sisters, the Princess Louise and Beatrice. Both have endowed many homes for children and shelters for women, and philanthropy may be said to constitute their lifework. Other members of the nobility who are active in charity work are Lady Somerset, who has of late deunceasingly among the poorer classes. Some confine their work to poor girls, fallen women, etc., and hence the present movement for the establishment of more Homes for working women and friendless girls. The good Samaritans of London now perform their work for friendless girls through the Pimlico Ladies' Association for the Care of Friendless Girls. This Association has established many Preventive Homes throughout the city, where servants and shop assistants out of work may live until they get a fresh start. Nurseries are maintained by the Association, where mothers are given a home until they can find work whereby they can support themselves and their babies. The task of keeping in touch with the girls who pass through the Homes is the most arduous part of the work, but each girl is made to feel that the ladies are friends to whom she can always turn for practical sympathy. These Homes are the special pride of the Duchess of Bedford.

I referred in a previous paragraph to linen bags that were left at the doors of London households. This work is conducted on an extensive scale. Not a house is neglected; there is not a door at which a linen bag is not left, to be filled by the inmates.

In my house at the present time is one of those linen bags; it was left here a few days ago, and will be called for in due time. I am supposed to fill it with anything I don't want—such as old coats, shoes, hats, underwear, books, etc. This is a provision made for the poor of London by the Society for the Destitute. The bags are all taken to a central headquarters, where the contents are sorted and laid out for exhibition, just as goods in a department store. To this store come the needy to buy, for a penny or two, anything they want. The pennies thus gathered pay all expenses, and the pride of the poor is sustained by the thought that the article is paid for, even though the sum paid be ever so small.

Now, mark the wisdom of this charity. Not a thing is sold in summer, when all the other charities and Fresh-Air Funds are doing so much for the poor. Not until October is the store opened. Winter is then approaching, and a new coat, or a new pair of shoes, is needed. The poor then buy, for a penny or two, clothing for which they could never pay elsewhere. I went to the store, or depot, as it is called, to ask about this useful charity. The manager told me some incidents worth repeating. One day, there came a poor girl with a timid request "for an old nightdress for my mother—she's dying of cancer." How the thin, anxious face brightened when she found that two half-worn night garments, formerly the property, apparently, of some rich lady, could be purchased for the modest sum of one penny. Then there came an old man, who earned, he said, a scanty living as a crossing-sweeper. "But why have you not been to the mission lately?" asked the manager. "Because," said the poor man, "I know it would be disrespectful to appear in God's house in these rags, and for some weeks I have had nothing better. But now I have come to try to get a new coat." He got the coat—a nice

The Passing of the Kiss

SOME years ago it was not uncommon to see women kiss one another in public. Friends meeting in the street, or the church porch, or in somebody's house, greeted not only with the hand-clasp, but with the kiss, fully given on the lips. Later, a foreign fashion came in, and acquaintances, if they kissed, presented the cheek for the salute of love. To-day, people seldom kiss when meeting or parting casually, and mere chance encounters in shops and other public places are never thus signalized, a pleasant word being sufficient to fulfil every requirement of such an occasion.

If one's beloved are going across the ocean, or leaving home for a stay of months or years, kisses are properly exchanged. A mother then embraces a daughter, and sisters, brothers, wives, sweethearts, whatever be the friendly name and tenure by which affection marks the bond, may appropriately give and take a kiss of farewell. In the pages of romance kisses linger yet, and are often fervid, but every-day reality finds them superfluous, except behind the guarded doors of the home, and between members of the same household.

Kisses are often distrusted as unhygienic and dangerous. It was a mother's heartbroken kiss pressed on the lips of a dying child that cost the Princess Alice, Queen Victoria's dearly loved daughter, her life, for the child had diphtheria, and the mother took the disease. Before we knew so much as we now know about the deadly contagion of tuberculosis, many a consumptive patient innocently communicated the fatal malady which was sapping life and strength, to those who were caretakers in the case.

It is perhaps natural to kiss babies, with their velvet skin and peachy bloom, the very flowers of humanity, but no sensible woman permits everybody to kiss her darling. A kiss on the dimpled rose-leaf hand may do no harm, but strangers and visiting kindred should not kiss the baby's face.

In the intercourse of society, a warm and friendly grasp of the hand is worth quite as much as a kiss, especially if the latter be perfunctory and cold; the mere peck of a bird's bill, as most feminine kisses exchanged on street corners used to be.

One is thankful in chronicling the kiss as passing away, that there is no probability of its ever coming back. It will never pass away from the place where it sacredly belongs, from the home, where wife and husband daily kiss one another when they separate in the morning, or are reunited at evening; where parents kiss the little ones for good night; where the kiss is the fitting expression of entire confidence, unbroken tenderness, and unflawed esteem. Kisses are not to be made light of, and bestowed upon those whom the heart cares little for, nor are they, even among relatives, to be discounted in honor, by thoughtless exchange in public.

Men of Anglo-Saxon lineage seldom kiss. The Latin races, more demonstrative and less restrained, do not find it strange when stirred by strong emotion, that brothers and friends, stalwart and bearded, fall on one another's necks. With the northern races this ardor of expression is almost impossible, though there may be love as true and feeling as profound in the crises of life.

Judas in the garden, met his master and betrayed him with a kiss. "Whomsoever I shall kiss," said the most execrated and infamous of mankind, "that same is he." To have subordinated to his wicked purpose the tenderest act of daily life, and thus to have played the traitor, was to show how base human nature, left to itself, may become.

Thunder-storms

Summer is the season of thunder-storms. Considering how fond we are of fire-works, and how we enjoy their display, it is curious that we do not take more vivid pleasure in those marvelous and glorious exhibitions of power, which the Almighty hand shows in the summer sky. The day is hot, humid, exhausting. Clouds hang low, or, it may be, in the vaulted blue above us there is not even a cloud. Evening draws on, and the heat, seemingly as torrid as ever, gives no hint of abating. Suddenly there is a low roll, a grumble, as of a wild beast in a thicket. A fiery flash shoots across the heavens. The roll grows deeper, louder; presently crash follows crash, and the sky is a sheet of wavering flame. Then the clouds break, and down falls the rain in a splendid cataract, cooling the air till the furnace blasts of the day are forgotten, and night brings sleep and gentlest refreshment.

To those who are timid in thunder-storms, and some who read this have been in bondage in the fear that hath tormented all their lives, shuddering and hiding their heads in dismay whenever lightning flashes or thunder rolls, it may be said that the bolt which kills strikes without warning. If you see the flash you are safe. Ordinary precautions are not amiss. One need not stand under a tree to watch a thunderstorm. But one should not yield to cowardly terror if one can avoid it, for the thunder, as some one has said, is but God's voice, the lightning only the glance of His eye.

Conversational Blunders

One of the fatal conversational blunders, and one often witnessed, is the telling another person's story. If a witty anecdote or bright jest has been once told at the table; if a droll incident or a funny saying has been described or quoted, it is, at that particular table and in that place, the property of the narrator. To filch it from him or her, and tell it yourself is a theft, as truly as it is a theft to steal another person's spoons. The original narrator owns the story. It is not to be told by somebody else in his presence, or in his absence to his especial audience, without his consent.

Another blunder is made by the impatient listener who, noticing a sudden hesitation, takes the word from another's lips, and then completes another's sentence. Still another is the habit of commenting derisively on what a friend is saying, as for instance: "B is nothing if not on the opposite side." "C talks just to hear his own voice." "D is misled by a vivid imagination."

People who make such lapses as these will never be popular.

Superfluous Flesh

A TENDENCY to redundant size is very disagreeable to a woman who wishes to be symmetrical, and who dislikes to put on superfluous flesh too soon. Too much adipose tissue is a foe of health and beauty, and undue corpulence brings in its wake rheumatism and other distressing diseases. Turkish women, it is true, enjoy being fat, for the reason that in their country only the plump woman is admired. With us, while one dislikes being lean and scrawny, she equally fears the encroachment of the flesh.

A very stout woman finds herself hampered in going about. She is likely to be short of breath, and to dislike taking exercise because it tires her, while she finds it difficult to choose her dress gracefully on account of her size.

The woman whose tendency is to be too plump should be very careful about her food. She should especially avoid indulgence in sweets, candies and appetizing luncheons between meals. Coarse or gluten breads are better for her than the finest of the wheat. So far as possible, she should avoid all foods which contain very much starch.

Beyond careful attention and scrupulous obedience to the laws of health, it is well for the stout woman to take no risks. Various remedies that are said to reduce flesh quickly, reduce health and strength, too, and produce disaster in the end.

A woman who is stout and who suddenly loses a great many pounds is apt to look wrinkled and old. The stout woman should not wear a very tight corset, or squeeze herself into dresses which fit like coats of mail.

Not long ago the writer saw in a street-car in New York a woman, whose weight must have approximated three hundred pounds. She was dressed in a tightly-clinging gown of black satin, much ornamented with glittering jet. It seemed as if every breath she drew were painful, and the tightness of her gown accentuated her size. She resembled a mammoth beetle, poor lady!

Another very stout woman who has found it impossible to reduce her size, has devised a charming costume of her own. She wears no corset, and all her gowns hang loosely from the shoulder. Her ordinary dress is what one would call a Mother Hubbard, and for occasions of splendor she has variations of this model, some of which are extremely beautiful. One does not at once think of her size, but rather of her beautiful manners, exquisite hands, and lovely, abundant hair.

A doctor who has studied the subject, says that the stout woman should drop cream and sugar and most of the cereals from her menu and should substitute for them fresh fruit. Bananas, peaches, melons, prunes, and grapes are not to be recommended for her; but apples, oranges, currants, plums, sour cherries, figs, dates, nuts, and raisins may be freely indulged in. All meats, except pork and veal are safe, and so are all green vegetables especially spinach, tomatoes, lettuce, and watercress. Salads are excellent for both luncheon and dinner.

The same authority states that much self denial should be used with regard to liquids. To drink water freely during meals, is to offer an inducement for the rapid increase of flesh. If possible, drink no water during meals, and take only weak tea or black coffee after them. If, however, one finds, notwithstanding all her care, that her flesh increases she would better not distress herself too greatly about it, but accept it as a condition which is not agreeable, and yet must be endured.

We do not love our friends or dislike them because of their looks, but for quite other qualities which have to do with mind and heart.

Home Industries

As one goes about the country one finds in out-of-the-way neighborhoods, either the survival or the revival of some interesting old-fashioned home industries. For instance, in the Green Mountains, there are little cabins tucked away among the trees, where silent women still weave on hand looms rugs and curtains, which are the delight of city visitors, who gladly buy them. In the Southern mountain women weave in delft-blue, and moss-green, and rose-pink bedspreads, and lounge-covers, and floor-cloths, which are veritable works of art. Patch-work is not now so common as it used to be; but among plainishings of a recent New York bride, were a half dozen dainty quilts, pieced in exquisite intricate patterns, and finished in quilting that was as delicate as the finest embroidery. Each was enclosed in an envelope of white linen and tied with satin ribbons, and the whole was the contribution of a Southern grandmother.

Girls were formerly taught to sew beautifully by hand. A few young women possess this rare accomplishment now and if possessed of needlecraft, they are sure at anytime of knowing how to earn a good livelihood, for really fine plain sewing commands a high market-price.

Mountaineering in the Saddle

The Story of a Memorable Ride across the Kentucky and Virginia Hills

By Maj.-Gen. OLIVER OTIS HOWARD

THE anniversaries of institutions of learning, beginning in May, usually run through to July. The one of Lincoln Memorial University, situated in the heart of the mountains where three States corner—namely Tennessee, Virginia and Kentucky—had its anniversary from the 14th to the 19th of May, inclusive. The baccalaureate by a clergyman from Cincinnati, and the address to the students by the Hon. Mr. Sargent, of Knoxville, were very able and full of interest for the students and the mountain people, which includes the small villages round about, especially that of Cumberland Gap.

But I do not intend, in this article, to call attention so much to the University as to a journey through the mountains. This is the fifth of my trips through the mountain country round about Cumberland Gap; by this I mean the "cut," or depression in the mountains over which the armies went backwards and forwards so often during our Civil War; where the Morgan of Ohio met the Morgan of the South.

Grant-Lee Hall was our place of departure. Fred. J. Chamberlin, Esq., a lawyer of Boston, and the writer, with Robert Barnett, a mountain youth, who has been several years in the University, constituted the party. Robert was guide, and led us on by a beautiful "Four Season's" highway, which Civil Engineer Waring laid out many years ago and which is still in fairly good condition, a mile and a-half to the little village near the Gap. The village has improved wonderfully within a few years. You no longer see the signs in the street, and the sidewalks are growing better. Some dreadful old shanties remain, but they will disappear before many days, for I believe that the first high wind will demolish them. A fearful storm crushed the Methodist Church not long since, and they have very hands through the bars for the leaflets which I offered them, but not one in that distance could read. They answered, however, at every place, "We will get some'un to read hit to us." "Hit" belongs to every mountaineer.

We skirted the long range of which the pinnacle mountain is the most famous peak, following substantially what is named "Clear Creek." This creek sends down to Cumberland Gap into the cave and out to the people as good water as that from Poland Springs. The region we then came to was a little more settled, houses as near together as a mile or half a mile, with more open and cultivatable land. This was called the "Clear Fork of Yellow Rock." Where two roads met was a store, and behind it a small farmhouse. These belonged to Preston Turner. His wife kindly prepared us as good a dinner as she could. My party enjoyed the eggs and bacon, if not the corn bread. The corn bread is always palatable to me.

We ascended gradually for five or six miles, till we came to the farm of James Denny. In every direction you encounter a continuous forest. Finding only Mrs. Denny and one of her daughters at home, we concluded to ride down to some open ground from four to five miles distant, where the Denny family were clearing up land, burning bushes, ploughing and planting. Here the young men and the young women were working together in the fields. After receiving a hearty welcome from Mr. Denny, we turned back and all gathered at the house.

Mr. Chamberlin's note is, "Mr. and Mrs. Denny and thirteen children, eleven now living, nine children at home." He was very much interested in Mrs. Denny's spinning, using an old-fashioned wheel. He caught sight of some wool, cut from the mountain sheep, which was soaking in a large kettle in the yard; soon it was wrung out and dried in the sunshine.

Mrs. Denny said when she first saw us, "We ain't got much, but whatever we has is yours, if you can put up with hit." When my friend tried to get her picture, she bluntly refused, and said she couldn't afford to have it taken in such a poor old dress.

Squirrels were playing about the establishment, being kept habitually in a pen made of bark. They were as tame and gentle as kittens. Mr. Denny has plenty of land, and raises large crops. He has one son, Robert, who came to us at Lincoln Memorial University, and acquired a very fair education. Robert has hired a farm not far from his father's, and is trying to lay by something for the future.

Mr. Denny kept us over night; when we tried to offer him something in payment, the blood came in his face and neck, as he generously said, "No, no, you are welcome to what we have."

The next day (Friday), we left Mr. Denny's after an early breakfast, going down the mountain side and following paths that were rugged enough, till we arrived, at ten o'clock, at the Cabbage Post Office, having coursed along Cabbage Creek. Every settlement goes by the name of the creek which is nearest to it. In fact, the settlements are built along the creeks, with the mountains rising abruptly from both sides of the narrow valleys. At this post office we had a meal of victuals furnished us, and our horses were well fed; but the people would take no compensation. We found that day many houses vacant, and were told that a large company was buying up the coal lands, and so had induced the farmers to migrate to some other part of the wilderness. We arrived at Calvin Hensley's at 5:15 P.M., and stayed the night. We had beautiful weather in our mountain travels, but now the rain was coming on, and we could see the range of different showers coursing along the mountain sides, some of which came to us in a lively way, though none lasted long.

Hensley's sixteen-year-old boy remarked to Mr. Chamberlin: "Hain't got edication enough to tell how many letters is in father's name," and Mr. Hensley said that possibly gone over to the Congregational edifice to worship, where there is nothing now but good fellowship among them all.

We passed up through a winding way, something like that described by Dante, till we came to what they call Hell's Half-Acre." It is like a terrace, where the houses are built; there is always mud on both sides the street and usually pigs galore bathing in it, or sleeping contentedly in some door-yard after wallowing in the mire. There are many, many children in this singular place, where the houses are nothing but poor board shanties of one or two stories. Of course the people are very poor; but wonderful to tell, any of the little girls came out of this impoverished neighborhood tidily dressed and as clean as could be, to take part in the anniversary exercises from the Lincoln Memorial Harrow-School vision. I found often that a little one had but one respectable dress, and that she kept tidy somehow for such occasions.

We passed to the top of the mountain range into Kentucky, which is only a stone's throw from the Half-Acre. After passing over the range we turned to the right, and went into the ruins of a fort whose remains still give a clear indication of some defenses of the Civil War. The views from this point are beautiful whichever way you gaze. We passed on northward, finding several tenements. At the farmhouses, if we may call them so, along the route there was an average of from four to six little ones. For twelve miles we met them, sometimes in the fields at work, sometimes on fences, sometimes sticking their he had worked hard to save up what little he had. He was proposing to sell out to the coal company, and thinking that he might go to Iowa, where farming was easier. I couldn't help thinking that it would be a very hard undertaking for him to take his family to the far West. His wife, however, had lived in a village, and had acquired more education than her husband. She dressed up her little girl of ten years very neatly, and the child made a beautiful picture.

During this day our lives were put in jeopardy, for I had been mistaken for an officer of the Government hunting for a man-slayer who had run away from Mingo mine. Mr. Chamberlin had arranged to have any telegrams which came to Cumberland Gap, sent forward to us by a speedy messenger. Hearing that such a messenger had passed on ahead of us that day, Chamberlin galloped away from Robert and me with speed. As he rushed along to overtake the man with a telegram, he was watched from many secret places, and when he asked a question nobody dared to tell him the truth, even concerning the messenger ahead. I noticed a woman washing by the side of the road, and she looked up to me and asked me a question or two about what I was doing, and when I told her that I was simply riding through the mountains to see the country, and to get acquainted with the people, and to distribute some books and pamphlets concerning our educational enterprise, she appeared greatly relieved, and then told me that her husband's brother was the man that had killed another at Mingo mine, and that the people were afraid that we were on the chase. It is marvelous how quickly the news of a manslaughter will fly through that country, till every family knows all the details, and yet there was but one place in our first three days' travel that we found a newspaper at a mountain home.

After we left Hensley's and passed the deep roaring grist mill, we wound along from creek to creek, passing houses of which I furnish you a specimen marked, "A Front Yard." The families were very much like those which I have described. We found large numbers of children, who were very rugged but always respectful. One little girl about ten years old courted and said "Good morning." Naturally she was bare-footed, but had on a clean dress and a pretty white sunbonnet. She said she lived with her father and mother on Chestnut Hill.

"Are you going to school?"

"No, sir," she answered, "there ain't no school hereabouts. My mother learned me to read."

At the next house we found a young wife who had belonged to a fairly prosperous family. She had married an industrious young man and they had set up housekeeping. She did not seem to be happy, said that she was not well, and was very, very lonely, as her husband was obliged to go to a distant farm to work for wages. I asked her if she could read and she said, "A little," but evidently she did not have the relief which papers and books afford a lonely wife. Not one book there.

Suddenly, we began to follow a winding way up the Black Mountain. From some high points there appeared to be long, parallel ranges. This Black Mountain fell into one of the ranges, but was more abrupt and pointed than usual, rising to considerable height above the level of the creeks. From the top of it there were many beautiful vistas; one took in the County Seat of Harlan County; the whole Black Mountain range is mainly in that county.

I rode on ahead of my companions, who had stopped to take pictures, till I reached the crest. Here I found an immense boulder over thirty feet in height, broad and craggy at the top, and broader both ways at the base. Near it I saw a young man, evidently a mountaineer, rather under size, with a gun over his shoulder and a fine specimen of hunting-dog looking up into his face. There was no other person within a mile of us. I asked the young man what he was doing. He said that he was hunting rabbits. While we were talking there I had remained on my horse. After a little space another young man appeared whom we had met before, and who was then coming from the nearest railroad station of the L. & N. R. R., having behind him on a rapid-walking good-looking mule, a young lady altogether too well dressed for an inhabitant of that region. The hunter spoke to him and they passed on; then he said to me that the young man was taking the young lady to a house not far distant beyond the divide, where she was to be married. In fifteen minutes, there came along a third young man, perspiring freely, carrying his coat on his arm and his straw hat in his hand. He smiled, and called my companion by name, and then asked him what he was doing in that desolate region.

"Oh," he said, "I am chasing jack-rabbits." The walker laughed aloud and said, "I reckon so," and strode on. The hunter then told me that this youngster, who increased his pace after he had gone by, was the bridegroom, and that when he reached the house, the marriage with the young lady who had passed on the mule would take place.

Of course I took this simple narration as the actual truth, and something within the hunter's knowledge. Afterwards I found that the young lady was a teacher, returning home after the spring term of her school in the mountains, and that the marriage part was a romantic invention for my benefit.

There was something weird and curious to me in the fact that on this mountain I could hear words of conversation three or four miles distant, down the steep ravine about which the ascending trail wound its way.

The very centre of information in all that country is found in the postman, who rides from the nearest railroad station across the several ravines, through that singularly populated wilderness, down over the Black Mountain to Harlan town and back, every day. The distance is seventeen and a half miles; this gives him a ride of thirty-five miles every day, except Sunday. The bearer of the mail overtook us while we were descending the mountain, and my companion took a picture of the meeting near the Pansy Post Office. It was the postman who corrected the imaginative story of the hunter regarding the wedding-party.

The ways grew better, and the farms more extensive and better cultivated as we approached the county town. We found a very agreeable reception at the hotel. The proprietor himself had met us at the outskirts, and conducted us to his house. During the morning (Sunday) I visited the Harlan Academy. It was vacation. The Presbyterian pastor invited me to be present at the Sunday School and morning service. The academy itself was barely furnished, showing want of almost everything for the convenience and aid of the pupils. It was, however, a good structure, and in term time is well supplied with pupils. The congregation at the academy was as well dressed and as intelligent as any in our villages of New England. I told the Sunday School concerning our work for the mountain youth at Lincoln Memorial University, but I found that they already knew much concerning the enterprise; in fact, before we had been long in Harlan town, we found six of our students there waiting an examination preparatory to teaching in different parts of the extensive Harlan County. This provision of proper examinations in Kentucky I found prevailing in several counties, and it is having a wonderfully good effect in uplifting the youth of that region, and through them, of course, more or less, the families who have been so wedded to old prejudices and doings. In the afternoon, and again in the evening, the three churches, the Presbyterian (which meets at the Academy), the Baptist, and the Methodist, met at the Methodist Church, which has the largest auditorium. An aged circuit-rider preached on both occasions. Mr. Chamberlin and I had met him early in the morning of Sunday when we were going up to the top of a beautiful hill crowned with a grove. Just before ascending, we overtook a man of fifty or upwards with a Bible in his hand, walking up and down. It was the circuit-rider, and he was preparing his sermons.

I had so often heard these old ministers preach that I was not surprised when he began in a conversational way, and gradually enlarged his scope till he became very earnest, fervent, and at times eloquent. His hearers, some shouting, were soon in very complete sympathy with him. It was an old fashioned proclamation of the whole Gospel, as men did in the days of Eliot and Williams of New England. His voice was much like that of Abraham Lincoln, on as high a key as Lincoln's in his most searching periods, and as far-reaching. He gave no hope to those who persisted in sin, and he painted the joys of heaven so that they passed beyond any paradise of earth.

On Sunday evening, Dr. Walker, a tall man of slender build, a dentist, who had his office opposite the hotel, came to me, and invited us to breakfast. His house was a revelation, showing the presence of education and culture. He had married a very beautiful and accomplished woman in Virginia, and brought her to this village to live, and be no small help in its social life.

I was surprised the day before to find so many people by the name of Howard living in the village. The first gentleman whom I met was Judge Howard. He had been for a long time a prosecuting attorney for the state or district. He and his family gave me a pleasant reception at his home, just before the evening service. There I met his brother, Elijah Howard, who had a large family in the country.

Later, I encountered a pleasant-looking gentleman of strong build who said that his name was Moses Howard. During our morning walk we came across a man above sixty, who told me that his name was Samuel Chittenden Howard, and that he had named one of his sons for me long ago.

Before seven o'clock Monday morning we were on our way, descending the right bank of the Cumberland River. As we left the village and had just crossed the great river we began to see home-made hives, filled with bees, near the farmhouses. Riding along ascending a gentle slope we saw two lads playing together, running backwards and forth across the way. One of them, a little fellow without stockings, shirt partially outside of his trousers, looking up into our faces, said, "Hello, boys!" I said, "Who is the other child with round face and curly hair?"

He answered, "Hit is Burt Howard."

"Well, what is your name?"

"Hit is Harry Hall."

Bright, active, healthful, fearless are these lads from the farmhouses.

At Wilson's, at the end of our first half day, we met at Turner's store Hiram Howard, Jr., a young man who was selling fruit trees from his nursery. I asked him if he met with any success. "Yes," he said, "I sell a heap of them." I told him that I should pass his father's house on Monday and he invited me to spend the night there.

We reached Mr. Hiram Howard's farm at 11.45 A.M. The father met us and gave us a cordial reception. He had five daughters and two or three sons. He had a fairly good farm and his daughters were all well educated. Four of them were teachers. They played the cabinet organ and sang well. They set us a table and gave us as nice a dinner as we could have wished.

It is not the Howards in this section of Kentucky that were remarkable, a few years ago, for family feuds. Mr. Hiram Howard's family is a decided exemplification of what can be effected by proper education. Everything about that home had in it all the elements of modern civilization, with its conveniences and comforts. After dining and resting we went on ten or twelve miles further and stopped for the night at the home of a prosperous farmer by the name of Hampton Lewis. En route we came across the famous "Seven Sisters"—immense rocks—rising, perpendicularly, a hundred feet or more.

Meeting everywhere with singular kindness and offer of hospitality as we passed along, we recrossed the Cumberland at a deep ford and made haste, reaching the town of Middlesboro about midday. This time I made twenty-four miles in less than five hours without dismounting.

OLIVER OTIS HOWARD,
Maj.-Gen. U. S. Army (Retired)

PATTI AND KING LUDWIG

IT was more than thirty years ago, when Europe was ringing with the fame of Mme. Patti's matchless voice, that Ludwig II, the mad King of Bavaria, set his heart on hearing the diva sing in his private theatre in Munich. He wrote letter after letter begging, even imploring, her to sing to him and offering her extravagant sums of money; but Patti, dreading the experience, persistently refused his offers. At last Ludwig tempted her with a fee so enormous that she yielded.

When she reached Munich on the day appointed (says a writer in London Tit-Bits), she found to her disgust—for she was accustomed to being received everywhere as a queen—that not even a carriage had been sent for her, and she and her maid made their way as best they could to the nearest hotel. She had scarcely finished luncheon when a gorgeously attired officer was announced, who handed her a letter from the king, with the curt information that he should expect her at 7 o'clock punctually, at the palace, where Mme. Fischer, who would sing with her, would give her further directions. With the letter was a programme by the king.

This cavalier treatment of the "Queen of Song" was more than she could bear, and Mme. Patti, stamping her foot in anger, exclaimed, "I have never been treated so rudely in my life! I will not sing—never! never! never! and you can tell the king so!" And it was some time before the messenger, with all his diplomatic arts, could smooth her ruffled plumes. But the crowning indignity was to come, for just as Madame had recovered her equanimity her eyes fell on a postscript to the letter, which had escaped her notice at the first reading. It ran thus: "The king commands Mme. Patti to appear in pure white, without any color whatever, and not by any means to wear a satin gown, but soft wool. Silk is painful to his majesty."

For once the great prima donna had no words to meet such unparalleled insolence, and she fell back into a chair in helpless amazement. When she recovered her speech it was to declare point-blank that she could not and would not appear in white—"and that ended the matter." However, in time her sense of amusement and the officer's pleading triumphed over her indignation, and she promised to obey the royal instructions.

Before 7 the royal carriage arrived, and Patti was driven to the palace and conducted through the long, dim corridors and rooms to the auditorium, which, to her amazement, she found in absolute darkness save for the fitful light of the moon.

As she stood on the dark stage, and an unseen orchestra began a soft prelude, she fancied she saw through the gloom a white face from a box opposite to her. "It was horrible," she afterward said; "the great black, empty hall, the strains of music coming from I knew not where, and that one white face, the only suggestion of life anywhere, looking at me from out of the darkness. When I opened my mouth to begin the aria, not a sound came from it."

It would be difficult to imagine a situation more trying even to a person of the strongest nerves. The king, when he failed to hear the expected voice, rose excitedly from his seat and leaned forward out of the box, the moonlight falling on his spectral face. The growing horror of her situation seemed to rouse the singer out of her stupor of fright and with a mighty effort her imprisoned voice rang out, flooding the empty building with sweetness. "It was the effort of my life," she said later. "I was desperate; but when I found my voice I put my head back and sang as I have rarely sung before or since."

As she was waiting the signal to sing again a messenger appeared, with the announcement that the king had had enough music and had gone to his apartments. For a moment Patti was stunned, and then, seeing the comical aspect of it all, she laughed heartily and prepared to return to her hotel. On the following day the court chamberlain called at the hotel with an autograph letter of thanks from the king and a present of costly jewels, and later she learned that Ludwig had spent days in blaming himself for being lured by the magic of her voice to listen to Italian music, and thus prove disloyal, even for few moments, to his beloved Wagner.

BREAD FROM HEAVEN

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON, BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS*

THE Brook Cherith is purling on to-day as in the days of Elijah, so ancient and yet so fresh and sweet. A company of seventy-five Sunday School pilgrims saw it on April 12, in a journey from Jerusalem to Jericho. It was a five hours' drive, diversified by a walk of nearly a mile, where it was too steep and too rocky to ride in carriages with safety. When about two-thirds of the way toward Jericho we came in sight of a deep rocky gorge, and alighted from our carriages that we might ascend a hill and look down into it. We would have thought it inaccessible for anything but winged creatures, if we had not observed a picturesque monastery about half way up the cliff. The monastery was so close to the cliff that it seemed to be a part of it, and may have been cut into it. The cliffs were chalky white, with slight tinges of yellow here and there, reminding one of alabaster. For Elijah, the whole place was one of God's temples in alabaster. The little monastery had of course been built to commemorate Elijah fed by the ravens. Numerous descendants of those same ravens were lying about, croaking, as if boasting of their ancestors of two thousand, nine hundred years ago. Elijah was there by God's appointment. In punishment of Ahab and Jezebel and Israel for idolatry, God had sent a famine on the land, and he had said to Elijah, "Hide thyself by the brook Cherith, that is before Jordan. Thou shalt drink of the brook and I have commanded the ravens to feed thee there." And the ravens did God's bidding, for they brought Elijah bread and meat, morning and evening. Where God's storehouse was we are not told, but the ravens knew. It would have been a lonely place for Elijah if God had not been with him.

When the brook dried up, God saw it and said to him, "Arise, get thee to Zarephath and dwell there." Elijah had probably been living in the rocky fastness by the brook for about one year. Did the Lord promise that the ravens could follow him to Zarephath? No, God said, "I have commanded a widow woman there to sustain thee." Obediently, trustingly, Elijah arose and entered upon his journey of more than one hundred miles. At the gate of the city he saw a widow gathering sticks to make a fire. God gave Elijah to understand that he was to be his provider. As Elijah looked at her and saw that she was a poor woman, he might naturally doubt her ability to take care of herself, much more of a stranger. When he asked her for a little water and bread, her reply was not reassuring, for she said she had only a little meal and a little oil in her house, and that she was gathering two sticks, in order that she might cook it for herself and for her son, and then both would starve and die. But Elijah bade her make bread for him, and gave her God's promise that so long as the famine should last, she should have meal and oil to cook for her household. She must have been a woman of faith, for she went and cooked all the meal and oil she had, and brought it to Elijah. She deserves to rank with the widow of the New Testament, whom Jesus commended for giving her two mites. She was fully repaid in fulfillment of God's promise, for Elijah dwelt in her home two years, during which "the barrel of meal wasted not, neither did the cruise of oil fail."

Illustration and Application

It was at a time when wickedness was at its height in Israel. Ahab, more forced than any ruler in Palestine since Solomon, built beautiful cities, and for himself a palace of ivory; prosecuted important wars energetically and successfully; and formed important alliances; he also excelled even Jeroboam and Ahab in wickedness, as might be expected when he had for his wife such a "bloody lady" as Jezebel, who was the inquisitor of the first religious persecution, and also the patroness of impurity. The saints withdrew to the caves, the sinners she made priests in her temples of vice. It seemed as if the true God was dead. But suddenly God provided the man for the times, who springs into history with no biography except that is carried in his name, "Elijah the Tishbite, who was of the inhabitants of Gilead." A rough and obscure country rthplace, like the cradle of so many of God's leaders! One of the greatest proofs that there is a God who guides this world, is the way such men for the times arise, with no adequate explanation of their power in heredity or environment. The Luther and Lincolns of the world's great epochs. We could therefore never despair though Jezebels seem to be controlling society and pleasure; and Ahab, business and politics. God will provide a new and true Elijah for every one of rampant wickedness.

Right forever on the scaffold,
Wrong forever on the throne;
Yet that scaffold sways the future,
And behind the dim unknown
Standeth God within the shadow,

God will provide a hiding place for his own, when judgments fall on the wicked. Elijah obeyed God when told to "hide," just as he obeyed God when told to show himself to the king who sought his life. In the shaded gorge of the Brook Cherith, water would remain longer than anywhere else, and in the blistering heat of the famine, the gorge would be like the shadow of a great rock in a weary land. How beautiful this pictures God as our refuge; first, from sin, then from sorrow.

Rock of ages, cleft for me,
Let me hide myself in thee,
Hide me, O my Saviour hide,
Till the storm of life is past,
Safe into the haven guide,
O receive my soul at last.

Moses hidden three months from the wrath of Pharaoh; the child Jesus hidden for years in Egypt from the wrath of Herod; Caleb and Joshua hidden in Jericho; Paul hidden in the basket and let down from the wall. What other hidings of God's imperilled friends are recorded in the Bible and in history? And what promises that we may hide from sin and danger and sorrow, does the Bible contain? And to whom is it promised that they shall vainly call on rocks and hills to hide them in the day of wrath?

God will provide bread from heaven, material and spiritual. The story of Elijah fed by ravens at the brook, may well illustrate the Giver of this and every good and perfect gift? In these days when thoughtless people curse "the weather man" because of the heat, let all intelligent people thank God for every hot day, that smelts a million dollars in our country alone in golden corn, every stalk of which points the grateful heart up to God. A field of golden grain should symbolize the glory of God in his goodness, no less than the golden lining of Tabernacle and Temple.

The kindness of the ravens to Elijah, points us to two great flocks of facts. One flock consists of the natural humane acts of animals to other animals, and to man. For example, just as we are writing this lesson, the daily press brings word of a little dog whose front paws had been crushed by a passing carriage. Some children saw it wailing by the roadside, went to it for a few moments of pity, and passed on. Others, men and beasts, looked at it and passed on. Then came the good Samaritan, a St. Bernard dog, who took it up in his mouth as if it had been one of its own pups, and bore it up some high steps and laid it on the door-mat of a human, and let us hope humane habitation. Many such an act of kindly beasts and birds, rebukes man's inhumanity to man and beast.

The other flock of facts is yet more closely related to our lesson—the modern instances in which God has used birds and animals to accomplish providential deliverances. Only a few days since, the writer read of a fierce dog, usually chained, who came bounding joyfully one Sunday toward a man who feared him, and followed him all day till in the evening this man was attacked by a robber, from whom the dog saved him, and then went back to his kennel. Another case was that of John Craig, a Scotchman, condemned in the days of John Knox, to die at the stake. He was in prison at Rome, and in some excitement was let out of prison by rioters, only to find himself in danger of dying of starvation. Praying in the edge of a wood, he heard steps, and saw a dog approach and lay something gladly at his feet, which proved to be a purse, that saved his life and enabled him to complete his escape. Sir Henry Wyatt, a knight, imprisoned, suffered from lack of warmth and food, both of which were supplied by a cat, that ventured into his dungeon and learned to love him, and so warmed him by its fur and fed him with many a pigeon. Krumacher tells of a closer parallel to Elijah: a singing bird that flew into a Christian's home, who was distressed about a debt he could not pay. The bird seemed to sing, "Fear thou not when darkness reigns." Shortly the owner came seeking the bird, and paid as a reward enough to cancel the debt.

"Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God." Many a hungry man needs a word even more than bread, a word with the bread that shall lift him out of beggary. And many who were never hungry for food are hungry for words of guidance and comfort. Those benevolent people who think only of giving bread and what it stands for, and fail to give themselves in neighborly counsels and the uplift of strong personal influence, make as great a mistake as those Jews, who, after the miraculous feeding of the five thousand, wanted more loaves of Christ to save them from work, and turned away in crowds when they found that, having fed their bodies, they wished to give their souls the bread of heaven.

On a certain Sabbath, in 1642, a young man, in frail health and deep despondency, heard from an obscure stranger who occupied for a single Sabbath, the pulpit of Dr. Edward Calamy, a sermon on the text, "Why are ye so fearful, O ye of little faith?" It was just the bread he needed. It put a new courage, almost a new soul, into him. He went to work with noble Christian aspiration, rose to great honor in Church and State, became Vice-Chancellor of Oxford University, and had among his pupils John Locke, William Penn, Dr. South, Dr. Whitby, Sir Christopher Wren, and other great men. He was Rev. John Owen. But he could never learn anything more of the strange preacher to whom he owed so much. And probably that preacher went home supposing he had accomplished little or nothing by that sermon.

The story reminds that not alone the Word of God, but the words of noble men also, become bread of heaven to build up manly, Christian lives. "Give alms of the things that are within," is the Bible's high-water mark of charity.

A missionary in India had been speaking about the "Water of Life," and pointed to a fountain close by, where people were drinking and filling their pots. A Moslem bystander said, "Your religion may be compared to a little stream of water, but Islam is like a great sea." "Yes," replied the missionary, "but there is just this difference; men drink sea water and die of thirst, while they drink of the living water and live!"

God will provide a friend in need. So the widow in Zarephath found. A poor boy, son of a widow, once said to his mother, "Seems God always hears when we scrape the bottom of the barrel." Those who have tried this "lending to the Lord" most thoroughly, are most ready to make new investments because of the dividends in joy, if not prosperity also, that such giving has brought them.

trate the truth that God feeds us by the processes of nature, and the story of the widow may illustrate that it is God no less, who feeds us when it is done through human agencies. And as the Cherith story will illustrate spiritual bread received, the Zarephath story will illustrate how we increase our spiritual supplies by ministering to others. God always sends the bread, whoever brings it.

We see the hand of God when he fed the Israelites with manna and with quails, and supplied water out of the smitten rock; also when God fed Elijah, first by the brook and then in the widow's home; also when starving Samaria was fed in the time of Elisha, by the miraculous scattering of the flocks that besieged it, and when Jericho's bitter waters were sweetened; also when Christ fed the multitudes twice on the shores of Galilee; also when he filled the nets of his fisherman disciples. (Are there other miracles of feeding besides these ten?) But were these any more the act of God, any stronger tokens of his care than his feeding of Adam, by preparing in advance mineral substances for the vegetables to feed on, and vegetable substances for the animals to feed on, and vegetable and animal substances for man to feed on? And does the potato cease to be God's gift, because he gave man skill to improve it by cross-breeding and cultivation? And does bread cease to be God's gift because we must follow back from mother to baker, and from baker to farmer, and from the farmer to the ground, before we find black frock-coat, not much the worse for wear—for two-pence, and the next Sunday he appeared at the mission, and walked proudly up the aisle.

As for orphanages and orphan schools for boys, girls, and infants, there are over 150 of these in London. Take the Stockwell Orphanage as a type of all. It was founded by the late Charles Haddon Spurgeon, of beloved memory, and the president to-day is Thomas Spurgeon, and the Vice-President Charles Spurgeon. It affords a home and school for five hundred boys and girls, and aids, besides, in the maintenance of the Spurgeon Seaside Home during the summer months.

Every branch of charitable work has its own particular organ, the total number amounting to nearly a hundred. One of the most unique of these publications is the National Waifs' Magazine, written, edited, and published by waifs of London, who have come into the shelter of one of Dr. Barnardo's Homes. These Homes are incorporated as "The National Waifs' Association," and they are far the most important charity for homeless children in all London. The Association now provides a Christian and industrial training for nearly 7,000 poor children. In the various Homes, since their foundation forty years ago, over 50,000 destitute boys and girls have been rescued. The Homes comprise 11 mission branches and 95 separate Homes, including 49 cottage homes for girls in the suburbs; also a Home for little boys at Jersey; a Home for babies called "Babies' Castle;" not to speak of a hospital for waif children, an "open-all-night" refuge; a labor house for destitute youths too old to enter the boys' homes; emigration houses at Toronto and Peterboro, Canada; an emigration farm of 10,000 acres in Manitoba, Canada; and thirteen other branch institutions in London, under the common name of "An Ever-open Door." There is no other institution in England which does so much good for so many children, and, so far as I personally know, the only work for children that can compare with it for extent of operations, is the work of supporting 5,500 orphans in India, by the subscribers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

The chief patron of the Waifs' Association is the Queen. It is the unofficial Waifs' Society for the whole nation and all the churches. It admits waifs who have been rejected by every other society. It has nearly 1,300 suffering little children in its care, the number being more than the aggregate of child patients in the four largest hospitals in London. It maintains nearly a thousand babies, thus constituting the largest infant orphan asylum in the world. To all the boys capable of learning trades, careful technical instruction is given. The Association has placed nearly 16,000 trained children in Canada.

Another admirable work for children is that of the Princess Mary Village Homes for little girls, at Addlestone, in Surrey. This is one of the most picturesque as well as useful institutions for the training of girls. It is not a summer institution, but permanent, all-the-year-round work. These Homes constitute in themselves really a training-school for servants, for here they are taught all the arts of housekeeping, cooking, cleaning, waiting, etc. I took the train out to Addlestone, and found the girls living in twenty delightfully situated cottages—180 girls in all. They were chiefly the children of prisoners and of others in unfortunate circumstances. To me, this seemed the happiest colony in all England.

This is now the season for the numerous charitable enterprises which have for their object summer relief for the children of London. Foremost among these schemes, of course, are the various Fresh-Air funds—called here the "F. A. F." One never knows just which F. A. F. a newspaper refers to, but we do know that wherever those letters appear in an appeal for funds, many little children are to be taken from the tenements into the country, or to the seaside, for a change of air and for rest, just as two thousand children are now received yearly as guests of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Home at Mont-Lawn. The principal F. A. F. this year has given over 25,000 children a one-day's outing in the country. This particular F. A. F. is supported entirely by the poor themselves.

In order that even the Jewish children of London may have the outing also, the officials of one F. A. F. have arranged to supply such children with kosher rolls, during the trip. These rolls are wrapped in little bags, on which a notice stating contents is printed in Yiddish and English. I stopped one day, at what is called the F. A. F. retreat. There I saw an immense pile of eggs. "These eggs are all hard boiled," said the matron, "and they are for the Jewish children, who prefer them to the kosher rolls."

The greatest F. A. F. of all has provided, during the last twelve years, no fewer than 1,050,000 poor children with a day's outing, with plenty to eat and drink. Over 150,000 will be added this summer.

But, besides the F. A. F.'s, there are scores of Homes, like Mont Lawn, where the children are kept for a week or two. The Spurgeon Seaside Home has already been mentioned. Hundreds of children are taken there during the summer. Then there are numbers of Homes where as many as 500 children are taken at a time, on a kind of camping expedition. The girls included in these expeditions are quartered in neighboring farmhouses, but the boys camp out, in rough style, in tents, in the open fields and in the woods.

Then there are the country Homes for "Nobody's Children." These include the Fresh-Air-Homes for news-boys, vendors, beggars, and the like, who in all the world have no kith nor kin. These poor boys, and girls too, are taken at their own word as to being "Nobody's Children," and are sent to the Homes as vacancies occur. Many are sent out of the city to farmers on the "boarding-out" plan. One of the advertisements of "Nobody's Children" is worth quoting. I treads: "Sunshine on the face of a slum child at the seashore costs less than one penny per hour. Hundreds of wistful little faces are waiting to be lit up. How much brightness can you afford to give?"

After the children, come the factory girls, who have for their benefit the "Factory Girls' Country Holiday Fund." This fund sends girls to the country not only in summer, but throughout the year. The number of women and girls sent away thus last year was 3,600. In London, there are altogether more than 2,000 charitable enterprises. These provide for every conceivable form of distress or need, and the workers who give their services in the various causes form a great legion.

Besides these there are "Ambulance Brigades," Nursing Homes, Discharged Prisoners' Societies, Invalids' Homes, Vigilance Societies, and no end of associations of all sorts for all whom one can possibly think of as needing help. There are at least a dozen "Associations for Distressed Gentlefolks," which provide small pensions for ladies and gentlemen who have seen better days and are now destitute. These distressed English "gentlefolks" may be compared to the class which Dr. Klopsch, in his reports from Cuba in 1898, referred to as "Silent Sufferers;" that is, needy persons whose pride would not allow them to beg, and whose distress would never be heard of if the world waited for the direct word of appeal from them individually.

Further, there are associations for the aid of governesses and teachers, a pension fund for newspaper men, and even a fund, and a large one, for distressed or old literary workers. There are Homes for the dying, homeless poor societies, surgical aid societies, and endless "Rests" for servant girls and old people.

Finally, we must not forget the work of the Charity Organization Society. It is conducted on the same lines as the one in New York, and is known as the Society for Organizing Charitable Relief and Repressing Mendicancy. The present most important work of the Society is that of directing public attention to the evil policy that permits children to beg on the streets, thus teaching them the very calling that all this monumental charity of London is seeking to obliterate—namely, begging.

A VETERAN AT REST

HALE and strong to the last, clear and vigorous in mind, Bishop F. D. Huntington has paid the debt of nature in his eighty-sixth year. While pending a few weeks of rest at the farm dence, his elder son, a professor at Dartmouth College, passed away on the same day, at the age of sixty-four. He had been ill of typhoid, and was in an extremely weak condition when the despatch announcing the death of his father was received. He felt the shock severely and gradually sank from that moment, and died in a few hours.

Bishop Huntington was brought up in the Congregational Church. His mother was famous in her day, owing to her trial by the church with which she was connected on the charge of holding Unitarian doctrines, and she was excluded from the church. Her son followed her into the Unitarian Church. He studied at Amherst and in the Divinity School at Harvard, and subsequently became a professor in the latter university. Lowell and Longfellow were members of the faculty at the same time. For some time he was pastor of the South Congregational Church. In 1860, however, he withdrew from that denomination and was ordained a deacon in the Protestant Episcopal Church. His charge was the Emmanuel Church of Boston, Mass., of which he was rector until 1869, when he was elected Bishop of Central New York.

The Bishop was a man of abounding energy, and took a deep interest in public affairs, especially those affecting the condition of labor. His sympathy with the burdens of the working man and his efforts to alleviate them were unwearied. It was humorously said of him that "it might be hoped he would have rest and pleasure in the next world, for he had enjoyed neither in this." He was a frequent contributor to the press, and the author of several popular religious books

DIVINE GUIDANCE

HOW many men in the presence of a great calamity, or when seeing the triumph of some monstrous injustice, have asked the question, "Does God really care about what goes on in this world?" The theory back of this question is that God has set the world going, much as a man might wind up a clock, and then left it to run its course, without check or interference. There are many circumstances in life which lend color to such a theory, but that is only because we have so imperfect a knowledge of them. We see a good man beset by misfortune, and all his schemes failing. Another man, evil in life and vile in purpose, succeeds and becomes wealthy. It would seem that in a world under the control of a righteous God, the good man ought always to prosper.

But would such a method of governing the world be really wise? Would it develop the highest kind of character? It would be practically a system of bribery, in which a man would receive pay for doing things that he ought to do without pay. No strong, noble character would be produced under such a system. Men must never expect to be guided so as to escape adversity. They must not conclude, when adversity comes upon them, that God did not guide them. He may have led them into that very path in order that they might undergo the discipline that he saw that they needed.

How may we obtain guidance? When the ways are open and we know not which to take, and ask God to direct us, how are we to gather the indications of his will? Some people open their Bible at random and expect to get light from the first passage that meets the eye. But it is not by such means that God reveals his will. Let the person who is undecided, pray earnestly to be led aright. Then let him use the faculties which God has given him, to weigh the merits of the two courses. Take care that no unworthy motives influence the mind, consider the advantages and disadvantages of each course, to others as well as to yourself, and then decide, asking God to bless the course chosen. The result may not be the one expected, but if there is reliance on God and confidence in his wisdom and love, there can be no doubt of its being the course that he wishes us to take.

In thine hand it is to make great. At the battle of Crecy, the Black Prince, who was leading the van of the English army, was hard pressed by the enemy. He sent a messenger for help to his father, the king, who was on a hill overlooking the battle. No help was sent, so the prince sent another messenger with a more urgent appeal. To him the king answered: "Go tell my son, that I am not so inexperienced a commander as not to know when succor is needed; nor so careless a father, as not to send it at the right time."

To give strength unto all. "What a rough time I am having," said the young oak as the winds blew against it and bent it. "I wish I was in a more sheltered place." But the winds continued to blow and the storms raged and the young oak said, "Since I am here, I must adapt myself to my situation and as the storms will come I must prepare for them." So it sent its roots deep into the soil and spread them around on every side. When the storms raged they could do nothing against it, for its anchorage was firm and the oak grew strong.

All that is in heaven and earth is thine. A business man was considering an opportunity of removing to another city. He was fairly prosperous where he was, but the prospects seemed brighter in the other location. He prayed earnestly for guidance, and finally decided to go. The result was financial disaster. A man who knew him taunted him with his trust in prayer having misled him. "Wait and see," said the ruined man, "this may not be the end." He was brought very low and was in great straits, but an opportunity of doing Christian work opened. It was of a kind he was peculiarly fitted to do, and being idle, he embraced it. It was greatly blessed, and though he never regained prosperity he was abundantly useful and contended that thus God answered his prayer.

GROWING STRONG ON

Eskay's Food

These two pictures show the growth from babyhood to healthy childhood on ESKAY'S FOOD, of the little daughter of a Pennsylvania physician. When two days old she was poisoned with carbolic acid, and not only made a wonderful recovery on ESKAY'S FOOD, but lived on it until she was two years old.

ESKAY'S FOOD modifies cow's milk by breaking up the tough, leathery, cheesy masses into soft, flocculent, and easily digested curds. It is the most convenient, economical, and efficient modification of cow's milk known. The egg supplies the albumen or tissue-building element; sugar of milk supplies the heat and energy producing elements; and the whole assures a perfect nutrient, especially for weak stomachs. No other food compares with it. It nourishes so perfectly that no baby is so ill or sickly as not to be immediately helped by it. Babies fed upon it thrive during the hottest weather and teethe without trouble. It has been frequently prescribed exclusively in severe cases of cholera infantum with uniformly successful results.

If you have a baby you ought to know about ESKAY'S FOOD. Write us to-day for a generous sample and our invaluable book, "How to Care for the Baby." They are free on request.

SMITH, KLINE & FRENCH CO., 427 Arch Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

ESKAY'S FOOD is served exclusively in the Children's Playground and also at the ESKAY'S FOOD exhibit in the Agriculture Building, and in the Incubator Building on the Pike at the St. Louis Exposition.

RACE DONE?

Not a Bit of It.

A man who thought his race was run made a food find that brought him back to perfect health.

"One year ago I was unable to perform any labor; in fact, I was told by my physicians that they could do nothing further for me. I was fast sinking away, for an attack of grip had left my stomach so weak it could not digest any food sufficient to keep me alive.

"There I was, just wasting away, growing thinner every day, and weaker, really being snuffed out simply because I could not get any nourishment from food.

"Then my sister got after me to try Grape-Nuts food, which had done much good for her, and she finally persuaded me, and although no other food had done me the least bit of good, my stomach handled the Grape-Nuts from the first, and this food supplied the nourishment I had needed. In three months I was so strong I moved from Albany to San Francisco, and now on my three meals of Grape-Nuts and cream every day, I am strong and vigorous, and do fifteen hours work.

"I believe the sickest person in the world could do as I do, eat three meals of nothing but Grape-Nuts and cream, and soon be on their feet again in the flush of best health like me.

"Not only am I in perfect physical health again, but my brain is stronger and clearer than it ever was on the old diet. I hope you will write to the names I send you about Grape-Nuts, for I want to see my friends well and strong.

"Just think that a year ago I was dying, but to-day, although I am over 55 years of age, most people take me to be less than 40, and I feel just as young as I look." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

There's a reason.

OUR "LITTLE MOTHERS" AT MONT-LAWN

ONE of the pleasantest features at our Children's Home at Mont-Lawn—and one that is very gratifying to the visitor—is the evident care which the teachers have taken to impress upon the boys, the idea that they should pay a certain deference to the girls. Especially is this shown when the Superintendent, Miss Collins, strikes the big gong on the piazza of the main building, as a signal that the children are wanted. It is a pretty sight to see them running from all directions, deserting their play, the swings and gymnasium, the ball-field, and all the other places where they find their recreation:

"Little mothers" gather their brood about them, carrying the smallest child, if it cannot run fast enough, and soon they are forming into a long line in front of the house.

over her heart and looking at the other girl most reproachfully, she added, "and if you have any trouble, or feel bad, you just keep it in your own heart, and don't be making other people unhappy."

This seemed to be a new view of the situation, and the two girls were soon as merry as could be, forgetting all care and trouble, which come to the children of the poor very early in life, as they whirled around in the flying swings.

Many very interesting letters are coming to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, but for lack of space, only a few can be published, although all contributions will be acknowledged through the paper. One letter is dated at Lakewood, N. J., and says:

Please find enclosed a check for $124 and a money

MARCHING FROM THE DINING-TENT FOR A ROMP ON THE LAWN

Along the walk which leads to the big dining-tent, the boys stand in couples, and at the end of the line that of the girls begins. One might naturally think that by this arrangement the boys would take precedence. By no means. At one tap of the bell, all come to order; two taps, and the boys step out into two columns, in single file, while between them the girls march sedately, accepting this escort as a matter of course. When they have passed, the boys close up and march to their places at the long tables. Here all stand, both boys and girls, until a little grace is sung, beginning

God is great, and God is good,
And we thank him for our food

Then, at another tap of the bell, in the centre of the tent, the two hundred little ones seat themselves and fall to with appetites whetted to a keen edge by the pure country air, and the various phases of open air life and healthful surroundings. There is no hurrying, no "gobbling," such as one might look for and easily excuse; but each child seems to be confident that there will be plenty to eat, and sufficient time in which to eat it. And they are never disappointed, for the fare is bountiful and wholesome. Some of the children have evidently been used to a diet of dry bread and tea, and anything different from such miserable fare is such a surprise that they hardly know how to receive it. But they soon learn.

Our illustration on this page shows the girls as they are leaving the tent—a jolly, happy crowd, ready to break up into groups some of them, singing, others telling stories, or listening to the teachers who read and talk with them; while still others, in twos and threes, with entwining arms, wander about the grounds, those who have been at Mont-Lawn before, imparting to the new-comers the delights that await them.

One little girl attracted the writer's attention by furtively wiping her eyes, when she thought no one was looking. On being asked what was the matter, she replied:

"Oh, night is coming and my mamma will want me, and—and—(it was her first night at the Home) I shall want her."

"Now, what do you think of that?" asked a black-eyed, curly-haired little girl, who had been expostulating with the tearful one. "Her mamma has got seven other children at home, and I came away and left my mamma all alone. My papa is sick and in the hospital, and my mamma said, 'You go to Mont-Lawn if you get a chance, and you just be happy,' and"—here the black eyes took on a most solemn expression, and clasping her hands order for two dollars from the Sunbeams of Lakewood. These Sunbeams held a fair one very stormy day in April, and the little girls composing the Society were anxious, lest they should be unable to send as many little children into the country this year as they did last; but Fresh-Air Work has many friends in Lakewood, and in spite of the storm they are able to send forty-two children to Mont Lawn, which is seven more than they sent last season. The Sunbeams send their best wishes for the happiness and well being of these little ones, and hope you will find the poorest, and also some cripples, so that they may have a good time, for at least ten days. With best wishes for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, we are

THE SUNBEAMS OF LAKEWOOD, N. J.

Helen Disbrow, President; Harriet Harrer, Vice-President; Ethel Wright, Secretary; Ramona Sampson, Treasurer; Marie White, Cecilia Emerson. Helped by Paul Emerson, Bowdoin Plumer, Lester Wright, Winifred and Harold Fowler.

The thanks of all the good people interested in the work at Mont-Lawn are certainly due these young people for their very generous gift, and the fact that the "Sunbeams" earned the money themselves, is surely worthy of another credit mark. If each "Sunbeam" could see the happiness which their gift will bring to only one child, they would be very much gratified; but when this joy is multiplied by forty-two, there would seem to be no end to the far-reaching influence of their generosity. May each "Sunbeam" shine the brighter for her loving thought of the poor.

Twenty-one dollars endows a cot for the whole season at Mont-Lawn, and thus ensures a vacation for seven children. Three dollars will send one little one for ten days.

A little booklet, published by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, beautifully illustrated, describing Mont-Lawn and the work done there, will be mailed free to anyone sending their address, or that of a friend who might be interested.

Many of the children who go to Mont-Lawn have scanty clothing, and that of the poorest kind. Especially is this the case with some of the boys. A ragged shirt and a pair of well-worn "overalls" oftentimes make up the sum of their wardrobe. Kind friends of the Home have been generous in sending boxes of half-worn clothing, packages which it does one's heart good to see opened, but most of the clothing is for girls, and so, like Old Mother Hubbard's dog, the poor boys get none. Any articles of clothing for children, especially blouses, suitable for boys from five to ten years of age, will be very gratefully received. The "Volunteer Organist" Dead

Victor H. Benke, Musical Leader of The Bowery Mission, Passes Away

VICTOR H. BENKE, the well-known organist of the Bowery Mission and the composer of many well-known, beautiful Gospel hymns, died in the Presbyterian Hospital, of spinal meningitis, on Friday morning, July 15.

In addition to his duties as organist of the Mission, Mr. Benke for the last twelve months has acted as assistant to the Rev. F. H. Jacobs, Superintendent of the old Fulton Street Prayer Meeting. Whilst Mr. Jacobs was absent at the Sunday School Convention in Palestine, the full responsibility of the Fulton Street Meeting, together with all the office work connected with the Twentieth Century movement, devolved upon Mr. Benke. Although suffering severely for several weeks, he bravely held on to his duties until May 17, on which occasion the last of the winter concerts at the Bowery Mission was given. No one present at that concert will ever forget the wan and pathetic expression on the sufferer's face, as he went through his onerous duties for the last time.

THE LATE VICTOR H. BENKE

During his long illness at the hospital he was unconscious most of the time, but in his lucid intervals he gave every evidence of his unflinching interest in his beloved work of saving souls, and of the fact of his thorough reliance upon God in his dire extremity. The same steadfast faith in God upheld him in all his conscious moments.

Mr. Benke was born in Ratibor, Austria. His father was of Polish descent and his mother a Frenchwoman. Mr. Benke passed with credit through the High School of the city and was trained for a civil engineer. The family was an intensely musical one, and Mr. Benke, Sr., although an amateur, gave his two sons a splendid training in all the branches of the art. The elder son, Ernest Benke, became one of the most prominent violoncello players in Europe, occupying the position as soloist in the two great orchestral bands under Sir Charles Halle and Sir Augustus Mann. He died some twelve years ago, in Manchester, England. The other son, Victor, came to this country a few years after his father's and mother's death. Landing in New York and falling in with evil companions, he soon spent the money he had brought with him, and became one of the great army of homeless men on the Bowery. In the summer of 1894, his dramatic entry to the Bowery Mission took place—the story of which is already familiar to our readers—and almost ever since then, he has acted as organist of the Mission.

In 1898, he was introduced to Mr. Moody, and in all of the latter's great meetings during the last few years of his life Mr. Benke always acted as organist. He became installed as one of the Gospel Song composers of which Mr. Ira D. Sankey was the principal, and in many recent publications of sacred songs Mr. Benke's music have prominently appeared.

Some five years ago, he organized the Bowery Mission Male Quartette, he himself taking a part. This Quartette has sung in nearly all the prominent churches in the Eastern States. Mr. Benke was also in great demand for organ recitals. During the last two winters he gave a weekly concert in the Mission for the special edification of the residents of the lodging-houses. These concerts were attended by upwards of thirty thousand men.

For several years past Mr. Benke was one of the regular leaders of the Bowery Mission, and was greatly blessed as a soul-winner. He became an eloquent speaker, and had a great fund of quiet, dry humor. He enjoyed the absolute confidence of the great Bowery masses, who found him in all things a thoroughly devoted and consistent Christian. Hundreds have been won to Christ directly through his instrumentality.

Arrangements were made for the funeral service at the Mission, to be conducted by the Rev. F. H. Jacobs, Dr. Klopsch, Mrs. Bird and others being among the speakers, and the principal hymns being from Mr. Benke's own compositions.

The Luther Statue at Speyer.

Hon. Charles A. Schieren, Ex-Mayor of Brooklyn, announces that all arrangements for the unveiling of the Luther Statue and dedication of the Cathedral at Speyer, Germany, have now been completed. The festivities promise to be a notable event. Several Protestant princes and other dignitaries are expected to be present, also representatives of ten universities and over twenty high dignitaries of the Lutheran Church in the German Empire. Contributors to the Statue Fund who desire to participate in the celebration will receive a hearty welcome and will have special attention from the Committee. Applications for cards of admission should be made as early as possible, either on arrival in Europe, or before departure from America. Address all communications to Prof. Guembel, Chairman of the Committee, Speyer am Rhein, Germany. It is hoped that a large delegation of Lutherans from America will be present.

A Church's Rapid Growth

On Sunday, July 3, an unusual scene was witnessed in the First Presbyterian Church of Los Angeles, Calif., of which the Rev. Frank DeWitt Talmage is pastor. One hundred and twenty-five new members stood up before the altar and united with the church, being the largest addition at any one time in its history. At the last communion ninety-nine new members joined, making 224 added to the church since Dr. Talmage became its pastor in January last.

The War in the Far East

Viceroy Alexieff, on July 12, telegraphed to St. Petersburg a report that the Japanese had lost 30,000 men in an attack on Port Arthur on Sunday and Monday, July 10 and 11. The report is discredited.

Japanese continue to advance in the land campaign, notwithstanding the rains. Three armies, under Kuroki, Oku and Nodzu, are apparently closing in upon Kourapatkin. The Japanese have occupied Yinkow, the port of New Chwang, and the occupation of the latter is imminent.

FAIR FOLKS

Don't Blame Nature, But Investigate.

Many claim they are nervous "by nature," when it is really only because they are slaves to the coffee or tea habit, and this is easily proved by cutting out the coffee or tea for ten days and using well boiled Postum Food Coffee instead—then comes the change.

"I seemed endowed by nature with a nervous constitution," says a lady of Knoxville, Tenn., "and although I felt tea and coffee were bad for me, the force of habit was so strong I just couldn't give them up.

"Someone suggested that I try cereal coffee, but I remembered what insipid drinks we used under that name during the Civil War, and so without ever looking into the subject, or realizing what progress science has made in this direction, I just wouldn't give Postum a trial, until finally the W. C. T. U. in our city started an exchange where there were so many calls for Postum, it was served regularly, and many were thus induced to try it, myself among the number. How delighted I was to find it so agreeable, delicious and satisfying. As I had suffered from nervous prostration, a change from tea and coffee was imperative, but all these troubles disappeared after I had used the Postum faithfully for a few weeks.

"A sister and a son-in-law were converted to Postum at the same time, and now we all enjoy it as well as we ever did coffee, but instead of making us nervous, like coffee, we enjoy steady nerves, sleep sound, and are in every way better for the change." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

This lady found what she thought was natural nervousness was only due to an acquired taste for coffee that is to some people a sure destroyer of nerves and health. Like her, anyone who cuts off coffee altogether and uses well boiled Postum in its place, will be greatly benefited after a few days and the return to health is a joyful journey.

God's Messenger

By MRS. M. BAXTER

ELIJAH is mentioned sixteen times in the New Testament. The first mention of him is in the first verse of our chapter: "And Elijah the Tishbite, who was of the sojourners of Gilead, said unto Ahab, As the Lord God of Israel liveth, before whom I stand, there shall not be dew nor rain these years but according to my word" (R.V.). How came it that this man, of whom nothing is mentioned before in this book of Kings, should come thus suddenly upon the scene, and reprove royalty with his one credential: I stand before Jehovah? Men do not, without thought and purpose, thus risk bringing down upon them the wrath and enmity of the powers that be. The apostle James gives us the clue. He tells us that Elijah was a man of like nature with us. And he prayed with prayer that it might not rain, and it rained not upon the earth for three years and six months (James 5: 17, R.V., marg.). And he introduces this statement with the words, "The supplication of a righteous man availeth much in its working" (ver. 16, R.V.).

What could have induced Elijah to pray thus for a drought which could not but bring famine in its wake? He saw Israel given to idolatry; he saw his God "a stranger in the land" (Jer. 14: 8), of which he had said, "The land is mine;" and the burden of the Lord came upon his heart, and filled him with a zeal for the Lord who was dishonored, which consumed him. He was jealous for his God, and he pitied his people. Therefore, Elijah gave himself to prayer.

God had said (Lev. 26: 19, 20) to his people, if they would not hearken unto him, but broke his covenant, "I will make your heaven as iron, and your earth as brass, and your strength shall be spent in vain; for your land shall not yield her increase, neither shall the trees of the land yield their fruit." He had sent them word by Moses (Deut. 11: 16, 17) that, if they turned aside to idols, the anger of the Lord would be kindled against them, and he would shut up the heaven that there be no rain; and again (Deut. 28: 15, 23, 24), Elijah knew these Scriptures; he saw his God rejected, and the people, which had departed from him, wretched in their sin, and in its consequences. He had no power to awaken them, and they were perishing; idolatry had taken root in the land; the children were educated in it; what was to be done? He saw in Lev. 26: 40-42, that when judgment has done its work, and the people shall accept the punishment of their iniquity, then God will remember his covenant and the land.

And Elijah prayed; he dared to pray: "Lord, send this judgment; there is no other way; fulfil thy Word; make heaven brass; shut heaven that there be no rain." And God answered him. But a man who is so yielded up to God that he can thus reason with him, must be utterly at his disposal. Elijah must take this message to the court? And his declared authority was that he was already a member of a higher court, where he had audience of the King of all other kings. Men might mock at him, but, face to face with his God, he feared not nor cared what man should say or do. But, Elijah, hast thou considered that if a king upon his throne shall feel the pinch of hunger when no rain comes, much more thou, a mere sojourner from across Jordan? Such considerations would not have been entertained by Elijah, although there is little doubt that the enemy plied him with them.

But God sends none of his servants a warfare on their own charges (1. Cor. 9: 7). The word of the Lord came to him again; but this time it was not to give him some great prophetic message: it was in fatherly care for the instrument that he was using: "Get thee hence, and turn thee eastward, and hide thyself by the brook Cherith, that is before Jordan. And it shall be that thou shalt drink of the brook, and I have commanded the ravens to feed thee there."

INVEST $10 A MONTH

Where the money will work for you 24 hours every day; where it will be absolutely safe, and where it will pay you large dividends

I own some shares of stock in an old established money-making enterprise.

And I want to sell you one or two shares of this stock for 50 per cent. less than it is really worth.

You can pay cash for it or you can buy it on the easy payment plan of $10 down and $10 a month if you prefer.

I do not care to sell you more than a few shares, as I have but a limited number, and I want to distribute them in a way that will bring me as many new customers as possible for my investment department.

MY MOTIVE

My motive in offering you stock for less than it is worth is purely a selfish one.

I want to add your name to my list of well-pleased investors.

I know that if you invest a few dollars through me, you will be so pleased with the investment that the next time you have money to invest you will come to me.

And you will send your friends to me.

And your friends will in turn send their friends.

A dozen well-pleased clients send more business than hundreds of dollars' worth of magazine and newspaper advertising.

If you buy a few shares of this stock it will be a safe, profitable investment for you and the best kind of an advertisement for me.

One year ago I had less than 100 clients in my investment department.

Now I have nearly 800.

In another year I want two or three times 800.

And that is the reason I want you.

LET'S GET ACQUAINTED

If you invest some money with me, we will get acquainted.

And when we get acquainted you will find that what I offer you is just what I say it is.

You will find that you can safely invest your savings through me.

You will find that I will look after your money just as carefully as I look after my own.

You will find that if you invest your money through me it will earn the largest possible profit consistent with safety.

I am a young man.

I expect to be in active business for the next 25 years.

And even if I wanted to sell you something worthless; even if I wanted to misrepresent the value of this stock, I couldn't afford to do it.

You know as well as I, that if the investments I offer do not turn out just as I represented, it would soon ruin my business.

I certainly cannot afford to have my business ruined.

I can't afford to take even a chance.

Just the Real Estate Department of my business is worth $1,000,000.

At least it pays me good interest on that amount.

It took hard work, energy, enthusiasm and square dealing to build it up to its present size.

Do you suppose I would risk even injuring it by even trying to sell you a single share of stock through any misrepresentation?

If I were not sure it would be one of the best investments you could make, I could not afford to offer it to you.

I have put my money into it.

My sister owns some of the shares.

Two other relatives of mine have invested several thousand dollars in it.

Isn't this irrefutable proof of my faith in this enterprise?

Isn't it proof that it will pay you to get in touch with my investment department?

Will you let me send you full, interesting and convincing particulars?

I not only act as fiscal agent for a few picked companies, but I can, at any time, negotiate the purchase of bonds or securities of any kind for any of my clients. If a client calls for something which I know to be absolutely safe and desirable in every way, I will get it for him.

If he calls for something which I do not consider all that it should be, I will not buy it for him, no matter what commission is offered.

I want you to invest your savings through me.

It makes no difference whether you have $10, $100 or $1,000 a month to invest. Let me show you where your idle dollars will safely earn large dividends.

Write me to-day (a postal card will do) saying simply, "Send information about investment as advertised in The Christian Herald" Do It Now

Funeral of "The Volunteer Organist" at the Bowery Mission

OUR MAIL-BAG IS THE CHURCH FOR SAINTS OR FOR SINNERS?

OUR invitation to readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to freely express their views on this question has brought out a very large number of responses, showing the general interest in the topic. We give a number of these letters below:

The Apostolic Rule On the Subject

I THINK the Apostle Peter has settled this question aright, when, by the Spirit, he said, "Of a truth, I perceive that God is no respecter of persons, but in every nation he that feareth him and worketh righteousness is accepted with him." This is in harmony with the teaching of our Saviour, who said, "I came, not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance." Jesus established his church, and expressed in his own words and through his inspired apostles the conditions on which the people were to be received into it. These conditions, in brief, are faith, repentance, formal confession and baptism. This is being born again, or "fearing God and working righteousness." All who comply with these conditions, without regard to nationality or previous station or condition of life, should be immediately received into the full membership of the Church, and entitled to all its privileges. This was the practice of the apostles who preached the Gospel under the last commission of the Saviour, and this teaching and practice is a safe rule for us to follow.

St. John, N. B., Canada.

J. F. FLOYD.

Even the Prodigal is Welcome

FORTUNATELY our dear Lord himself has answered this very question in no uncertain words in the beautiful parable of "The Prodigal Son." His father saw him when yet a long ways off and ran to meet him. He didn't wait for the son to prove that he was truly repentant and put him with the servants for six months on probation, but gave him a robe and a ring at once, and made him so welcome that he doubtless wondered how he could possibly have stayed away so long and also to vow never to go away again. Is the servant better than his Lord? It is the duty of the Church to gather in the sinners, out of whom God makes saints.

Philadelphia, Pa.

C. R. B.

Drawing the Line

AS in the first century, so now, "The Church" is a company of believers in Christ "called to be saints," who are banded together under certain rules or statements of faith, for the purpose of advancing Christ's Kingdom in the salvation of sinners. It is impossible to conceive of a church organized for this purpose composed wholly of "sinners," the unregenerate; and equally impossible to conceive of a church efficient for such a work composed of half saints and half sinners. In the elements of its life or bearing, therefore, the Church is composed wholly of those who have at least professed to have passed from death unto life. But the Church thus constituted and organized, is for a specific purpose—the advancing of Christ's Kingdom on earth in the salvation of sinners. So, certainly, it is the pre-eminent responsibility of the Church to engage in this work everywhere, and for all time.

Buffalo, N. Y.

A. R. DARROW.

No Sinner Should be Turned Away

THE Church is for both saints and sinners. I can easily see how a self-righteous, worldly Church might bar the sinner from its doors. But I cannot imagine how any Church, accepting the life of Jesus as its guiding star, can refuse admission to any one, no matter how sinful they may have been in the past, if they come asking admission in the right spirit of meekness and humility, and thenceforward live good Christian lives. We must remember the Church is not a heaven, a paradise on earth, but a place to prepare for that heaven above; a place to learn the way of salvation; and so, let us take in our sinful brothers and sisters, and teach them the way of salvation so kindly and efficiently that they may gladly sing with the hymn-writer.

Leontia, N. Y.

PARKER KNAPP.

For Part Saint, Part Sinner

IT is for neither, but for a class that is "part saint and part sinner." No one should be excluded, as long as there is the least evidence of a desire to change heart and life. But no one should be put into prominence, save as their life shows fruits of their profession.

Newark, N. Y.

E. E. DEMPSEY.

"Probation is a Good Plan"

IF Jesus can forgive sins and own sinners as his own, after they repent, can not we, the professed followers of Christ, forgive them? If God can bring them into his kingdom, can we not let them enter the Church? God has no respect of persons; he loves us all, and there is room in heaven for all. I believe it is right in the sight of God to let any person enter the Church as a member, after he repents and is baptized, confesses a newness of heart and promises to live a new life, and by God's grace to keep from sin as far as he can. I believe that a period of probation is a good plan, and is beneficial.

Providence, R. I.

MRS. GRACE HOOK.

"No Admittance" for the Sinner

THE Church is for saints. The unbelieving, irreligious sinner should not be admitted to membership in the Church of Christ. He would be a stumbling-block and a cause of offence. All should be allowed fellowship with God's people who have repented of their sins, and have made restitution. A period of probation is necessary to test and prove their worthiness to become full members. The true Christian attitude is God's love for his children, in provision given through the Gospel of Jesus Christ, the Lord. Which is salvation to all who will come, believing and accepting Jesus as their personal Saviour, Redeemer and Sanctifier. The line should be drawn in the world between the flesh and the spirit, in Jesus' name. In earth between the Christian Church and the self-righteous, through the Holy Spirit, in the Lord's name. The letting down of the barriers, and the indiscriminate admission of all who apply, will result in making the Church weaker, if the Church is not spiritually strong enough to make them godly. The Church is the fold of spiritual safety for God's children, and all who have accepted him through Christ in the spirit, should be received in love, and fed as his lambs and sheep. I do testify to having fed, in the Church of Christ, his lambs, in the spirit and in love.

Stevenson, Mont.

MRS. FRANCES I. MCCREA.

To Admit Sinners Would Depreciate the Church

THE admission of the unconverted into the Church, would defeat the purpose for which it was primarily established. The Church should stand as the world's ideal of all that is elevating, pure and noble. Since this is true, the qualifications prerequisite to membership should be based upon the scriptural standard, if the Church is to survive. Any departure therefrom is certain to be attended with unsatisfactory results. The Church is safe in the world, but not with the world in it. If one sinner is admitted to the Church, why not all? The evil emanating from such a course would far outweigh the good. The Church would be looked upon in a depreciatory manner, instead of that reverence which has ever been its portion. Once in, he might be lulled to sleep and lose all interest in seeking to attain the new birth, the only way, according to the teachers of the Bible, by which one can be saved.

Crewe, Va.

ALEX. H. WYNN.

Let the Repentant Ones In

UNDOUBTEDLY the Church is composed of the two elements! Have we not all sinned and fallen short? And is it not, therefore, our duty as professing Christians, to extend a helping hand to a weaker brother, who gives evidence of sincere repentance, encouraging and strengthening him to look to the alone Source of Help to know an overcoming of evil. Such repentant ones should, I think, be received into church membership, remembering, "There shall be joy in heaven over one sinner that repenteth, more than over ninety and nine righteous persons which need no repentance" (Luke 15: 7, R. V.). How encouraging is this! We ourselves need much mercy, so let our hearts be imbued to show mercy to the fallen.

Philadelphia, Pa.

An Aged Christian's View

ABOUT seventy years ago I united with a Christian Church. My experience teaches me that the Great Head of the Church intended His Church should be composed of those only who are saved by his grace. Our daily life should be such that sinners will see we are Christlike, and anxious for their salvation. When the spirit moves in answer to our prayers, they will be brought under its divine influence, and thus partake of the nature of Christ and become fit subjects for the Church, and should be received into full fellowship.

"Make no Concessions"

IF we admit everyone who applies for membership, we would admit many sinners, therefore probation and critical examination before admittance is advisable. Past sin, however enormous, if truly repented for, and for which restitution has, so far as possible, been made, should not be allowed to form a barrier to the admittance of the returning prodigal son to the table of the Lord and the fellowship of his people. Make the sinner feel that he is perfectly welcome to the use of the pews in your church, that his attention to the sermon is appreciated; give him a hearty handshake when the service is over, and whenever you meet him, illustrate to him by your social conduct, that it is good to be a Christian; but make no concessions as to membership.

No Warrant for Exclusion

I BELIEVE the church was established to make saints out of sinners, therefore the sinners must enter the church to hear the Gospel of the Lord preached, and become saints. I find in the Bible that "we have all sinned and come short of the glory of God." "There is none righteous, no, not one." Such being the case, I see no reason why any number of persons should exclude anyone from going to church.

Welcome the Outcast

OF course, some rule must be laid down. If one who applies is known to be actuated by a wrong motive, he should be refused membership. But if there is doubt, give him the benefit of it. An exclusive Church degenerates and loses its spiritual power, and does not attract the lost. A "glorious Church without spot or wrinkle," should appreciate the value of a soul, and not draw lines which conflict with Christ's words, "Him that cometh unto me, I will in no wise cast out." The exclusiveness of some Churches suggests that either Christ's words are untrue, or that Church members do not really believe them. In a sense, there are no degrees of sin, for "we are sinners all." Sin being universal, no Church has a right to demand of the sinner that he wait and prove himself sincere. When man does this, he judges his fellow-man. Who can fathom a human life and know the motive of the heart, save God? The outcast should be accorded the immediate and full fellowship of the Church. Shall we heed the complaints of those, who, like the older brother, refuse to rejoice in a brother's salvation? Certainly not.

An Example in Point

I THINK the example our Saviour set us at the well of Samaria ought to assist us in deciding this question. Although the woman was very low, as far as morals were concerned, he was willing to receive her. Morals depend on the saint than on the sinner. I remember the last religious awakening we had in our church. The evangelist in a few plain words told us what our position should be toward those who were to unite with the Church. He warned us against manifesting the same spirit toward them that they did in a certain church where he held a revival. A young man had been given to theft before his conversion and for that reason they decided to take him on probation for six months. The members would come into the church Sabbath morning and see this young man standing in a certain aisle, and would avoid him by going up some other, as much as to say, "When we are satisfied you are not given to stealing any more, we will then take you into full communion," but they never had the opportunity. He went back to the world, as he naturally would under such treatment.

What Would Jesus Do?

LET us ask: what would Jesus do, if a poor, defiled sinner were to come to him and ask for admission to the kingdom, would he turn him aside, because of his load of sin and a dark past life? Ah the poor saint that would draw his robes aside lest he come too near, had better "take heed the light that is in him be not darkness." What God has cleansed we have no right to call unclean. I write because I have had my heart touched in the house of God by a proud "saint" nudging me with her elbow and saying, "There comes such a one to Church. What will we do?" My remark was simply, "Jesus died for them as well as us. Let them come."

Keep the Church Pure

LET the churches—the sanctuaries—the Temples of God be open to saint and sinner alike, but keep the Church membership as pure as possible, admitting none but those who acknowledge repentance for sin, and gladly, willingly and submissively subscribe to the Church membership requirements. Past bad deeds honestly repented of should be no bar to Christian fellowship, and the saint's business on earth is to help the sinner along in the path of the "Highway of Holiness." But Jehovah gives his loyal and true sons daughters of earth full wisdom and discretion in all such matters. The Church's influence is to enlighten the world and the sinful so that they may have a "change of heart," and thus be fit to become members and a part of the Church of the Lord Jesus—by whatever denominational name that Church may be otherwise known.

The Church is "for Saints Only"

IN my opinion, the Church is for saints only, if it is thereby meant persons eminent for piety. Saints are simply sinners saved by grace, who, having sincerely repented of their sins, and having been born again, or regenerated, are thus made new creatures in our Lord, by the power of the Holy Ghost. All who do not show by their lives that they have had their sins pardoned, and have forsaken them, and have come squarely out on the Lord's side, are indeed barred by Christ himself. Any other class of persons than such as I herein described, are aliens to the commonwealth of Israel or the Christian Church. Now, this non-conversion point is the critical error which causes the great trouble in the Church, and is the tap-root of the lack of strong Christian influence in the world to-day. Our churches are filled with unregenerated persons; man-made Christians, in other words sinners, whose carnal natures, spirit and passions still control their lives; and as a natural result, we have a weak, sickly, unfaithful, powerless church, as an agent or force, to advance Christ's Kingdom in this world.

No Probation in the Early Church

UNDER the apostolic preaching, repentance toward God, faith in Christ, and baptism, were required to make one a member of the Church. There was no probation. They were added to the Church daily, sometimes thousands in one day. If at any time it should be found that the person did not live up to his profession, or that he had joined the Church for an unholy purpose, that person should be turned out of the Church with a reprimand, as Peter did Simon. If a man comes to join the Church, saying he has accepted and fulfilled the Apostolic requirements, what right have I, knowing nothing to the contrary, to refuse him admission?

HOW THE NATIVE GIRLS ARE BEING TRAINED ON AMERICAN LINES FOR LIVES OF USEFULNESS

TO the mind of the average citizen of the United States, the greatest boon conferred upon Porto Rico by its transfer to our possession and occupation, is the establishment of public schools. But we have also learned, at no little cost, that the public school is not a panacea for all the ills that afflict Church and State, and this is especially true in a land where it lacks the prestige of time-honored custom, and among people whose poverty we can hardly realize. To attend the public schools at San Juan, for instance, a certain amount of respectable clothing, including shoes and stockings, must be worn by the children, yet for hundreds of children, the obtaining of these hitherto unknown luxuries is a practical impossibility.

Moreover, other influences are needed before the beautiful Island is fitted to take its rightful place in the ranks of civilization. The grade of a nation cannot be permanently raised, unless the lever is first placed under its stones. This can be done but indirectly through the public school. And it is this which gives the opportunity for private and church philanthropy, through the establishment of Industrial Homes and schools.

In San Turce, just outside of San Juan, is the George O. Robinson Industrial Home for Girls, under the care of the Woman's Home Mission Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church. In general characteristics, scope of work, and possibilities, it is typical, not only of what has been done in other parts of the island, but of what may be, and ought to be multiplied many-fold. The girls come from a variety of dwelling-places—they can hardly be called homes. They range from huts of cane, covered with the long fronds of the cocoanut palm, to shelters built of packing boxes, tin cans, and pieces of corrugated zinc. Some of them would make suitable shelters for hens and chickens; they are so small that a grown person cannot stand upright inside, and women and children live in them. True, they are used chiefly for sleeping, as the cooking and other work are done out of doors, and the meals are taken on the doorstep, or sitting on a log, or on the ground. The women do laundry work, as a rule, spending their money before it is earned. Doubtless the older women of this class are incapable of learning American ways of methodical work, and comfortable, cleanly living.

But the children amply repay the teaching given in an Industrial Home, where cleanliness, truth, and uprightness displace filth, deceit, and immorality.

The girls of this typical Home, under the instruction of a few teachers, not only have lessons in books, but do all the work of the large house. The supervision of the faithful superintendent, Miss H. M. Hegeman, renders the entire building fit for inspection at any moment. The girls learn by doing. They sweep, wash, scrub, sew, mend, make beds and bread, set

Such dinners usually consist of rice, yams, and a salad of cod fish, sweet oil and tomatoes, besides some fowls, usually purchased with money sent by Northern friends, and tenderly cared for until the day of the dinner. The girls enjoy themselves thoroughly.

These are the girls who, under God, are to help make the new Porto Rico a land of Christian homes. Any of your readers who would like to know more of this work will receive full information by writing to Mrs. May Leonard Woodruff, Bloomfield, New Jersey.

tables, wash dishes, and, in short, do whatever they may be expected to do later, as American women in principle and method, though of Porto Rican birth.

Add to this the Christian training, an essential part of the care and teaching of the Home, and it is easy to see that the housemother of a family of fifteen or more girls—and girls coming out of such conditions—has her hands full.

The holidays are a time of endless delight to the girls in the San Turce Home. The marketing for the holiday dinner is an important duty. Fresh vegetables are to be had all the year round, but especially on a

Our correspondent sends some very interesting photographs of humble life in Porto Rico. In a land where, for climatic reasons, even the houses of the well-to-do are very sparsely furnished, the homes of the less fortune-favored are quite bare. Domestic life and its duties are simple in the extreme. The meals served are the same, day by day. In better-class homes, these meals are prepared over long brick or tile "ranges," with a series of square depressions, each holding a handful of charcoal fire for cooking its individual dish. The poor, in their little houses of palm-bark and thatch, content themselves with a cook-stove made of a wooden pail lined with fire-clay, and a single cooking utensil. Bacalau (cod fish), pimientos (peppers), tasajo, (a sun-dried beef resembling, in appearance and flavor, leather shoe-strings), some rice; a little garlic and oil, with such other ingredients as are at hand, go with the stew-pan, and the visitor is hospitably invited to partake.

In hotels and better-class houses, there are beds of wire, covered with a comfortable sheet, and an adamantine pillow; but in the casita (little shacks), usually wooden-framed, canvas covered cots, or, better yet, hammocks, are used.

A great spiritual change is taking place in the island. Under Spanish rule, the spiritual condition of the population was deplorable—the result of long generations of neglect. Now, from various parts of the island comes the glad news of souls won and lives newly awakening under the influence of the Gospel. Eugene Vonstad, writing from Mayaguez last month, says many Porto Ricans have been won over by merely reading the publications distributed by the American Tract Society. At the June communion twenty-five new members were received and there were others in preparation. Similar results have been reported at a number of places. The spiritual campaign is a general one, and nearly every Protestant denomination is represented in the field.

Side-Track ed Usefulness

TEXT — MATT. 8: 22:
"Let the dead bury their dead."

NEVER make the mistake of treating half truths as if they were whole truths. Half legs are not whole legs, but only parts of legs. The microscope clarifies the vision of the bacteriologist. From the structural make-up of one little bone, the biologist, in his mind's eye, may see a whole skeleton, perfect in formation. But after all, truth in part is never equal to truth in whole, unless it is flanked by truths and has truths in its rear as a reserve corps, and truths ahead of it, to guard the picket lines. With his spade the farmer may cut a worm in two, and then each of those two parts will form a whole worm to wriggle off in opposite directions. But truth is not a worm, headless or tailless. In the study of truth we must not consider an individual atom as a complete whole. "Half a fact may be a whole falsehood," once wrote Colton. "Falsehood is never so successful as when she baits her hook with truth. No opinions so fatally mislead us as those that are not wholly wrong, as no watches so effectually deceive the wearer as those that are sometimes right."

What is true in laboratory investigations is also true in reference to Bible study. We must not study the words of my text with a microscope. We must not isolate this sentence from all its connections. We must compare this passage with other passages, this chapter with other chapters, this book with other books. "I cannot understand why Christ should have trampled upon the filial affections of his disciple, who wanted to go back and bury his dead father," said a gentleman to me, some years ago. "This young man evidently intended to be a devout disciple of Jesus; but surely he had a duty to his home as well as directly to Jesus. There, in the old homestead, lay the corpse of his earthly parent. It was natural for a dutiful son to want to be present at the funeral. Yet, when the young man said: 'Let me, I pray thee, first go and bury my father, and I will follow thee,' Christ showed no sympathy with his natural feeling, but practically said: 'Let the neighbors and the strangers come in and close the eyelids and wash the cold flesh. Let the neighbors sing the death-chant and dig the grave. Let strange hands wrap the motionless corpse in its white shroud, and carry it to its last resting-place. You must come with me at once. Shut your eyes to the past. Let the dead bury the dead.'"

The Trial of Filial Love

That way of regarding the incident utterly misrepresents it. Never suppose for a moment that Christ demands that any man should show his reverence for him, by slighting, or neglecting, or deserting an earthly parent. Why, the last human being for whom Christ provided when he was dying upon the cross, was his mother. He turned and looked toward the gentle John, the beloved disciple, sobbing at his feet, and said to him: "John, look after my old mother. Now that she is friendless and alone, she will need your love and sustenance." Then he looked at the agonized face of his mother, as he said: "Mother, let John take my place, and be a loving son to you." These are Christ's exact words: "Woman, behold thy son!" "Son, behold thy mother!" Those were not the words of one who disregarded filial duty. His body was racked at that moment by excruciating agony; yet his thoughts were not of himself, but of her, who, by his death, would be left dependent. It was she for whom he was concerned, even in the hour of his dissolution. His own conduct in that crisis, proves that when he spoke to the young volunteer the words of my text, he was not insensible to the claims of natural affection. In the words of Henry Ward Beecher, Christ was enunciating the great truth that the primal duties of life should not be side tracked, or pushed to the rear, on account of the secondary, or the more unimportant duties. "It is not that you desire to avoid right things, but you say, 'Suffer me first to do the inferior, and then I shall be ready for the superior. Suffer me first to take care of myself. Suffer me first to take care of my household. Suffer me first to look after this enterprise, and then—' No! This constant habit of humbling the higher and making it subordinate to the lower; this constant preference of the inferior to the superior, works demoralization. A man does not need to throw away his Bible, nor defy his God, nor sell his soul voluntarily. He only needs to say: 'Suffer me first to do the lesser thing!' The moment that is done, there will be another 'Suffer me first,' in its place. And so we shall put the inferior duties in the place of the higher duties, and go through life and fail at last." This comprehensive view of my text is, I am convinced, its true interpretation. These words of Christ need to be remembered in other situations than beside the bier of a dead parent. They have a warning lesson for any man who is postponing his duties to his Lord until he has fulfilled his obligations to the world, or to society—to any one who fails in his higher duties through selfishness or sloth.

Side-tracked obligations to God! We see them everywhere. We see them first in the excuses which the young man makes when he is fitting himself by education to enter the battle of life. I enter the theological seminary, where thirty or forty young men are gathered into a class-room. They are bright, intelligent young men, eager for knowledge, intent on getting thorough equipment for the work they have undertaken. I put to each student this question: "Young man, where do you go to church? In what Sunday School are you teaching? What mission work are you doing for Christ?" Some there will be, who, in order to pay their way through college, are performing some duties by which they earn a little money. But the others, in nine cases out of ten, will answer: "Oh, I am not attending any particular church here. I am not teaching in any Sunday School. I am now studying to be a minister, and therefore, each Sunday I go to hear a different minister in the town." The result is, that nine-tenths of our young theological students, and I think I am not overrating the proportion, do practically nothing for Christ while they are living within seminary walls, unless they are paid for their services. What is the result? With a critical, censorious spirit, they go from church to church. They pick flaws in this minister; they find fault with that minister; and all the time they belong to the great army of religious tramps, whom I call the "Go-rounders." During these years of study, their own religious life is ebbing away. By the time the young man who pursues this course, graduates from a theological seminary, he is on the verge of spiritual bankruptcy. Why? Mainly because, in the three long years of mental preparation for the ministry he has neglected to do personal work for Jesus Christ.

Sacrificed to Ambition

It is a common subject for regret that the religious life in our colleges and universities is at a low ebb. The spiritual energy of the students is depleted, and there is less real holiness and growth in grace among them than in young men outside. The reason for this deplorable condition, I believe to be that so many of them are devoting themselves to study or to athletics, and doing no personal service for the Master. They are making the same excuse for themselves that the young disciple of my text made to Christ when he said: "Lord, suffer me first to go and bury my father." That young man who is now the leader of his class in the law school, was once the Sunday School superintendent in the little village church where his father and mother now live. As a country young man, he was always thinking and planning how he could interest the children for Christ. The interests of the school occupied the first place in his thoughts and he would take any trouble to give pleasure to the children and attach them to the cause of Christ. Now, he never enters a Sunday School. He is preparing to be a lawyer. After he once gets his diploma, he intends to go back to church work; but now he says: "Lord, suffer me first to get an education, and then I will follow thee."

That young girl living in Chicago, away from home, is now studying in a famous musical college to cultivate her voice. She was once the leader of her father's choir. Her father is a minister and is spending the savings of a life-time in giving his daughter a musical education that she may be the better able to serve Christ. But though there are hundreds of struggling little churches within a short distance of where she lives, which would be blessed by her singing, she now never enters a prayer meeting. She rarely enters a church. She says: "Wait, Lord, until I have acquired proficiency in the art and then I will sing for thee."

Business Opposed to Religion

But these words of my text not only apply to the young people who are side-tracking their Gospel duties to make way for their preparations for a profession; they also apply to the busy men and women who, in the prime of physical strength and mental power, are like tired peasants, staggering along the highways under greater burdens than it seems possible for them to bear. When I speak thus, I mean that this text is applicable to nearly all men and women in mid-life. Why? Because most people are overworked in the struggle of life. Yet this text, oh man, oh woman, in the prime of your physical and mental strength, applies to you. No right have you to side-track your duties to God. No right have you to say to Christ, "Lord, suffer me to do this or that, and then I will follow thee." Christ should be first, not last. Christ's command, no matter how or when it comes, should be heeded or obeyed; then all other duties will fall into line in their right places.

Christ's command: "Follow me," comes to the tired merchant, the worn-out merchant. It comes to you even in the whirl and the bustle of business life. "No," you say, "I have no time for Christ. My business absorbs every atom of my energy. I am so tired from my week-day tasks that I am too weary to go to church on Sunday." You are an overworked man; but how much of that labor that so fatigues you is voluntarily undertaken? Have you, as a Christian man, the right to give to your own concerns, to your business and world, the whole of your time and energy? Have you forgotten the claims that God has upon you? Better leave undone some of the work you are now doing, than you may have strength to serve him. Why should you not be willing to drop some of that business drudgery? Do you not know that much of that grinding, useless selfish toil is making a failure out of your life? The temporal necessities of life are very small. Yet thousands of people plod on, and on, and on, in a treadmill of mercantile drudgery, as though their very happiness depended upon raising their store from a four-story to a ten-story dry-goods emporium.

The Cost of Success

Sometime ago a lady visited an old school friend who had married a merchant in one of our Eastern cities. That night, when they were seated together for a quiet chat, she said: "Clara, how is your husband getting along?" "Miserably," answered the wife. "Why, is that? Is he not making a lot of money? Is not the palace of a home your own? Is not his name written high as one of the great financiers of this city?" "Yes," answered the wife, "John is making a lot of money. He is already what some people call rich. But I certainly call him poor. When we started our life we did not have much money, but we had enough for all our necessary wants. Besides, we had plenty of time for each other, and for our friends, and for our church. John then only had a small store. He would get home for supper on time. Then all the evenings were ours. We read together. Our Sundays were always spent together at church and in the home. But now John has sold himself to his work. I rarely see him. He works all day. He works part of the night. He always has some business engagement on Sunday. He makes lots of money, but then he only puts that money back in the business, and therefore it is not his to enjoy. He has to keep on working the harder, to look after the bigger business. I certainly think that John is making a failure out of life. He is a perfect slave to work, and we rarely see each other for any of our good times."

Tired merchant! are you like this "John," a spiritual failure? You know just as well as I know that all the work you are doing you do not necessarily have to do. You are making the secondary duties of life more imminent than the primary ones. You are saying, "Lord, suffer me to look after business first." And then, instead of working for a competency, you are working to build up the hanging gardens of a Babylon which have become higher and dearer in your eyes than the cross of Jesus.

Crippled by Remorse

What I have said to the busy, tired merchant, I would also say to the busy, tired mother, with a large brood of little ones. I would speak the same words of advice to the anxious, wearied, half sick professional man; the lawyer, the doctor, the teacher, aye, to the minister himself. I would also speak the same words of warning to the mechanic, the clerk, the commercial traveler, and the servant in the kitchen. You say, "I have no time to serve Christ." You know that the reason you have no time is that you devote to worldly concerns that portion of your time which properly belongs to Christ. But this text has still another application. It is a word of reproof to people who waste their time and strength in useless remorse over their undutiful conduct to parents who are now dead. Many men and women have side-tracked their direct duties to God by switching them off to a family plot. I remember some years ago, after I had spent four years in the West, I went to Brooklyn to find my mother's grave. Though I had lived over a quarter of a century in Brooklyn, yet by the new system of car lines established there since I went to Chicago, I could not find Greenwood Cemetery, until I had been put off three different cars. But though here and there one person, by long absence, may be unable to find their mother's grave, there are thousands and tens of thousands of people who have become blinded to the living duties of life, because they will persist in tarrying by the family plots where sleep their dead. Useless regrets for the dead may have a great part in the side-tracking of our duties to God. Who was this young disciple to whom Christ spoke? I do not know. The Bible does not mention his name. But perhaps he belonged to that great multitude who spend one-half of their life in mourning and neglecting the living, and the other half in mourning and sobbing over the dead. Their love and grief is purely Carlylean. Perhaps this young man of my text was one of those who had ill-used his father while he was alive, and now that he was dead, he wanted to give him a big funeral. Do you wonder, if this was so, that Christ said, "Let the dead bury the dead?" Post-mortem eulogies can never atone for ante-mortem injustices.

A Neglected Mother

In Virginia, a young woman was left a widow with four small children. She taught school, and painted and stitched, and took in washing, and worked all day and far into the night, in order to send her boys to college, and to give her two girls a fine education. After while these children grew up and went out into the world, and left their old mother alone in the cottage where they were reared. Being finely educated, they grew ashamed of the mother who had done so much for them. Her speech was not as classical as theirs. Her hands were callous with toil, and in her looks she was very commonplace. Finally, worn out with work, she was dying, and all her four children gathered about her bedside, conscience-smitten with their ingratitude; they now realized how they had neglected the best friend they ever had. Then one of her boys, now a prominent lawyer, took her in his arms and said: "Mother, you have been a good mother to us. You have made it possible for us to be what we are." Then the woman's tired face lighted up with a smile as she answered, "Oh, Willie, why did you not tell me that before?" Such praises come too late. I tell you, they are too late. If we are to praise our loved ones, we must praise them while they are living, and not when they are dead.

Perhaps this young man was one of those poor deluded sufferers who wanted to hug his grief as a luxury. Some people are never happy unless they are miserable. Their smile is a tear. Their laugh is a sob. They never enjoy themselves unless they are moaning over a corpse twenty years old. To Evergreen Cemetery of Brooklyn, for many months, there used to go a widower, who everybody said was crazy. He did not bury his wife in a grave, but placed her body in a vault. There in this tomb he had all his wife's furniture and nick-knacks. He had her pictures hung upon the wall, and her chairs by her casket, and her books upon her book-shelf, and her work-basket and table by her side. Then every day this widower used to go early in the morning to that tomb and stay there until late at night. He would sit in her chair and read poetry to her deaf ears, and talk to her as though she were alive. You say that man was crazy? He was no more crazy than thousands of people, who day in and day out, go to the graves of their loved ones and weep and lament over the past, instead of going out into the world with Christian courage and doing as the dead, or rather as the redeemed spirits of their dear ones would have them do. Christ, in the words of my text, is not telling that young man to be disrespectful to his dead sire. He is, however, enunciating the tremendous fact, that a young man does not honor a dead parent so much by weeping over a grave, as by living the true, honest, noble Christian life which that dead father would have him live. "Let the dead bury the dead" might be translated into the words, "Let the dead one's precepts live in the living, and let the living fulfil the mission of the dead."

Claims of the Unconverted

But I think there is another reason why Christ spoke the words of my text. Jesus is here not only enunciating the fact that the primal duties of life should never be made subservient to the secondary, but also the great truth that a man has his duty to the world at large, as well as to his father and mother, his wife and child, his brother and sister and friend. Because men and women are bone of our bone and flesh of our flesh, that is no reason why we have not a duty to our fellow-men who are not akin to us by blood. Duty to your fellow-men, and to your fellow-men's children, whom you have never seen. A man never learns this lesson more easily than when he is a soldier. I remember some years ago, during the Spanish-American war, we were encamped in the old Fair Grounds of Springfield, the Illinois capital. Dewey's guns at Manila had spoken. The troops were being hurried to the front. Our regiment was to move South within a couple of days. The surgeon of our regiment came to my quarters one night and said: "Chaplain, read that." It was a letter from Chicago, telling him that his wife was hovering between life and death, as the result of a very serious operation, and she wanted to see him just for a few hours before he went South. "Why don't you run up to Chicago to-night, and come back to-morrow?" we asked. "You will be here in plenty of time." "The Colonel won't let me. The orders have come down that no leaves of absence can be granted," said my companion, quietly. "For the good of the service, I must obey orders and go with my regiment. My duty to my country is now even greater than my duty to my dying wife." "Yes, Surgeon," said I; "you are right. There are duties in life even greater than those we bear to our loved ones, dear though they may be. God help you in this your hour of trial." So Christ, in these words of my text, was enunciating an infinite and omnipotent truth. Jesus is practically saying, "Young man, higher than your love for father or mother, or wife or child, is your duty to me, and to the great world at large. Come with me and help save the millions, who are dying in their sins. Come with me, and bring back to a life of purity and love those who will never know me, unless they see me as a result of thy guidance. Come with me! come with me!" This sentence, "Follow me, and let the dead bury the dead," is only another wording of the same thought, which Christ spake unto his disciples. "He that loveth father or mother more than me is not worthy of me; and he that loveth son or daughter more than me is not worthy of me. And he that taketh not his cross and followeth after me is not worthy of me." Yes, there comes certain times in life when our duty to Christ and to our fellow-men should have precedence over our desires to be with our dear ones in our own homes.

A Death-bed Vision

But though these words of my text may seem to separate some of us for a little while from our loved ones on earth, is it not a sweet and treasured thought that Christ will never separate us, his children, from each other in that "Better Land." During the last illness of Dr. George Grey, Chicago's great religious editor, he had a wonderful vision. He seemed to be a boy again, standing upon the banks of the Ohio River, where he was born. He used to see far-off, rising over the trees the smoke pouring out of the funnels of the river boats, that would come and take away his friends. So in vision he saw, rising over the hills, the smoke of the "Boat of Death," which was coming to take him, not away from friends, but to the hundreds of dear ones who had preceded him beyond. Thus, according to Christ's great laws, we may believe that the separations of earth are only for a little while, and that these earthly separations ultimately mean the reunion in heaven, if we only trust Christ and accept Christ for our Saviour.

Camping Among the Cool Pocono Pines

AT THE DOOR OF THE LITTLE CABIN

A CENTURY and a quarter ago, General Sullivan, of the Revolutionary Army, crossed the Pocono Mountains of Northeastern Pennsylvania, for the relief of the settlers of the Wyoming valley, after a terrible massacre. They had but little food, and many perished by the roadside. One of those men lies buried at "Hungry Hill," 2,000 feet above the sea. Not far from his grave (now surrounded by a rail fence and decorated each year by the G. A. R.), on the other side of the "Sullivan road" is the site of the Pocono Pines Assembly. On an elevated plateau, amidst a clump of pines overlooking Lake Naomi, is the Assembly ground. This was the headquarters of the Brotherhood Camp Conference, which was held the first week in July. The Brotherhood of Andrew and Philip is now sixteen years old; it is entered over twenty religious denominations, has gone into most of the States and Territories, has crossed the line into Canada, has sailed the ocean into Japan and Australia. Last year the Camp Conference was instituted, and the Federal Council was anxious to measure its success by the second conference of this year. The attendance justified expectations, nearly all who were present last year returned this year, some bringing their wives, and many bringing friends as well. The total number present was about double that of last year.

Accommodations had been provided for this larger number, the Inn being filled, and large numbers finding shelter in the log cabins and tents. A large field of many acres was completely surrounded with tents. Mornings and evenings were given over to meetings, and the afternoons to amusement.

The programme of this year differed from that of the year before, in being both richer and more systematic. Next year, along this same line, the name will be changed to "Camp Conference and Training School." The first of these new features was a series of Lessons on the Bible, conducted by the Rev. E. W. Rice, D.D., of Philadelphia, Secretary of the American Sunday School Union—a man most competent to teach about the Bible. In these few lessons, with fairness, clearness and discrimination, Dr. Rice brought the Bible very much nearer to those present, and gave them adequate reasons for faith in its teachings. Inasmuch as these men are to teach the Bible to others, it was good for them to be thus fortified.

Another new feature was a series of talks on "The Training of the Personal Worker," by Mr. C. G. Trumbull, the editor of the Sunday School Times. Mr. Trumbull gave many useful ideas along the line of Brotherhood work and its rule of service.

At one session, the Rev. James B. Ely, of Philadelphia, Secretary of the Evangelistic Committee, gave an account of the tent work in Philadelphia, in which the local brotherhood men have been so actively engaged.

Special mention should be made of the inspiring musical services conducted by the Rev. R. J. Pilgram, a missionary pastor of Baltimore. Brother Pilgram carried a song with him wherever he went. In fact, all who were present entered into the spirit of the occasion: they were not sad in their religion, but healthful and natural, full of life and fun, but full also of earnestness and kindness. It was an inspiring and wholesome gathering.

Sunday was a day of privilege, and the Rev. Conrad Clever, D.D., of Baltimore, was at his very best when he preached on "Surrender for Service." Dr. Clever has been a welcome visitor at all Brotherhood Conventions, and added to his laurels on this occasion.

The address of the last platform meeting was delivered by the Rev. Dr. Pohlman, of Philadelphia, a former missionary to Africa, and now a successful home missionary pastor.

On adjournment, some went to Canada on the north, and others to Baltimore on the south—men of many different denominations, but only one Master, and all promising to return next year for another mountain-top of privilege and inspiration.

A MORNING GATHERING BY THE LAKESIDE

Mourning at the Bowery Mission

THE LAST SAD TRIBUTES TO THE LATE VICTOR BENKE, "THE VOLUNTEER ORGANIST" -- A MEMORABLE FUNERAL SERVICE

ON Monday afternoon, July 18, the old Bowery Mission was crowded to its utmost capacity. This great throng had assembled to pay a last tribute of love and respect to Victor Hugo Benke, the young man who for ten years had been the organist and musical director of the Mission. Mr.

MR. BENKE AT THE MISSION ORGAN

Benke died of spinal meningitis, after a seven weeks' battle for life, at the Presbyterian Hospital, New York City, on Friday morning, July 15. On the following Sunday morning, the service at the Mission was largely devoted to singing hymns composed by Mr. Benke. The men told how, hopeless and wretched, they had wandered into the Mission, drawn by the strains of music which came floating out to them as they walked past. As they tried to speak, their voices were choked with the grief they could not master. In the evening a private service was held at Mr. Benke's home, in upper New York. The room where he had written many of his compositions was draped in black; his piano was shrouded in the same mournful hue, while in the centre of the apartment lay all that was mortal of the beloved musician.

Mr. Hallimond, Superintendent of the Bowery Mission, conducted a very simple service. The singing quartette Mr. Benke had trained to work in the Master's service, gathered about the casket, and sang one of their dead leader's favorite hymns, "No Sorrow There;" a heartfelt prayer was offered, and silently and sadly the friends stole away, leaving the husband in the keeping of the nearest and dearest till the morning, when the public service would be held at the Mission.

At 2 P.M. next day the Bowery Mission Hall was filled with a characteristic audience. In the auditorium were hundreds of the men of the Bowery, bowed and sorrowful over the loss of their friend, while in front, and on the platform were many prominent in mission and church work in New York and other cities. Among those present were the Rev. C. H. Mead, D.D., the well-known temperance evangelist, the Rev. F. H. Jacobs, leader of the Fulton Street Prayer Meeting, Mr. Hubert P. Main, the well-known composer of many popular hymn tunes, the Rev. Dr. F. W. Troy, of Brooklyn, the Rev. Josiah J. Munro, Chaplain of the New York Tombs, the Rev. Dr. G. A. Gates, President of the Pomona College, California, Mrs. Sarah J. Bird, the beloved "Mother of the Bowery Boys," Dr. Louis Klopsch, and others. There was a double quartette to lead the singing.

Floral Tokens of Love and Esteem

The organ was draped in black and royal purple, the lower bands being almost entirely hidden by cut roses and fern leaves. A touching feature of this decoration, known to but few, was the fact that all the black drappings were composed of long veils, which "Mother Bird" had laid aside from time to time during the long period of her widowhood, and now brought out for the funeral of him whom she loved to call her "boy." Beautiful floral tributes hid the lower part, while against the organ doorway, through which the form of the organist had been seen during so many years as he swayed the listening throngs with his wonderful playing, stood a floral lyre, the gift of Mr. Hallimond. A large cross composed of rare flowers and foliage was sent by Dr. Klopsch. Mrs. Bird's remembrance was a large pillow of white asters, with the word, "Victory" in the centre, in purple flowers. This was placed at the head of the casket. The men of the Bowery laid their token of love on the casket in the form of a beautiful floral cross.

Mr. Hallimond opened the services by calling upon Mr. John Wyburn, superintendent of the Water Street Mission, to lead in prayer. The double quartette then sang at the casket, after which the audience sang, "Nearer, my God, to thee."

After a portion of Scripture had been read by Rev. Dr. Troy, Mr. Hallimond spoke, paying a heartfelt tribute to the worth of the dead organist. He dwelt upon his consistent, faithful Christian life, his untiring effort to help the poor and homeless, his zeal in all good works, which made him forget that there were physical limitations which even his strong and vigorous body could not withstand, and which resulted in his being cut off in the very flower of his manhood.

It was not sermons, or books, or theology that had brought him to Christ, but the kindly touch of a loving Christian woman's hand—the hand of Mrs. Bird.

Mr. Hallimond continued:

"I wish on behalf of the workers of the Bowery Mission, and on behalf of an untold number of men who regarded Mr. Benke as their friend and helper, to offer a tribute of the tenderest affection and regard.

The Men of the Bowery Loved Him

"Few people outside the group of regular workers here, have any idea of what a teeming populous parish ours is. At our very doors, on the right hand and on the left; in the lodging houses and hotels, there live, night and day, between fifty and sixty thousand men. To a vast proportion of these men, the Bowery Mission is their temple, and Mr. Benke, for ten years past has been not only their organist, but their brother and friend. With the most pathetic kind of pride, they have looked upon him with a feeling of particular proprietorship. They have known how, when tempting invitations have been held out to him to take positions in brighter and more pecuniarily profitable places, his loyalty and devotion to them has every year drawn him nearer to the homeless and cheerless men of the Bowery.

"It is impossible to compute the number of transient visitors to the Bowery Mission who have been drawn within these doors during the past ten years and have gone off again, to all parts of the world, bearing with them the memory of the strangely beautiful music that, under the touch of his gifted fingers, has come from this old organ. In the name of the tens of thousands of sorrow-stricken and dejected men, I desire, here and now, to thank God for the gracious, uplifting and soul-thrilling influences for good that have come out of the life and service of this dear, devoted boy.

"The Bowery Mission has for many years been run under the auspices of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. It has been supported financially, not only by Dr. Klopsch, the proprietor, but by an exceedingly large number of the readers of that paper. To them the name of Victor Benke has become a household word. Dr. Klopsch is present and will speak on behalf of this large constituency, in acknowledgment of their gratitude to God for this redeemed life."

Mrs. Bird Tells of "Her Boy"

Mrs. Sarah J. Bird was the next speaker. She said:

This is the first time during the ten years of Victor Benke's life that he was ever a silent guest in our family gathering. We miss his voice, as he has told us of his struggles and temptations with sin. We miss his soul-stirring music from that organ; but he is speaking in deeper notes to-day than ever before, having fought the good fight. He is our brave Victor—for his victory is now complete, having conquered the last enemy, even Death itself. Oh, how we love him! Oh, how we miss him! When he sought refuge in the Bowery Mission fold ten years ago, he did need friends. And I did feel so proud that he honored me with the name of "Mother." Our interests were so interwoven, and but one thought seemed to permeate our little talks together. One day, out of a clear sky came a great cloud of sorrow; for our beloved superintendent, Mr. Hallimond, was very ill. During those days of deep anxieties we were much together in prayer, and turned to each other naturally, for comfort. At this time, Victor Benke talked much of death, and we were brought to make some sacred pledges to each other, in case either went first; and I feel that to-day I must give my message left, to the world. Victor Benke wanted the boys, and all the world, to know that his friend, John G. Hallimond, had been more to him than any other living person; that this sacred friendship, example, life and teachings had brought him into a deeper spiritual life, and a closer walk with God. How little I thought that I should live to give this message from Victor Benke! for I assured him that I would be at the beautiful gate to welcome him; but such is life. May we learn to say, "Thy will be done."

Dr. Klopsch followed, in words which made a most profound impression upon his listeners. He said in part:

"On occasions like this we are brought to a clearer understanding and better appreciation of those qualities that constitute the real true and abiding value of man. In the presence of death, the qualities which, in the bustling activities of business life we are, alas, too apt to overestimate, sink into deserved insignificance, while those which our strenuous life leave but little opportunity to cultivate, command that greater respect to which they are justly entitled.

"Here lies a man who knew nothing of the arts of trade, never accumulated wealth, never directed to himself the admiring gaze of the multitudes, yet who, like John, was great in the sight of God.

"Rescued from the depths through the instrumentality of dear, good Mother Bird, his feet were firmly planted on the Solid Rock. From the very moment that the light entered his soul he followed his Lord and Master with unswerving loyalty, and delighted in his service. No offer of high salary from influential churches could ever tempt him to leave the place of his new birth. His time, his exceptional talent, his means though slender, and his whole life were consecrated to the blessed work of uplifting the fallen, and pointing those ready to perish to the Lamb of God that taketh away the sins of the world.

"He aimed for true immortality, and we who knew him and loved him, and labored with him, feel that what he so earnestly strove for has been verily attained. Riches and honor, and fame, in the light of this accomplishment, are but mere evanescent bubbles. Victor Benke chose the better part, and gained the victory. Many men who have given their lives to the accumulation of wealth, who labored for that which perisheth, have gone down to their graves unwept, unhonored, and unsung, but the passing away of this man gathers around his bier hundreds of sympathizing friends, many of whom he helped by precept and example, to a better, nobler life, and who are eager to honor the memory of one who loved them, and by their was loved in return. He has entered upon his reward. May God who now solemnizes our hearts, help us to look up and fix them upon higher ideals, and grant that we may make this simple but useful life an inspiration to higher and nobler achievement in every good and perfect work. Then shall the lesson of his death be unto us another of Benke's sweet, tender and beautiful songs, that shall echo from our souls beyond the limitations of time, into an endless and blissful eternity.

THE LATE VICTOR H. BENKE

Sympathy for the Bereaved Family

Rev. Geo. Gates, Principal of Pomona College, Cal. followed, speaking along encouraging and uplifting lines, showing how in many points scientific investigation and religion were joining hands in the great truth of immortality.

Rev. F. H. Jacobs, of the Fulton Street Prayer Meeting, referred to the feeling and sympathy that had been displayed by the previous speakers. He told what a faithful worker Mr. Benke had been, taking entire charge of the Fulton Street Prayer Meetings while the speaker was away with the Sunday School Convention in Jerusalem. Numberless were the letters which he wrote, and many other duties which he performed with the faithfulness so characteristic of the man; forgetful of self and only remembering the task which were his to perform. He referred to Mr. Benke's hymns and his musical compositions and then talked with much feeling and pathos of the irreparable loss to his family, and closed with an earnest prayer in behalf of the bereaved widow.

Two members from each of the two male quartettes which Mr. Benke formed and trained, sang the hymns "No Sorrow There," and "Sleep On, and Rest," both being Mr. Benke's compositions.

Borne to the Grave by His Comrades

After the closing prayer, to the soft and solemn tones of the "Dead March in Saul," the mortal remains of the Volunteer Organist were borne upon the shoulders of those who had been his companions and co-workers for so long, down through the aisle, where he had often knelt to pray for hopeless men about him, and through the doors of the Mission. Hundreds lined the sidewalk and street about the place, and followed with uncovered heads and tearful glances the funeral cortege as it took its way through the throngs of humanity which swarmed in that part of the great city. The burial was in Lutheran Cemetery, at Maspeth, Long Island.

Victor H. Benke was born in Austria, thirty-one years ago, on the 10th of July. His parents were we to-do, his father occupying a prominent official position in the town. Victor entered the army, and having served the necessary time, he came out (to use his own expression), "dissipated and good for nothing." He did not want to go home, feeling that he was not an associate for his family. His father furnished him with funds sufficient to start life, he embarked for America. Landing here, like many another, he fell among thieves, was robbed of his money, and so found himself adrift on the Bowery, the "Highway Follies." Too proud to write home, and speaking English, Victor found the downward path—apparently the only one open to him—and he began to play the

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT AND HIS FAMILY

EVERYONE is familiar with the simple home life of President Roosevelt, whether at the White House or at Sagamore Hill, his old home in Oyster Bay, Long Island. At the latter he throws off cares of State, and with Mrs. Roosevelt and the children, enjoys outdoor life to the full. He rides, walks, and drives, and camps with his sons occasionally, or goes fishing. He does not disdain, after a day's tramp through the woods, to help cook the evening meal at the camp fire. His love of family and home amounts to a passion. Once, when he was describing the delights of life on the Western plains, a listener expressed wonder that he ever could have settled down in the humdrum of the East, and when he was asked if he didn't wish he had been born and reared on a ranch, the President replied, "No, please."—"I know," said one of the ladies of the party quickly, "Why?" he asked. "Because you would not then have known Mrs. Roosevelt," and straight from his heart came the answer, as he glanced at his wife with an expression that could not be mistaken. "That was what I was going to say." The President's eldest son, Theodore, Jr., teaches a Bible class every Sunday when the family are at Oyster Bay, and holds the attention of the boys while he expounds, in simple language, the lesson of the day.

ABOUT a mile from the little station at Esopus, N. Y., is Rosemount Hill, the home of Judge Alton B. Parker. The house is not very large, is square and white, with dark green blinds, and a generous veranda stretches across its front. The main part of the building is stone, and was erected before the Revolution. It is said that Judge Parker did not have a telegraph operator in the house during the Convention because there was no room for him. A little cottage or porter's lodge was used for this purpose. There are fine plants and shrubs on the Rosemount lawn. Trees are plentiful but they do not obstruct the view of the Hudson, flowing at the foot of the hill. Should one visit the place early in the morning, he is likely to see the Judge, clad in a bathing suit, go down the path from the house, and plunge into the river. Fifteen minutes later he is on his way back to breakfast. At Esopus there is a church called the Mission of the Holy Cross. Here preaches the Rev. Charles M. Hall, son-in-law of Judge Parker. The Judge is a vestryman of this church, and attends regularly, passing the contribution plate as one of his duties. Alton Parker Hall, son of the Judge's daughter, is a fine healthy boy, with rosy cheeks and brown eyes and makes no end of diversion for his parents and grandparents.

The Coming Peace Congress

IT is time that our churches were bestirring themselves, if it is proposed to make the approaching International Peace Congress which meets in Boston on October 3d, a representative body, capable of accomplishing some definite purpose. It is not enough to have a great assemblage that will meet simply for the purpose of free sympathetic expression on the wrongs of the age and the proneness of the great nations to disturb the peace of the world, and to go on in their career of heartless ambition, conquest and slaughter. The time has come for a more active peace propaganda, and for the organization of the Peace Movement in the United States on a vigorous working basis that will make its influence felt in State and national councils. Hitherto, the movement has been largely a matter of sentiment; but now, thanks chiefly to the energy and devotion of a gallant band of Peace-lovers in New England, it is no longer a skeleton organization, but one that is daily growing more and more compact and capable of effective service.

We would urge upon our churches of every denomination to extend active co-operation to the coming Peace Congress: (1) by writing to the Secretary and securing representation in the Congress; (2) by forwarding memorials or other communications for suitable action by the Congress. It is not enough to adopt resolutions in general terms condemning war. They should urge our own Government to take steps, wherever practicable, in the interest of peace.

While we would not counsel unwise or undiplomatic meddling with the affairs of other nations, yet it should not be forgotten that there are many opportunities which this country might improve in the interest of international peace and good-will. It is highly probable that at no distant date, such an opportunity will arise, when either Russia or Japan, or both, will be ready to welcome the proffer of friendly mediation. Again, the frightful condition of affairs on the Congo, the barbarous enslavement of the natives, the disruption and scattering of the Congo villages, and the shocking but well attested stories of mutilation—a state of affairs equivalent to the worst form of civil war—constitute a legitimate subject of activity by the Peace Congress. Our country has treaty rights which would justify it in bringing the whole Congo question before the Hague Conference, and it is entirely within the province of the Boston Peace Congress to urge the adoption of this course in the interest of humanity and for the restoration of peace and security in an African state to which, by virtue of treaty, we stand in the responsible relation of a sponsor.

Here, then, are two living issues for the Boston Congress to deal with. They are more urgent and infinitely more practical than disarmament, which is still very far off. We shall be glad to hear from pastors, church officials and church members generally as to the duty of the Peace Congress on these and other matters. All communications and suggestions relative to the work of the Congress, forwarded to us, will be placed in the hands of the proper official of that body at the opportune moment, for the action of the delegates.

Making Life Hard

IN Harpers' for July, Mr. William Dean Howells has a thoughtful paper on the general subject of preparations, as compared with performances. He speaks of the amount of time and strength essential to the simplest journey, or the most ordinary migration from home. The article is suggestive.

How much of our time and strength are spent in simply getting ready to live! How many of us so order our homes and our lives that we have little to show at the day's end beyond the actual work we have put into the day! Many a housekeeper reaches Saturday night, tired in every drop of her blood, utterly exhausted and spent with her cleaning, cooking, sewing and mending, while during the whole week she has not had an hour for quiet meditation, for easeful reading, or anything that can be called simple enjoyment. The worst of it is that we get deeply rutted in the habit of feeling that work is the only thing right and proper in life, that we do not rest gracefully. When we sit with folded hands, conscience reproaches us, and we think we ought to have something to occupy us, and are not comfortable until we hunt up a task. It may be a wholly needless task, but we peg away at it and feel virtuous.

A man who had been engaged many years in strenuous business, retired, expecting to spend the remainder of his life in the enjoyment of what he had earned; but the habit of business was so strong upon him, that instead of taking pleasure in his new leisure, he was really exceedingly unhappy. His wife said of him mournfully: "I never knew that a man could be so fidgety, interfering, and exacting. I have managed my house without the least trouble, and to his perfect satisfaction for twenty-five years, but now that he is at home much of the time he finds something to criticize, or meddle with, every hour in the day. He prowls about looking into the closets, finding fault with the maids, and generally making life a burden to himself and all the rest of us." She smiled, but the smile was followed with a sigh. The trouble was that the good man had developed only one set of faculties, and that he had no resources beyond these on which to draw.

In the very common matter of entertaining our friends, some of us devote so much time and energy to preparation, that when the visitors arrive we cannot take pleasure in their society. The shelves groan with good things, the beds are freshly spread, the house shines with cleanliness, but at the end of it all we are too tired to give the best of ourselves to those who have come within our gates.

It would seem that a better balance might be struck between the essentials and the non-essentials; between what we must have, and what we may easily omit.

Victor Benke

EVERY life has its mission—its purpose. Not to seek the world's applause, nor its riches, nor its pleasures and gratifications, but to strive for the fullest and freest development of the noble, God-given qualities that stir within us; to make our lives replete with blessing to others; to enrich our own minds, that we may better aid those less generously endowed; to be loving, kind, patient, considerate; to train our desires and our bodies to seek the highest good; to live simply and sanely; to speak, think and act as becomes immortal beings—this is our mission and nothing less. Unshaken fidelity to this high ideal, and absolute truth in our recognition of its requirements, can come only by ceaseless effort; but every step in the right path makes the rest of the journey easier and more delightful.

These reflections are suggested by the recent death of Victor Benke, known far and wide as "The Volunteer Organist" of the old Bowery Mission. In his early manhood, he had "passed through the fire," but with the spiritual awakening which dawned upon him when he came to the Bowery Mission, there also came to the young convert the revelation of a high and beautiful ideal, to which all his later years were consecrated. He became, to a very large extent, the life, the soul and the song of the work. He radiated praise and happiness; he moved in an atmosphere of spiritual enthusiasm and encouragement, and his fine example became the means of winning many from lives of sin. The men of the Bowery knew that Victor Benke had suffered as they were suffering, and that he had endured the same hardships and faced the same trials and temptations. He was one of themselves, and they rejoiced in his triumph, and in his rich spiritual and artistic life, which made itself felt downward and outward, as well as upward.

In the tributes that were paid to the dead organist at the recent obsequies, there was not one that was overdrawn. They gave conclusive evidence of the sanctifying and ennobling work which divine grace can perform in a human soul, and how it can transform a man's life, and make even of the poorest outcast a bright and shining light, to guide fallen humanity upward and onward to better things.

The Saint and the Sinner

IN the large volume of correspondence which we have received, in response to the question, "Is the Church for the saint or the sinner?" the first instalment of which we publish in the present issue, there is much of interest members of all religious denominations. Viewed from many different standpoints—from the ultra-conservative to the broadly liberal—the problem clearly possesses a vital interest for church members and congregations everywhere. That the non-members and even the non-church-goers are also keenly alive to the issue is apparent from the number of letters received from that class, roundly opposing exclusiveness. There is much to be said on both sides of the controversy, and it is one that cannot be decided, even approximately until both sides have been fully heard.

We should like to have the clergy themselves take an active part in this open discussion, since it promises to do much toward clearing the atmosphere, and certain, besides, to have a wholesome and profitable influence. Pulpit, as well as pew, should have share in the symposium, and the voice of authority should mingle, in all frankness and candor, with that of the layman. There are certain questions concerning which, though there may be a wide divergence of opinion on non-essential points, the great majority coincide upon essentials, and we believe this to be one of the character.

Let the pulpit speak. We shall be glad to give it views the widest publicity in these pages.

Russia Seizes a British Ship

WAR between Great Britain and Russia was a menace which disturbed the whole world last week. The Russian steamer Petersburg seized the Peninsular and Oriental Company's steamer Malacca in its voyage through the Red Sea, hauled down the British flag, put a Russian crew on board, and took the vessel to Port Said as a Russian prize. The pretext for this high-handed procedure was that the Malacca had arms and ammunition on board, which, the Russians contended, was designed for the use of the Japanese forces. The British, however, say that it was marked with the broad arrow, which indicated that it is the property of the British Government, and they explain that it was being conveyed to Hong Kong for the use of the British station there. A second cause for complaint, apart from the seizure of the Malacca, was that the Petersburg had passed as an ordinary merchant ship through the Dardanelles, which is closed by treaty against warships, and that once outside the strait, her character was changed to that of a warship, with the right of search. The British contend that if the Petersburg was not a warship she had no right to overhail the Malacca, and if she was a warship she had no right to pass through the Dardanelles. A vigorous protest was sent to the Russian Government, and a powerful fleet was dispatched to the Red Sea. Both in the British press and

It was so placed as to catch the rays of the sun. It happened, however, that through an oversight, one day, an outside shutter was partially closed, shutting the sun's rays from the vine. A foot away was the sunlight, but the vine was in the shadow. Four days afterwards the owner, entering the room, noticed that his favorite vine had uncurled itself from its supporting stick, and, passing along the window-ledge, like a living thing, had reached the sunlight. A Father's Self Sacrifice

An interesting story of a father's self-sacrifice is told by a Colorado mine-owner. When he developed his mine, he erected houses for his employees, and built a school for the exclusive use of their children. One day a ranchman in the neighborhood visited the mine-owner, and told him that he had five children who were growing up in ignorance because there was not a good school in the case, and was apparently a life-like effigy. She had been a priestess of the Egyptian deity, Amen Ra, and was reputed to possess supernatural power. Her features, as depicted in the effigy, had peculiar malignancy. The lid was purchased, and was sent to the home of the purchaser. From that time, according to the story, a series of misfortunes befel every one who had anything to do with it. The original purchaser was accidentally shot. The heir to his estate, who inherited the lid with the other property, went insane and committed suicide. A photographer who undertook to photograph it, fell down dead. A collector of curiosities, who became its next owner, was drowned. Finally, the strange list of tragedies was associated with the possession of the relic, and the person to whom it would have fallen by right, refused to receive it, and has sent it as a gift to the museum. There are thousands of people who, hearing the story of this extraordinary series of coincidences, which is probably exaggerated, would not be induced by any bribe even to touch that ancient relic, lest the malignancy of the dead priestess should prove fatal. Would that there were similar dread of sin, which much more surely leads to eternal death.

The end of those things is death (Rom. 6: 21).

STREETS AND ARSENAL AT THE GOLDEN HORN

the Parliament a strong war feeling developed, and for day or two war seemed to be inevitable. It was, however, reported later in the week, that the Russian Emperor had personally interposed, and had ordered that the Malacca be immediately restored, and compensation be made for her detention. If this report proves true, and the steamer is given up, British honor will be satisfied, but otherwise hostile measures will probably be taken. The situation is delicate, and unfortunately our own government may be involved. American vessels laden with meat and other food stuffs are now on their way to Japan, and more are getting ready to start. In the event of any of them being seized by Russia, a question would arise, which might not easily be settled. There has always been a difference of opinion as to whether cargoes, under a neutral flag, consigned to private merchants in a belligerent's country, are liable to seizure, and the suggestion is made that the question be submitted to the Hague Court for decision. It is extraordinary that Russia, which finds so hard to deal with one enemy, should arouse the enmity of other nations. She may yet have to regret her disregard of the wise king's warning:

The beginning of strife is as when one letteth out water; therefore leave off contention before it be meddled with (Prov. 17: 14)

Seeking the Sunlight

A remarkable movement of a plant is described in a scientific journal. It grew in a pot which was placed in the window of a house in Castle Valley, Pa. The owner was proud of it and watched its progress with interest. It was a vine, which curled around a stick two feet in height in the centre of the pot. The vine was about four feet long. It was so placed as to catch the rays of the sun. It happened, however, that through an oversight, one day, an outside shutter was partially closed, shutting the sun's rays from the vine. A foot away was the sunlight, but the vine was in the shadow. Four days afterwards the owner, entering the room, noticed that his favorite vine had uncurled itself from its supporting stick, and, passing along the window-ledge, like a living thing, had reached the sunlight. It is a pity that Christians do not always follow the example of this plant. They too often cling to worldly support instead of seeking Him who is able to give light to their souls.

An Ancient Hoodoo

The arrival of the lid of a mummy case of remarkable beauty at a museum, as a relic of ancient Egypt, has suggested inquiries which have elicited an extraordinary story. It seemed so likely to be received with incredulity that the relator has obtained the corroboration of the leading persons connected with it. Some years ago a party of American tourists stayed with Lady Duff Gordon, at Luxor. While there, an Arab brought the lid of the mummy case, and offered it for sale. It represented the form of the woman who had been put

Christian Women in Conference

THE TWELFTH EASTERN CONFERENCE of the Y. W. C. A. AT SILVER LAKE

UPON the western shore of Lake George, in a spot so beautiful that it is a benediction of peace to visit it, the Twelfth Eastern Conference of Young Women's Christian Associations has just been held. 646 college women were in session from June 24 to July 5, and 200 young women from the Eastern cities from July 8 to 19. The power bringing these young women again and again to this Conference, is more than the natural beauty of the place, or the joy of renewed fellowship. God has given here, in the past, true inspiration for service, and every year he opens fresh opportunity for helpfulness. The programme and all details keep these objects steadily in view.

One of the favorite speakers is always Mr. Robert E. Speer, of New York City. No one helps more than he to bring the vision and the joy of Christ to the delegates. Mr. John R. Mott, of the World's Student Christian Federation; Dr. John Timothy Stone, of Baltimore; Dr. J. Douglas Adam, of Brooklyn; Dr. R. M. Russell, of Pittsburg; Dr. Pleasant Hunter, of New York, and Dr. Howard Agnew Johnston, of New York, were among the preachers on Sunday and at platform meetings. Dr. Stone and Dr. Johnston also took daily Bible classes, as did Dr. O. W. White, of New York, Professor C. S. Beardslee, of Hartford, Miss Charlotte Adams, of Pittsburg, and Miss Mary L. Babcock, of New York. Miss Janet McCook also held a Bible Class for students in secondary schools. The idea of the Conference is the idea of Bible study—to ground in faith, to reveal Christ, and to prepare for teaching in classes during the coming year.

THE CONFERENCE GROUNDS AT SILVER BAY

Never before have foreign and home missions been more forcibly presented. Mr. Willis R. Hotchkiss, of Africa, spoke at both conferences. Dr. Ra Hume, Miss Mary B. Hill, and Mrs. Sherwood Eddy, represented India. Mrs. R. G. Pierson pleaded for the Ainu, of Japan, and Miss Mary Goodrich for the mountaineers in the "Laurel Country." Mr. Harry Wade Hicks, of the A. B. C. F. M., and Miss Dorothea Day, of the S. V. M., conducted the daily missionary conference, at which the college missionary meetings and systematic giving to missions were discussed by dozens of wide-awake delegates from many colleges. The missionary career as a life-work was brought home in personal interviews, and many of the abler college women have begun to consider when their life investment will bring the richest returns for God.

Daily conferences were conducted by secretaries of the American Committee, under whose auspices the conferences are held, and by leading State Secretaries of the Young Women's Christian Associations. Ninety colleges participated in the student conference, and discussed religious meetings and Bible study work among new students. At the same hour the alumnae met to report on lines of church work, Sunday School and mission activities that had claimed their time since leaving college. Many had taken heavy responsibilities in city associations. At other conference was devoted to the lines of Christian work taken up in secondary and private schools. In the city conference, one of the most fruitful hours was taken for discussion of the problems of new buildings, the extension of work into factories and great industrial centres, educational classes for young women in cities, and all that goes to make up the work of a city Young Women's Christian Association.

A conference like this is not a place for mere girlish enthusiasm. There were present Mrs. J. S. Griffith, of Chicago, Chairman of the American Committee; Mr. Robert E. Speer, of New York City, also a member of the American Committee, and Chairman of the Student Conference; Miss Helen Miller Gould, President; Caroline Hazard, of Wellesley College, and many other faculty members, heads of schools and presidents of city boards. Procession Day, and College Day, with their bands and songs and photographs, are always a feature. The Vassar College delegation was the largest; ninety-eight students and alumnae being in attendance. The excursions to Paradise Bay, and Ft. Ticonderoga, and the little trips to Tabe's Pond and Sunrise Mountain, leave in the mind a pleasant recollection; but the impression each young woman takes away, is the deeper knowledge of Christ and the high consecration of her life to his service.

The Pastor's Morning Service

By Margaret E. Sangster

WHY don't you preach an old sermon, John?"

"I can't preach old sermons, Molly."

"If you'd take a new text, nobody would know that the sermon was not new."

"That may be true, dear wife, though it isn't very complimentary. But I should know it, and I should lose my own interest. I could not stand before my people and give them the same discourse I had given this time last year, without being self-conscious and tongue-tied."

"This time five years, John, just after we were married, you preached some perfectly beautiful sermons. I have never forgotten them. I felt so proud and happy, sitting in the pew, and looking up at you. Why not repeat one of them?"

"Molly, Molly, won't you agree that a man may grow in five years! Why, sweetheart, I hope I've gone on since that beatific summer! No, dear, I must keep on grinding at the mill, and give my people the best the dear Lord gives me. There is no other way. And you say you haven't forgotten them, don't you, dear?"

Mrs. Voorhees had been her husband's wife long enough to know when it was not worth while to insist on a course he did not intend to take. So, brightly smiling, though her heart was a bit heavy, as she looked at his tired face, she left the study, and tripped with her light step to the sitting-room. Here little Ruth, rosy and dimpled, was asleep in her basket-carriage. Her mother had drawn it up and down the garden walks in the intervals of weeding her petunia beds, and making bouquets of roses and geraniums for the flower mission, until the baby had dropped off for her morning nap. Then she had brought Ruth, carriage and all, into the shaded room indoors. As she entered, a lady rose.

"Good morning, Mrs. Voorhees."

"Oh, good morning, Mrs. Cleaves. I did not see you when I came in. The room is rather dark."

"No, I rapped, but you did not hear me, so I stepped right in. I believe in being very friendly in my minister's house. May I see the minister?"

Mrs. Voorhees hesitated.

"It is Friday, and he is busy in the study. Wouldn't I do?"

"Not at all," said Mrs. Cleaves, positively. "I particularly desire to talk for ten minutes with Mr. Voorhees on a matter of importance. If he cannot be interrupted, never mind; but I am going to the seashore this afternoon, and I won't be back until fall. Dr. Van Emburgh used to be so accessible, he spoiled me for anybody else."

"If you are going away my husband will of course prefer to see you. Will you go straight to the study? You know the room, over the porch."

Mrs. Cleaves lost no time in interviewing her pastor. She was a middle-aged lady with pronounced views about everything, and she was a self-constituted, unofficial pastor's assistant.

Mr. Voorhees stifled a sigh. He had just conquered the first inertia of the pen and was becoming flushed and eager in his writing. Why, he wondered, had Molly suffered a visitor to dissipate his morning glow? He quickly reflected that Molly probably could not keep this visitor out.

He offered his hand genially, nevertheless, and placed a chair for his guest. She cast a disapproving eye over the confusion of the study, but Mr. Voorhees was happily unaware of anything amiss.

"I ventured to call," said Mrs. Cleaves, "because I thought you ought to know that Ed Larkin and Jack Shaw do not like your sermons. They are over their heads. And of course lads of their age are of the greatest importance, and the minister cannot afford to antagonize them."

"Thank you, Mrs. Cleaves, but I preach to a good many people besides Ed and Jack, and if I limit my sermons to boys of fifteen, some of the older ones may go unfed. If the boys are attentive they will find something they can understand and carry home from every service."

"Well, you know best. I thought it was my duty to give you a hint. One must obey her conscience, Mr. Voorhees. There is no other way. Mrs. Emory Perkins is ill, and the family would appreciate a call, I am sure."

"I have called twice on Mrs. Perkins." The minister's tone was a little less cordial.

"There is some trouble at the Gibsons'. I don't know what. But if you'd drop in casually, they might like to see you."

Mr. Voorhees, as it chanced, knew all about the trouble at the Gibsons'. He did not explain it nor satisfy the curiosity of Mrs. Cleaves, who, having effectually ruined the morning, if not the sermon, complacently sailed away down the street.

Mr. Voorhees picked up a book, read awhile, gave his attention to the "sweetness and light" of a favorite author, and then began to write. He was interrupted now by the imperious ringing of the telephone bell.

"Hello!"

"Is this Mr. Voorhees?"

"Yes, who wants me?" It was James Pell, the station agent, who answered, with information to convey.

"A couple at the station are coming to be married. They have a license, but as they must catch the first train north, they'll have no time to waste. Please be ready for them. They are in the hack now and hurrying toward you."

Mr. Voorhees had visions of an eloping couple, and scruples as to marrying runaway boys and girls. Why must this particular pair have sought him? Doctor Sloper, at the other end of the village, married anybody who came along, and never worried over the future.

Molly, to whom the minister stated the situation, hustled Ruth's carriage and Ruth still asleep, into the back veranda, and called the maid to come in as the additional witness.

"Such fun!" she said, letting a little sunlight into the sitting-room, which was parlor, library and living room in the parsonage. "I do hope the fee will buy me a new bonnet. Now, Mr. Voorhees, don't be absurd. Here's the hack, and the bride and groom are of age."

They certainly were. The two turned out to be silver-haired persons, the man sixty, the woman fifty years old. They were wedded, and left a nice fee and caught their train. Molly's eyes danced when she saw the gold piece.

By this time luncheon was served.

"Don't look so blue, dear," said the minister's wife. "You may write your sermon this afternoon."

"I have to speak at three o'clock at the laying of the cornerstone of The Miriam Archer Home for Age and Indigent Females. I must make calls, and I've Delta Sigma on for to-night. We meet at Haskins', Beverly, you remember. So I'll not be home until ten."

"To-morrow will be another day, dear." The minister's wife kissed him.

"Saturday! Well, I'll trust Divine Providence that I'll get at my sermon then."

Notwithstanding the barriers in the way, the sermon was written at last, and carried its message to old and young. Mrs. Cleaves was absent. The pastor's wife rejoiced thereat.

NELSON

BOOK ONE—On the Rocks of Provence

THE CAPTAIN OF THE SHIP

HE manifested on the sea in the performance of various duties that fell to him, a breadth of mind that enabled him to penetrate the most secret designs of his enemies; an ability to put his finger upon the weakest spot in the opposing plan; a faculty for approaching the crucial moment in the best possible way; a capacity for following up the faintest clue; a determination which nothing short of the complete destruction of his enemies could satisfy, which marked him as unique among seamen as Alexander, Hannibal and Napoleon were among soldiers. He was thorough to the point of annihilation. Here was no bluff old seaman, no stubborn British bull dog, but a man of the highest science.

He was the first to apply the art of war to engagements on the sea, as the great strategists and tacticians applied on shore. His combinations and maneuvers resembled those of a master of the art of war setting his squadrons and moving his armies on the field. His cruises were campaigns, his battles demonstrations. He made his own tactics. In one battle he revolutionized naval warfare. His example, like Napoleon's must be followed; it cannot be surpassed.

There was something about the man which calls to mind one of those rare and delicate-seeming blades that were made by the armorers of Damascus and Toledo; as flexible, as elastic, as beautiful as a woman, yet than which no weapons have ever been so deadly and terrible.

But life and fame to him were in the womb of the future. The captain of the Agamemnon, standing there on the deck of his own ship, had not yet opportunity to prove what he would become, although the time was not far distant when the world would rub its eyes and open them upon that new epoch in sea fighting.

And the name of the epoch would be Nelson!

CHAPTER V.

ENTER THE AGAMEMNON

"CROSS-TREES there!" cried the officer of the deck.

"Ay, ay, sir," came faintly from the dizzy heights above his head. "You heard that shot? Do you see anything?"

"Seems to come from yonder, sir," answered the man, pointing toward the headland.

"There it goes again!" burst from the little group on the quarter-deck, as the sound of a second shot was heard faintly in the still morning.

"Mr. Berry," said the captain, speaking directly to him, "set the light sail, sir, and get around that point in a hurry. If there is any fighting going on I want to take a hand."

"Ay, ay, sir. Boatswain's mate, call all hands," cried Berry.

"Mr. Macartney," said the captain, as the first lieutenant of the ship came leaping up the companion way to take the deck at the call of "All hands!" Leave Mr. Berry in charge. I want a word with you."

By the ready handling of the sailors and the nice seamanship of Berry, the Agamemnon swung to port, and with her speed greatly accelerated by the additional sail which had been set, coasted along the point at a broad angle to her former course. As they ran along the shore they speedily drew abreast the end of the promontory. The captain and first lieutenant were busily engaged in conversation on the poop, but nothing ever took the captain's mind from the ship he commanded.

"Mr. Berry," said the captain, "give that point yonder a wide berth before you brace up. I don't know what sort of jagged reefs it may terminate in. When you have cleared it run into the bay yonder."

It was quite easy now from the position they had attained to see that the promontory was the edge of what formed one side of a wide, deep bay. As they drew swiftly past its narrow apex, they could see at the head of the bay, perhaps half a mile away, a ruined tower standing upon a high cliff on the very edge of the water. On one side a rivulet flowed into the sea over a short stretch of sandy beach. From the flag-staff on the tower a white flag fluttered gaily in the breeze. On one of the hills inland a short distance from the tower, a cannon was planted, and as they

"I am to take charge of it, I suppose?" asked Macartney.

"Of course," answered the captain, as Macartney descended the ladder and received the trumpet from Berry.

"Haden't we better give them a shot or two when we get near enough, sir?" asked Macartney.

"Ay," answered his commander, "send Berry and his division to the guns. Let them cast loose and provide."

The Agamemnon was swiftly approaching the shore while this conversation was taking place. Presently with nice seamanship, Macartney, to whose judgment the captain had left the determination of the matter, headed the great ship to a spot whence she was equally distant from the enclosing sides of the bay and in such position that she had a clear way to sea, and her natural drift, while hove to, would be in that direction. The light sails were furled, the mainyard swung, and the ship stopped with her starboard broadside bearing on the shore.

All this time the gun on the hill was blazing away at the tower. No reply appeared to be made. There was not a sign of life about the tower except the flag fluttering bravely from the staff surmounting it. Just as the ship completed her movements and came to a rest, the watcher on her decks observed the men clustered around the guns running toward the castle. They were near enough to distinguish the shouts of "Vive la République. À bas les aristocrates!" which broke from the charging men.

The captain instantly realized that a breach had been made in the castle and that the assailants were about to take it by storm. As soon as the yelling soldiers came within range of the tower, however, puffs of smoke, followed by the sharp crack of muskets, protruding from loopholes, indicated that the defenders were alive. Here and there a man fell, but the fire from the tower was so feeble and so slow that there was no appreciable check to the advance of the mob, which had begun to empty its muskets at the defenders.

"We must stop that!" said the captain quickly. "Mr. Berry!"

As he spoke there was a puff of smoke forward on the main deck of the ship followed by the roar of a heavy gun. As the smoke cleared away they could see that the well-aimed shot had fallen into the midst of the attacking party, several of whom it struck down. The assailants stopped, amazed. The tower had hidden the approach of the ship, and in the excitement of the charge which took place as the Agamemnon had become visible, they had not marked her arrival.

"Well done, Berry!" cried the captain. "Give them another!"

Other guns in the battery were fired. The French turned and fled instantly, seeking concealment behind the broken rock at the foot of the hill whence they had come. A lucky shot from the Agamemnon just then shattered the field-piece. Meanwhile, three heavily-armed boat-crews had been called away, and three of the ship's cutters, loaded to the gunwales with seamen and marrines, pulled for the shore. In the stern-sheet of the first and largest boat was Lieutenant Macartney, who had command of the party. With him, explaining that he had come simply as a visitor, sat the little captain, who said he had a fancy to see the shore. In truth, when there was any fighting going on it was difficult, if not impossible, to keep him out of it.

As soon as the French perceived the boats pulling away from the ship, their leader, who seemed to be a man of courage and not without address, led his men forward under cover of the rocks to the opposite side of the river mouth from that on which the tower stood. There they opened a hasty and ineffective musketry fire upon the boats.

The men on the ship-of-the-line could not fire at the French for fear of hitting their own men, now close watched it they saw a puff of smoke from it followed by another report. Around the gun was a group of men. The glass disclosed that many of them were soldiers.

"What can it be?" asked the captain. "A white flag? A surrender?"

"I think, sir," said Lieutenant Macartney, who was staring at the banner through the glass, "that it's the old flag of France, the royal standard."

"Why, so it is!" said the captain, looking through the glass in his turn. "There's no thought of surrender there. I have it! They are holding the tower against those rascally Republicans! We'll take a hand in this game. Mr. Macartney take the deck. Run in within a cable's length of the shore. You needn't anchor. If the wind holds we shall be able to heave to. I will send off a boat party and see what we can do."

THE TWO CAPTAINS

to the beach. Indeed it was not necessary for them to do so, for as the first boat grounded on the shingle at the foot of the cliff, the marines leaped out and instantly took cover on the bank of the river and returned the fire of the French on the other side. They were reinforced by those in the second boat and presently by the bluejackets from the thwarts. The third boat, in obedience to a signal from Macartney, moved to port and landed her men in such a position as to take the French on the river bank in the rear. Their position was untenable, and they broke and fled precipitately, leaving some of the number dead on the shore. Their line of retreat took them in easy range of the tower. As they ran, the garrison thereof opened fire upon them again. The last to retreat was the French commander. He gave way reluctantly, stopping to shake his fist in the direction of the tower. As he did so, a well-aimed shot from the tower struck him and shattered his arm.

Having cleared the beach of the French, Macartney next moved toward the castle. The river mouth had evidently been used as some sort of a boat-landing by the inhabitants of the tower, for there to the right was a natural flight of stairs cut in the stone leading up the cliff from the dilapidated remains of a wharf. Up this stairway, Macartney, sword in hand, sprang. Close beside him was his captain, who had, true to his statement, taken no part in the operations save that of a looker-on. Following these two came the seamen. The marines were told off to cover the landing-place and protect the boats in case the French should seek to reoccupy their position on the other side of the river. To gain the top of the cliff required but a moment. There they found themselves confronted by an enormous door in the tower. With his sword-hilt Macartney beat upon it.

"Open!" he cried in French, which he spoke perfectly. "We bring rescue."

A voice came faintly through the thick old planking. "Who is there? Who are you?"

"Lieutenant Robert Macartney of His Britannic Majesty's ship Agamemnon, Captain Horatio Nelson. Strange, that sounds like a woman's voice," he said to the captain. "How can I reassure her? Ah, I have it! Vive le roi! Open the door."

The young officer heard someone fumbling with the bolts and bars. Presently the latter were drawn, and the two enormous doors creaked on their hinges as someone strove to pull them open. No one thought of the wicket, in the excitement of the moment.

"The doors are unbarred, monsieur," said a voice from within; "but we cannot open them."

"It is a woman's voice, by Jove!" cried Macartney. "Stand clear!" he shouted. He put his shoulder to the doors, and after a violent effort forced them open. Such was the strength with which he had thrust that he almost fell into the lower room of the tower when the doors gave way. Recovering himself as best he could after his unceremonious entrance, Macartney found himself face to face with a tall, slender girl of perhaps sixteen or seventeen years of age.

"Mademoiselle," said the startled lieutenant, taking all in one swift glance, "where is the garrison of the tower?"

"The tower is held by my grandfather, my brother, our two servants, and myself, monsieur."

"And your grandfather?"

"Is wounded. My brother, a boy, attends him upstairs. The other servant keeps watch toward the camp. We are the rest."

"Your name, mademoiselle?"

"The girl bowed gravely toward him.

"I am the Comtesse de Vaudémont," she said.

CHAPTER VI.

THE VICE-ADMIRAL GOES ABOARD

FAITH, mademoiselle," said Macartney, smiling at her, "you must pardon us for the abrupt way in which we precipitated ourselves into your presence."

"You came in the very nick of time, messieurs."

"I am glad to know that. What is the cause of the trouble?"

"I am—at least we are, for the king. My grandfather, the Marquis de Vaudémont—"

"Is your grandfather the Vice-Admiral de Vaudémont?"

"Yes, monsieur."

"I know who he is. I was a midshipman under Admiral Hughes in the West Indies a dozen years ago. I fought against him. Mademoiselle, you are honored in your ancestry."

"I have always known that, sir," answered the young woman proudly, "my father, Comte Honoré de Vaudémont, capitaine de vaisseau, was recently beheaded by the Republicans. My grandfather and his servant—our one remaining servant, monsieur—got my brother and myself out of La Conciergerie. We were escaping from France. This ruined tower belonged to the de Vaudémonts. It is the last of our possessions. A captain of the French navy, formerly an insubordinate sailor whom my grandfather once punished, followed us here. We have held the tower until to-day. You came at the right moment, messieurs. My father fought against the English. We do not love them, but I am not unmindful that we owe our lives to you."

"I am not an Englishman, comtesse," returned the young man promptly.

"How, monsieur? You are—"

"An Irishman, mademoiselle."

"'Tis the same thing, sir."

"Sure an' if you said that in Ireland, God bless her, you'd find that it wasn't at all!" replied Macartney, with a smile upon his handsome face.

"Monsieur, is there a surgeon with you?" she asked eagerly.

"Yes, on the beach, attending to some of our men who are wounded."

"I should like him to look at my grandfather."

"Certainly, mademoiselle. Mr. Nesbitt! Pass the word to Dr. Scott to come here as soon as he can."

"Now, Macartney," said the captain, who had been a silent but fidgety spectator, "what has this amazingly pretty girl been saying to you? I have been studying French for five years and I can't make out half a dozen words. Who are these people and what do they want? We can't stay here all day, you know."

The young girl's face flushed a beautiful crimson at this blunt speech from the captain of the Agamemnon.

"Monsieur," she said to Macartney in French, pointing to the little captain, "who is this person?"

"This person," laughed the lieutenant, "has the honor to be the captain of the ship that has had the good fortune to rescue you."

"Sir," said the young woman in perfect English, turning to Nelson as she spoke, "I do not love the English but I speak their language. I thank you, sir—I understood all you said—I thank you for the compliment you have paid me. 'Tis evidently as sincere as it is frank."

Nelson flushed like a schoolboy as he bowed with much embarrassment.

"I wonder," he muttered to himself, "why a man will be such a fool as to be certain that no one speaks his language but himself. Mademoiselle," he said aloud, "I spoke truly, though I did not intend—ah—in short, I am glad to have been of service to you. Ah, Dr. Scott, there is a wounded man upstairs. A French naval officer. Do what you can for him. Now, mademoiselle, what can we do for you?"

"We desire to escape from this place. Can you take us away on your ship?"

"Certainly, I can and will," answered Nelson promptly. "Hulloa, what's this?"

"This," was the silent Brébœuf, supporting on his arm the slighter form of the marquis. Fortunately, the old man had sustained no serious injury. His forehead, which had been badly cut, was bandaged. He looked a little paler than usual, and had lost much blood, but was quite his imperturbable self again.

"This," whispered Macartney, "will be the Marquis de Vaudémont. The French vice-admiral, you know."

"Oh, I see," returned Nelson. "Sir," he said in English to the marquis, "do you understand the English language?"

"I do, sir," answered the marquis, speaking with no less precision than his granddaughter. "I have learned the English tongue from the lips of women and the defiance of men. I have heard the language spoken by your guns."

"You gave as good as you sent, sir," said Nelson politely. Like most English seamen of his time, collectively he hated the French, individually many of them won his respect and affection. "I am honored at meeting such a distinguished officer of the Royal Marine of France. My ship is at your service. We are going to Toulon—"

"Toulon!" exclaimed the noble.

"Yes, have you not heard? It has declared for your king."

"Thank God that loyalty is not everywhere dead in France!" exclaimed the marquis.

"Lord Hood, with a fleet of twenty-two English ships-of-the-line, and Vice-Admiral de Langara, with seventeen Spaniards, are in the harbor. The Republicans are besieging it, but the place is impregnable. Shall we have the honor of taking you there?"

"Indeed, yes. I could ask nothing better than this. To be in a position to strike a blow for King Louis XVII, God bless him!"

"How many are in your party, sir?"

"What you see, Captain Nelson. My granddaughter, the Comtesse de Vaudémont"—Nelson bowed deferentially while the comtesse dropped him a sweeping courtesy—"her foster-sister, my servant Brébœuf and—" He lifted his voice—"Honoré, you may withdraw from your post now. My grandson, Comte Honoré de Vaudémont, Captain Nelson," he continued as the boy made his appearance. "My son died, like his king, on the scaffold a few weeks since, sir."

"I gathered as much," said Nelson lifting his hat. "Sir, you have my sympathy. Yet, 'twas a brave death."

"Thank you," said the marquis gravely. "His Majesty did not lack gentlemen to bear him company even to the guillotine."

"Monsieur," interrupted his granddaughter, "this gentleman led the attacking party which rescued us. His name is—"

"Robert Macartney, Monsieur le Marquis," answered Macartney in his perfect French, "an English naval officer, first lieutenant on the Agamemnon. But, harkee, born an Irishman, sir."

"There have been many Irish gentlemen in the marine of France, sir," said the marquis smiling.

"Yes, monsieur. You will always find them where there is fighting and love-making going on."

"There will be plenty of fighting but little of the latter in the French navy, sir," said the marquis. "I am pleased to make your acquaintance, sir."

"Ay, Macartney," said Nelson who was following the conversation, but with some difficulty, "you did the thing handsomely. I was simply a volunteer, my lord. I did not interfere with his plans. I shall report his actions to Lord Hood at Toulon. Now, sir, have you anything to take with you?"

"Only these portmanteaux," said the marquis, pointing to his mails.

"Macartney, will you see them safely aboard the boats? This way, sir." He offered the old man his arm.

"Mademoiselle," said Macartney, after directing some of the bluejackets to take the luggage, "allow me." He offered her his hand which she instantly accepted.

When they arrived on the little stretch of sand, Captain Nelson called Macartney to him and bade him despatch one of his boats to the ship with a command to Berry, the ranking officer on board. Bidding Macartney turn over the command of the two remaining cutters to Lieutenant Frazier, the Agamemnon's fourth, the captain took the vice-admiral, his grandson and granddaughter and Macartney in the stern-sheets of his gig, which had been sent to the shore after him. Brébœuf and Aurore, with the marquis' baggage, found room forward in one of the cutters.

As the gig slowly made its way to the ship in the wake of the other boats, the marquis stared silently toward the shore. The Republicans had seized the tower when they could safely do so, and as the old man gazed upon it a thin column of smoke curled above the broken parapet.

"The villains have set fire to the tower at last," said the little captain, following the other's glance. "Was it yours, my lord?"

"The last holding of my house, 'Tis a poor remnant of former ease and comfort, yet it sheltered me well in time of need," answered the marquis slowly.

"I will have a few shot thrown among them when we reach the ship. Perhaps that will stop them."

"Not so, sir," said the marquis. "Leave it to the fire. I had rather it were consumed than that it should give shelter to the enemies of France."

"Yet they are French, marquis," said Nelson.

"They are the enemies of the king, and with me, sir, the king is France."

By this time the gig shot alongside the ship, and Nelson motioned the marquis to precede him to the deck. As he set foot upon it, touching his hat to the flag, the boatswain and his mates trilled their silver calls—piping the side the ceremony was called—the marines presented arms, the drums ruffled, and forward the first gun of a vice-admiral's salute went thundering over the still waters of the bay.

The face of the old man beamed with pleasure. He sniffed the rolling cloud of smoke and the acrid, familiar smell of the burning powder with animation.

"Sir," he said turning to Nelson, "this is most handsome of you."

"Sir," replied Nelson bowing, "you are very welcome to the Agamemnon. We are allies. The ship is yours, sir. Gentlemen," he added turning to his officers, "I present you to the companion of Admiral de Suffren, Vice-Admiral de Vaudémont."

"Don't forget the young lady, sir," whispered Macartney, who stood close by.

"Certainly," said Nelson. "And gentlemen, allow me to present to you the Comtesse de Vaudémont and Comte Honoré de Vaudémont, her brother, with your permission, admiral. I said, mademoiselle, that the ship was your grandfather's, but in truth I am afraid you will command rather than either of us. We are all at your service."

The young woman courtesied deeply, while the gentlemen of the ship bowed profoundly before her. Her appearance, indeed, created much more of a sensation than that of the marquis. Those brave sailors could see vice-admirals any day. A woman like Louise de Vaudémont was a rarity at any time. Nelson spoke truly. From the moment she stepped upon the deck the whole ship, with its officers and men, would belong to her and her only.

"Three cheers, men!" cried Macartney at this juncture, "for Vice-Admiral de Vaudémont!"

Shall Married Women Earn Money?

IN a recent interesting discussion, several gentlemen, Professors of Political Economy, in prominent universities, expressed their views as to the propriety of wives who had worked before marriage, continuing thereafter to be wage-earners. They thought that at least every wife who desired to do so, should have the privilege to continue her work.

The home would, in many cases, gain in material comfort if the income were doubled by what a wife might earn in addition to her husband's wages. But there are two sides to the shield. A woman working all day long at her desk, at her loom, or in a shop, and coming home as weary as her husband, would not then be able to cook, to prepare a supper and a breakfast, or to clean the house. If the two, away at work, should employ domestic help, there would be waste in the wife's absence, and if children are born, the mother will suffer before they arrive, and later be compelled to neglect them if she is obliged to go on with wage-earning work outside her doors. The poor would be made poorer, not enriched, by this means.

A wife may incidentally earn pin-money, if she can do it without leaving her home, and domesticity will not suffer, but the domestic ideal is likely to be flawed, if she give to a business career the whole-hearted attention which is demanded if she would succeed.

Should wives to any great extent become wage-earners, they would necessarily have to accept the conditions which now accompany labor. Probably the much vexed relations that exist between capital and labor would become increasingly and perplexingly complicated. But the real objection is not in the wrong or the right of the thing, but in the convenience of it and the peril to the home, if it be forsaken all day by its presiding genius. Unless we are to have families without children, the idea is not admissible. Babies require brooding and children training, and they cannot receive either in a home where there is no mother with whom they are the first thought.

About Insomnia

How tired one is after a night spent in fighting insomnia. Whatever the cause, sleeplessness is a foe to be dreaded, and is the bane of middle and old age. Children and young people usually sleep well, falling asleep as soon as their heads touch the pillow, and sleeping soundly through every sort of noise and disturbance. But children know little of perplexing care. Their lives are ordered for them, and food and raiment are provided, so that they may rest without anxious thought.

Brain-fag, the result of continual attention to business, and nervous dyspepsia, a malady known to our hurrying people, who do not take time to eat or to rest after a meal, are the frequent occasions of a sleepless night. The habit of insomnia established, the victim finds himself a prisoner unable to break his bonds.

The temptation to take some powder or potion which will induce sleep, should be resisted. Narcotics are very subtle, and their tendency is to make what at first is an experiment, a fatal necessity. A friend, who was wakeful in the anguish of a great bereavement, asked her physician to let her take morphine. "I shall be insane if I cannot sleep," she said. You will be insane if you acquire the morphine habit," the doctor replied. In not a few cases, under pressure of extreme pain, or in the agony of loss, or the bitter solicitude caused by some living troubles, women resort to opiates to induce sleep, always with peril, often with dire consequences. Men, adduced by business reverses, unable to sleep because of notes that must be paid, harried by anxieties, walk the floor when they should be asleep, and then take something to induce sleep, a foolish and shortsighted proceeding.

Others, overworked and ill at ease, rise and read for an hour or two, or write letters, or in some way turn night into day. The trouble is, that if one rises at one o'clock in the morning on Tuesday, he will have it to do so again on Wednesday, Thursday and Friday.

A gentleman who has long suffered from insomnia, has found relief by taking, in the middle of the night, a cold plunge in the bath-tub, which he leaves filled for the purpose before he retires. Another has been aided by bathing face and hands in cold water, and still another has found dipping the feet in very hot water an excellent remedial prescription. A hot-water bag at the pit of the stomach puts one nervous woman to sleep, when nothing else serves to do so. Something to eat, a thin slice of bread, or a cracker, a bit of chocolate, or a glass of milk, will help some sufferers to a good night's rest. If one go to bed hungry, one need not expect to sleep soon or well.

An ill-ventilated room is one of the chief producers of insomnia known to civilized man. Why are we so afraid of fresh air? Pure air and plenty of it will almost certainly insure adequate and refreshing sleep.

Physicians send the victims of lung disease away from home, to some dry climate, and tell them to sleep out of doors. A wise doctor said: If only people, in any climate, would give up their terror of a draught, and sleep with abundant fresh air, they would sleep, not toss about and have bad dreams.

If one cannot afford every luxury, if fine furniture and

Getting Past the Servants

TO a man whose business it is to sell the wares of a certain excellent manufactory, I said, "I suppose you have a good many customers here?" "Oh, no," said he, "not many. My trouble is that I cannot see people. I cannot get past the servants. They take me for an agent or a pedler, and I don't get into the presence of the house mistress." A bright little lady, who has supported herself for several years by selling to housekeepers some admirable domestic articles, a polish for silver, a patent pie-board and the like, sighed as she confessed to me that this was her difficulty too. "People are not like you," she said. "They have a prejudice against anybody who brings goods to their doors."

Thinking the matter over, it seemed to me that there is an unfairness in our attitude to the woman with the satchel and the man with the grip-sack. They are merchants in a small way, and they relieve us if their wares are what we want, of the trouble and bother and wasted time spent in sauntering through big and bewildering shops. Why should they not have their innings? Why should we suffer them to be rudely turned away from our doors by maids who survey all pedlars from a lofty height, and whose refusal is often most discourteous?

The man in the central business office, like the lady in her drawing-room, is guarded from intrusion by persons whose orders are to keep outside the pale advertising agents, book agents, solicitors, etc. By ruse or perseverance, canvassers and others sometimes elude these wardens, and get into the presence-chamber. They are not always successful even when they gain admission, but they do not mind rebuffs from headquarters as much as from underlings.

Whatever be the excuse for guarding one's privacy and protecting one's purse from the individual call, it would seem as if we owed something to the struggling brothers and sisters who are trying bravely to win a foothold, and who are sure in nine cases out of ten, that they would succeed if only they could pass the servants. Usually these humble bread-winners have people who depend on them—wives, children, or aged parents, whose daily comfort hangs upon their sales. Next time we are tempted curtly to dismiss a persistent book agent, let us try to put ourselves in his or her place, try to realize the miles walked in rain and sun, the frequent disappointments, and the true-hearted endeavors that belong to this unenviable lot in life.

AUNT MARJORIE.

"She Supports the Family"

The words fell from the lips of a woman who was sitting in a ferry-boat and they were tinged with a certain scorn. They formed a sort of commentary in a recent discussion of some learned men to the effect that a married woman, if the family were poor, might properly help support the household, to which conclusion most of the disputants leaned. Now, if a wife may assist her husband in wage-earning and win praise for so doing and smooth his pathway, why should she be blamed if she undertook the whole task? Clearly, it is not supposed to be a woman's duty to go out and earn the bread and butter, the rent, the taxes, and the children's clothing. If a woman should be seen digging in the fields while her husband sat by the window seeding or shelling peas, or making a pudding, she would be pitied and he would be regarded with the contempt the frontier settlers feel for a squaw-man. He would be a Miss Nancy, a feminine, or perhaps rather an effeminate specimen of manhood, whom nobody would tolerate.

If a man be hopelessly a cripple or an incurable invalid, then his wife, if she can, may support the family, and all sympathy will be with him, and all honor with her; unless there be the excuse of ill-health for him, a stigma will fix itself on his reputation, if he allow his wife wholly to sustain the burden of the home maintenance.

The fitness of things is conserved only when the balance is held even, and justice underlies the home living.

Concerning Handwriting

A man's signature should be legible. The object of writing is to be easily read, and therefore all vagueness and blindness in writing is to be avoided. Very elegant penmanship may miss the mark, because it is hard to decipher. Among women, there are styles of writing that are equal to Chinese puzzles in their extreme and baffling uniformity; all sharp angles and hair-lines, and faint coloring of palest ink. Part of a gentlewoman's education should be not only to write a graceful and interesting letter, but to write it in a firm and distinctive hand, that taxes neither the eyesight, nor the patience of the fortunate person who receives it.

elegant rugs, and rich silver and cut-glass and china are beyond the reach of the purse, let one choose where to expend money, and let it be expended on beds. A good bed, in a clean, well-aired room, is a defence against insomnia.

Thus far, we have dwelt on the material bulwarks of sleep. Spiritually, a good conscience has a tonic effect here. If one has injured another, or is at feud with a neighbor, or is harboring a grudge, he need not expect to sleep. If one is in debt, and living beyond his means, sleep will fly his pillow. The Christian, child or man, should kneel and say,

Now I lay me down to sleep
I pray the Lord my soul to keep

The Christian may say, "I laid me down and slept, for the Lord sustained me."

EVA D. You may clean your gloves at home by the simple process of putting them on, and washing your hands in gasoline. Mrs. Cynthia Westover Alden, in her new book, Women's Hints at Saving Money, gives a good recipe for this purpose: a mixture of deodorized benzine, into a quart of which is mixed a dram of sulphate of ether, another of chloroform, and two drams of alcohol. This will clean ten pairs of gloves. A young woman like you could turn an honest penny by cleaning gloves for her friends. Mrs. Alden's book is filled to the brim, and runs over with useful hints to the every-day woman.

Courage in Word and Deed

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON, BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS*

WE will let Elijah tell this story: "When the Lord had sustained me in the home of the widow at Zarephath for two years through the never-failing barrel of meal and cruise of oil, I received the new orders from God: 'Go thou thyself unto Ahab, and I will send rain upon the earth.' I had just crossed the border into Ahab's kingdom, when I met Obadiah, the superintendent of Ahab's palace. He told me that he was searching for grass that the king's mules and horses might not die. He said that the king himself had gone on the same quest in another direction. Obadiah did not seem altogether glad to see me, and when I told him to go and tell his master that I was come, his half-cordial manner turned to fear, as he said: 'Why do you ask so hard a thing of me, for I have been a faithful servant of the Lord, when all around me in the king's palace are idolaters? I even saved from death one hundred of God's prophets, by hiding them from Queen Jezebel in two caves, and giving them food and water.' His fear was that when he should bring the king to meet me, I would have suddenly disappeared. But when I reassured him, he went to bring Ahab. I did not have long to wait. Ahab's frame was strung to the highest tension with indignation. His greeting to me was: 'Art thou he that troubleth Israel?' Nothing daunted, I replied: 'Thou art thyself the troubler of Israel, because thou hast forsaken the Lord, and hast followed Baalim and taught the people so.' He winced under the accusation, and I saw my opportunity. I proposed a test by which the people should see for themselves which was the true God, whether Jehovah or Baal. Towering just above the place of my meeting was Mount Carmel. I demanded that he should appoint a day when the people of his kingdom should gather together on Mount Carmel, also the four hundred and fifty priests of Baal that were sustained by Queen Jezebel. He did not dare to refuse, for he knew well that I was but uttering the command of the God he had so grievously offended, and who had punished him and the people with famine. He turned and left me to execute the order. His whole mien had changed. His highly-strung muscles had become relaxed, and I could read in every movement that he was setting out on a most disagreeable errand. Even Obadiah looked as if he were the king by comparison, for he was buoyed up by the hope that the God whom he had been serving in secret was about to be vindicated."

Illustration and Application

The one pre-eminent theme of this story is, Courageous Christian Testimony in Word and Deed by Preacher and Layman. It is not the first time we have considered the duty and privilege of courageous testimony, nor will it be the last, for the double reason that courage is frequently presented in the Bible in example and precept, and is greatly needed in our own times. A minister who had preached the same sermon on three successive Sundays, on being remonstrated with, said he intended to preach it until his people practiced it. To repeat that course, would be to crowd out all other virtues that need attention, but courageous testimony should be often urged, until it is oftener heard in public and in private from preachers and laymen. Elijah's heroism prompts a consideration of fearless preaching and teaching, while Obadiah's lay testimony in courageous deeds is all the more instructive, from the fact that he shows in this lesson his natural tendency to fear. Even Elijah, we shall see, was "a man of like passions," and of like fears with us, and yielded to them, when even for a little he forgot he was under the eye of the Mighty God.

Biography is a great text-book of courage, especially Bible biography. The cowards are mostly forgotten. It is the heroes we delight to honor. The man who is honest enough to confess to himself that he is a "natural coward" should turn to Bible heroes to see how he may become a supernatural hero. "The glorious company of the prophets" will be his best exemplars. The false priests all through the Bible, with only a few exceptions, represent the preachers of every age who have said in their hearts, "Put me into the priest's office that I may eat a piece of bread." Some of them had heroic ideals when they took their vows as young men, but they soon reached what Robert Louis Stevenson profoundly calls "middle-aged cowardice." He recognizes that it is a disease likely to settle on writers and doers as well as talkers. The ministerial heroism of the Bible is found mostly in the prophets, who cared less for ritual than for righteousness. But it should be noted that even the prophets were not under any divine compulsion to be brave. Some of them, like Balaam, were half spoiled by covetousness. Many of them were less anxious to please God than to please the crowd or the king. Again and again we catch a glimpse of hundreds of cowardly prophets who missed some great opportunity (II. Chron. 18: 5; Jer. 29). Not even the names are given, save a few, and those the world willingly forgets. But even those men of to-day who in business, and politics, and pleasure are not brave themselves, and when with the Romans, do as the Romans do—a coward's motto—admire, and honor, and cherish, as household words, the Bible heroes who dared to be in the right with two or three, or even to stand alone under the hero's motto: When you are with the Romans, do as the Romans ought to do. Such men were Noah, and Abraham, and Elijah, Jeremiah, and Daniel, Luther, and Knox, and many more true prophets, not foretellers all, or chiefly, but speakers for God, as the word prophet means. They were heroes because they were "seers"—seers of God, and so had no fears of man.

A big Highland soldier in the Boer War, who had the moral courage to be a Christian in the army, which every soldier knows is greater than military courage, being asked to say a few words in a soldier prayer meeting, propounded this question: "See here, chums, why didn't the lions eat Daniel?" After a pause he replied, "It was because Daniel was three parts backbone and all the rest gristle." The soldiers who had been hiding their prayers knew what he meant, and some became ashamed of their shame, and opened their windows toward Jerusalem. Not less than "the goodly fellowship of the prophets," does "the noble army of martyrs"

Jesus! who for me didst wear a crown of thorns." Then rising, the Archbishop pronounced the impious sentence: "I devote thy soul to the devil." "And I," quietly replied John Huss, raising his eyes to heaven, "do commit my spirit into Thy hands, O Lord Jesus! for thou hast redeemed me."

We do well to tell over to each new generation, the stories of the martyrs, not alone to prompt gratitude for the liberty they bought for us with their blood, but also to prompt us to seek courage where they found it, lest we dishonor God and ourselves by cowardice, when we have to face not fires, but only sneers; not death but only loss of honors, offered at the price of dishonor.

Lest those who are not preachers or talkers, may think they are not expected to show the courage of Elijah confronting Ahab at God's command, let us turn to study the courage in deeds of the layman, Obadiah. Was he much of a hero after all? He was very much afraid when Elijah told him to bring Ahab. Yes, and that magnifies the courage of his deed when at the risk of his life he dared to hide one hundred men of God whom Jezebel had devoted to death. It is the man who feels fear and overcomes it who is bravest of all. Obadiah, a saint in Ahab's household, and the "saints in Caesar's household," when Caesar was Nero, with Moses and Joseph in Egypt, and Daniel's band in Babylon, assure us that one can be a Christian anywhere God puts him. Only let us not, therefore lead ourselves into temptation, nor go to Babylon of our own choice, for few withstand an evil environment. Really most of the Bible heroes were laymen, like Lord Shaftesbury, of England, and B. F. Jacobs, of the United States those we call prophets, were mostly statesmen or business men by regular occupation, who, nevertheless, found abundant opportunity to speak effectively for God. Noah was a preaching ship-builder, and Abraham a great ranchman, who spoke chiefly by example, setting up God's altar in Chaldea and Canaan, where all the households were idolaters. And Joseph, the statesman-premier, was not much of a talker, but a faithful doer alike when slave and regent. And Moses was another statesman premier, while making God's first Bible. And Daniel, too, was a premier preacher—indeed, all the prophets were statesmen as well as preachers, most of them advisers of king and people in affairs of state as well as affairs of soul. Amos, was herdsman for a living while shepherding Israel as a fearless prophet. And all the apostle were self-supporting business men reminding us of Carey, the Columbus of modern missions, who said his business was serving the Lord but he made shoes for a living.

The greatest human need of the Church to-day is more of such unprofessional lay witnessing. "Would God that all the Lord's people were prophets." And we need not alone to have more real speaking for God in meeting by laymen, with soul-filled message (not cold doses of cant to "fill the time"), but we need cheerful Christian conversation still more, and most of all, a new book of Acts the winsome witnessing of fearless deeds.

If in some way the Church could make it felt by its own people that moral courage is as honorable a military courage, we should see the Church more cases to paralyze the fearless Japanese spies, who asked and got their request—that when they were shot, it should be with hands unbound and eyes unbandaged.

A young officer who had been in the Peking relief army and in other wars, being asked by his brother, on a home visit, to name the bravest scene he had ever witnessed, replied that it was the act of a young British ensign who, having borne the Union Jack fearlessly at the very front of the British troops as they marched through a breach in the wall of Peking, facing a horde of infuriated Boxers fell on his knees when they had entered the city and victor was assured, in the presence of all his comrades, and still holding the flag in one hand, thanked God for the deliverance he had wrought. Many pale cheeks of the rescuers were moistened, and many eyes of the rescuers were in mist of tears at the sight of that act of Christian courage which even those too cowardly to do it themselves, instinctively admired.

"Christ's service effeminacy! Nay, try those flashy spirit with their own weapons. Ask them whether Cromwell's Ironsides were brave; whether Scott's Cameronians were brave; ask them whether Havelock and General Gordon were brave; ask them whether Nelson's Methodists were brave."

With a World's Peace Conference just at hand, to be held in our own land, let us consider whether in the very illustrations of preachers and teachers, as well as in the school histories that magnify wars, we are not keeping up the war spirit that has so long cursed the world, and hindered the fulfilment of the promise that Christ should bring "Peace on earth." Let us more and more exalt civic courage.

MOUNT CARMEL, THE SCENE OF ELIJAH'S SACRIFICE

prompt our coward hearts to seek courage in Christ. On the corridors of a house in Prague, two English followers of Wycliffe, long ago, painted Christ's lowly entry into Jerusalem as an uncrowned spiritual King, before whom went the cry, "Behold the King cometh unto thee, meek," and beside it, by way of contrast, the Pope in pompous procession, decked with a triple crown. A devout, but thoughtful young priest, saw the pictures and said, "It is strangely different. Methinks we must be wrong." He went home to study the Bible as translated by Wycliffe, and was fully persuaded that Romanism was a perversion of the simple faith of the New Testament. He found peace in Christ, and proclaimed him as the only Saviour. For that brave testimony John Huss was sentenced to be burned at the stake.

"Oh, cursed Judas!" So spake the enemies of John Huss, taking the chalice from him. "We take from you this cup filled with the blood of Jesus Christ." "I hope, by the mercy of God," answered the martyr, with shining face, "that this very day I shall drink of his cup in his own kingdom." "We take from thee the robe of righteousness," was said, as they divested him of his purple garb. "I shall this day don the garments of salvation," bravely and undauntedly replied John Huss. "We place thee with the devils," was chanted, as on his brow they placed a cap of paper painted with frightful figures of demons. "Most joyfully," said Huss, "will I wear this crown of shame for Thy sake, O

Triumphs of the Gospel

Missionaries in Central and South America
Report Glorious Progress in their Work

A GUATEMALA WOMAN

CENTRAL and South America has been known for many years as "the neglected field." Gospel progress there was slow, and there were many discouragements to the workers. In the two letters to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, published below, it is significant and cheering that the writers, though far apart, should not only coincide so remarkably in their record of the triumphant advance of the Gospel in these distant lands, but should both exclaim:

We praise God and take courage!

The opening letter is from Missionary C. F. Secord, of Chichicostenango, Guatemala, C. A., who writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD as follows:

In December last, we completed the mission station, upon which we had been laboring, and now have a commodious place, consisting of a dwelling, a dispensary, a reaching room and a hospital. The latter, however, is not yet fitted up. Thus we now have a permanent headquarters in the central town of Quiche-land. About 500-600 souls compose our field, and until about three years ago, when my wife and I settled among them, they knew nothing of the Gospel.

To suppose that the Indians are Romantics is a great mistake. While many of them frequent the temples, they do so chiefly to have a sheltered place in which to worship according to ancient customs, placing flowers, fruits and candles on the floor and swinging incense pots. Regular worship is also carried on in the mountains, and near here are many altars, where offerings are made to the gods of their fathers. The ancient worship is under the direction of wizard-priests, who are greatly respected and feared, and to whom are attributed supernatural powers. The worship is a mixture of demon and re-worship. Many times have I seen Indians kneeling at their altars to catch the first rays of the sun as it rose over the mountains.

In many of the Quiche towns sewing machines are in use, and in all, without exception, the people are highly industrious. Many of the towns in our vicinity are very high, as we are on the Andes range. Corn (the principal food), oats, wheat, barley, potatoes, etc., are grown in abundance. The small grains are all threshed out by horses and mules, who lead it out on dirt floors. Fine pottery and cotton and woolen goods of all kinds are made, and are carried into neighboring republics by the Indian merchants, who return with merchandise to sell here. Sunday is the great market day, and the busiest of all the week.

The Gospel is beginning to make headway among the people at last. Numbers have not only put away their idols, but are demonstrating by changed lives that the Holy Spirit now dwells where ignorance and darkness formerly ruled. We praise God and take courage.

One of our converts destroyed a very valuable idol, in spite of great opposition; but his wife, who was not then clearly in the light, kept one of its shoes as a remembrance. She gradually learned more truth, and not being able to withstand an awakened conscience, burned the shoe also. The native believers are active workers, and wherever they go, bear a testimony to the truth. One young Quiche visited an Indian town some distance from here and stirred up such an interest that a deputation came to visit me, seeking more information of the Gospel. In many places little companies meet to listen to the Scriptures, as some one of their number reads to them, and several towns have invited me to visit them and to hold meetings. Just recently I had the great privilege of preaching the Gospel to some twelve of the leading men at a little place near here. One of the things taught the converts is family worship, and it is delightful to know they are teaching their children the truth at home.

"Holy Week," or more appropriately named "Unholy Week," is a time of unrestrained revelry. In one small temple I saw the Indian youths gambling on the floor, with rum bottles at their sides, and in a near-by town, at this time, a great feast is made in honor of a famous god, who possesses a large herd of cows. The cows are thrown down and forced to eat fish, and drink chocolate, etc. It is believed that if this is not done, the god would bring down misfortune.

BEGINNING WORK ON A NEW MISSION STATION IN GUATEMALA

Our medical work is greatly blessed of God, and many are the doors opened to the Gospel by it. In fact, whole towns have become friendly after witnessing the restoration to health of sick ones, and medicines and care are given free of charge, and A. E. Bishop and other missionaries from Guatemala City, who have visited us, are extremely pleased with this important branch of the work.

In a letter to this journal from San Paulo, Brazil,

Mrs. Kate H. Young, an American missionary, gives some encouraging news concerning the spiritual progress of that country. After acknowledging funds forwarded, she writes:

Our first meeting here was attended by seventeen persons (Sept. 1900) and only through much prayer, and assiduous house-to-house visiting, were we enabled to gather about us congregations to hear the Word. Little by little the work grew. Before long we had some good workers amongst the natives, and so, by degrees, God has blessed us with a strong people here in San Paulo—not in numbers, for we are only about 150, but in quality—washed from their sins and endowed with at least a measure of power from on high.

We have entered now five States in this republic, and have ten congregations in as many different places, all under the care of our native helpers. With the exception of one Englishman, all our workers are of the Latin race, and very good and efficient they are. We number about 400 in all.

One of our native co-laborers, Signor Samuel Mello, was one of the most notorious gamblers in South Brazil. This man, leaving literally all to follow Jesus, has become a missionary of extraordinary power, and has led many into the Gospel. He established a good congregation of new converts in Paranagua, and used the last of his means to build a church and pastor's dwelling there. That finished, placing another pastor in charge, he has now started for a new Gospel campaign in the State of Goyazo. We have the privilege of sending the first missionaries into the unevangelized States of Goyazo and Matto Grosso.

Sns. Camillo Roig and Theodoro Arango traversed the primeval forests, riding over 1,500 miles to Cuyaba, capital of Matto Grosso. On the way they met wild Indians, who, however, treated them in a most friendly manner. In a very crude way, they talked with the Indians about Jesus, and passed on. In safety they crossed swollen rivers and encountered wild animals, snakes, and many dangers, until God brought them to their destination in the very heart of South America. There they followed out our system of work—open-air preaching, house-to-house visiting, selling Bibles, and indoor preaching, and the results are a substantial little congregation of believers.

We are convinced that the great solution of the missionary question, instead of importing foreigners, who rarely, if ever, master the language, and who often do not comprehend the racial peculiarities of temperament and training (or lack of training), is for us, as pioneers, to educate and prepare the converts to carry on and develop the work.

So far, this has been crowned with most remarkable success, and we thank God, and take courage and go forward.

Mourning at the Bowery Mission

iano in the cheap resorts which line a part of this notorious thoroughfare. He was only twenty-one—a mere boy—yet he drank deeply of the bitter cup of overt and humiliation before his memorable first visit to the Bowery Mission which marked the turning-point, and from which dated the consecration of his life and his talents to the service of God.

The Turning-point of His Life

One Sunday morning he was sitting, miserable, alone and almost starving, upon a park bench in the upper part of the city. A man, a German, sat down by him, and Benke ventured to ask him if he knew of a place in New York where he could get a piece of bread. The man replied that he had heard of a place called the Bowery Mission, where a lady gave out sandwiches and coffee to poor men on Sunday morning, "but," said he, "that is two or three miles from here." I would walk five miles for a piece of bread," said the penniless youth. The stranger directed him, and he, knowing the Bowery only too well, soon found his way to the Mission. That particular morning found the Mission with no pianist, and Mrs. Bird, who led the meeting, asked if there was any one in the audience who could play. Down the aisle came the young man who had walked so far for a bit of bread. Seating himself at the instrument—the first touch of the keys seemed to electrify the player as well as the listeners, all of whom rained their necks to see who was bringing such wonderful music from the old instrument—chords and harmonies such as had never been heard within those walls before.

That was the beginning of a new life for Victor Benke. He soon was brought to acknowledge the Christ to whom he owed his salvation, and devotion to his cause early became the aim of his life and labor. Aside from his gift of music, which amounted almost to genius, Mr. Benke possessed wonderful power in speaking, in pleading the cause of Christ. He soon became proficient in English. His words and arguments were always simple, direct and most convincing, and when after an eloquent plea that the men before him who were so wretched, would only accept the Christ who had saved him and made him so happy, he would sometimes supplement his words by a melody so tenderly brought from the organ by the love in his soul and the magic of his fingers, that many a hardened sinner was brought to his knees for the first time. When Mr. Moody first heard Benke play, he was so charmed that he instantly engaged him to play at the meetings of the convention then being held in New York.

He was afterward associated with Mr. Sankey, Hubert P. Main, Fanny Crosby, and other prominent musicians and poets, in the composition of Gospel music, and many of his hymns appear in different collections. During the last few winters, the old Bowery Mission walls have resounded to some of the best of classical music, both instrumental and vocal, and the men of the Bowery have been treated every Tuesday evening to the finest kind of musical and literary programmes. Many a tempting offer has Mr. Benke had from different churches to occupy the position of organist, but nothing could lure him from his loyalty to the Mission and the good friends he had found there.

He died in the harness. On the occasion of his last concert at the Mission, it was with difficulty that he could carry out the programme, and although suffering the most exquisite pain, he kept up until the close, when his fingers dropped from the organ keys, which never again felt their loving touch.

The Bowery Mission has lost a devoted worker, the musical world a shining light, and hosts of friends mourn his early death; but his influence lives, and no one may say in what far-off corner of the globe, or how many years from now, will be remembered, the "Volunteer Organist" and his ten years of faithful work for the souls of fallen men.

A Memorial to Organist Benke

IT is the earnest desire of the workers of the Bowery Mission to perpetuate the memory of Mr. Benke, by the erection of a suitable tablet on the walls of the Mission. It will tell in simple language of his remarkable conversion ten years ago, of his self-sacrificing and devoted labors, of his unswerving loyalty to his homeless brethren on the Bowery, and of the tender regard in which he was held, not only by them, but by the large circle of Christian friends that he had formed in this country. Subscriptions are being received by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to defray the cost of the memorial tablet; and whatever amount is subscribed in excess of the cost will be handed over to the widow.

It is quite possible that amongst the many readers of this paper who have known Mr. Benke personally, or who have heard of his wonderful usefulness through our columns, there may be those who, as a token of their gratitude to God for this splendid trophy of Divine grace, may wish to subscribe to this fund. From such we shall be glad to hear. The following have already been received:

The Land of the Top-Knots

MANY of the most revered, common, and firmly settled of the customs and superstitions of the people of Korea are, as it were, woven, braided, coiled and pinned into their top-knots, on which, like a hairy keystone, seem to hang, and around which are centered society, religion, and politics. The pigtail of China is nothing like as important, for it is really a mark of servitude, or was such in its origin, a badge laid on the conquered by the conquering race. But not so the top-knot, which is many centuries old, and which, according to ancient histories, pictures, pottery and embroideries, goes as far back as the existence of the nation.

When a boy becomes engaged, or is on the point of being married, a solemn ceremony is performed. In the presence of proper witnesses, and at the hands of proper functionaries (among whom are astrologers or soothsayers), the hair, which has hitherto been parted like a girl's, and worn in a long braid down the back, is shaved from a small circular spot on the top of his head, and the remaining long locks combed smoothly upward, and tied very tightly over the shaved place. They are then twisted and coiled into a small compact knot, between two and three inches high, and about one in diameter. An amber, coral, silver, or even gold or jeweled pin is usually fastened through it. The Mangan, a band of net bound with ribbon, is then fastened on around the head below the top-knot, and above the ears, holding all stray hairs neatly in place (when a man obtains rank a small open horse-hair cap is placed over the top-knot), and over all the hat, which (being also of open work, bamboo splints, silk or horse-hair), permits it to be seen. Fine new clothes are then donned, especially a long coat, and the boy has become a man. A feast is made, and he goes forth to call upon and be congratulated by his father's friends. Either on that day or the following he is married, although, as has been said, some boys have their hair put up when they become engaged.

No matter how old one is, without a top-knot he is never considered a man, addressed with high endings, or treated with respect. After assuming the top-knot, no matter how young, he is invested with the dignities and duties of a man of the family, takes his share in making the offerings and prayers at the ancestral shrines, and is recognized by his ancestors' spirits as one of the family who is to do them honor, and whom they are to protect and bless. And right here, to digress a little, it is interesting to note that so intimately is this custom concerned with their religion, that many of the Christian converts are now cutting off their top-knots when they become converted, regarding that as the one step (after destroying their idols) which most effectually cuts off the old life and its superstitions, and marks them as having come out from their family and acquaintances as men set apart.

They have begun doing this quite of their own accord, with no suggestion from the missionaries, and in some cases in opposition to the advice of some of us, who dislike to see them laying aside old customs needlessly. But it is growing more and more general among new believers to sacrifice this dear object of pride and veneration, and one young fellow told my husband it was impossible to break away from his old evil associates until he cut his hair. They then believed he was in earnest and let him alone. But it costs much, and in these cases is done quite voluntarily, not in forced obedience to the mandates of conquerors and traitors, which is a very different matter.

Again, far down in the social scale, lower than the boy with the pigtail, whom every one snubs, ranking next to the despised butcher, who daily defiles his hands with blood and gore, and with the touch of dead bodies, is the Buddhist priest who wears his hair shaved, a creature so low that he was not at that time allowed to defile the capital city by entering its gates. To this grade were all the sons of Korea now to be reduced. Tender associations of early manhood, honored family traditions, ghostly superstition, the anger and disgust of ancestral spirits, the iron grip of long custom, the loathing of the effeminate, sensual and despised Buddhist priests, all forbade this desecration. Their pride, self-respect and dignity were all assailed and crushed under foot. Sullen, angry faces were seen everywhere, sounds of wailing and woe were heard continually in every house, for the women took it even harder than the men. Farmers and carriers of food and fuel refused to bring their produce to market, for guards stood at the gates, and cut off with their swords every top-knot as it came through. Men were stationed also in all the principal streets, cutting off every top-knot that passed, and all public officials and soldiers were at once shaved. There was a voice heard, lamentation and mourning and great weeping.

It was a cruel blow at personal liberty, which Anglo-Saxons would die rather than suffer, and which the helplessness of this weak nation made the more pitiful and inexcusable. It was struck shrewdly too, at one of the specially distinguishing marks of Koreans, setting them apart from Japanese and Chinese, designed, we could not help thinking, as one of the first and important parts of a scheme to blot out Korea's national identity, and merge her into one with Japan; but if this was the intention, never was anything more mistakenly planned. It was hotly resented to the very heart of the country, and added still deeper dye and bitter flavor to the long-nourished hatred Koreans felt for their ancient conqueror and foe.

Mr. Comstock also sheds light on the gamblers' methods of evading the law through collusion with corrupt officials. Pp. 37. Paper covers.

The Widow's Mite and Other Psychic Phenomena, by Isaac K. Funk. This is a somewhat remarkable book. The mite in question was loaned to Dr. Funk many years ago by the widow of the late Henry Ward Beecher, the borrower wanting to make an engraving of it. He directed that it be returned, and was surprised, long after the incident had been forgotten, to have it recalled at a "spiritualistic seance," when, as he relates, he was informed that the loan had not been returned, but was in a certain place in his office. He discovered this to be the fact. Upon this incident and the many explanations of it which come from different sources, the book is chiefly based, although it discusses incidentally almost every known phase or aspect of psychic phenomena. Dr. Funk distinctly disclaims any belief in spiritualism. Pp. 538. Price $2; cloth covers; illustrated. Funk & Wagnalls, New York, publishers.

Common yellow soaps should never be used for washing these, as such soaps contain rosin, are sticky and will leave a disagreeable odor. Tonic for the Sick

Neither be ye sorry, for the joy of the Lord is our strength.
My grace is sufficient for thee: for my strength is made perfect in weakness. Most gladly, therefore, will I rather glory in my infirmities, that the power of Christ may rest upon me.
Therefore, I take pleasure in infirmities, in reproaches, in necessities, in persecutions, in distresses, for Christ's sake; for when I am weak, then am I strong.
Ye shall be sorrowful, but your sorrow shall be turned into joy. Your joy no man taketh from you.
Hitherto ye have asked nothing in my name; ask, and ye shall receive, that your joy may be full.
These things have I spoken unto you, that in me ye might have peace. In the world ye shall have tribulation, but be of good cheer; I have overcome the world.
Unto ye that fear my name shall the Sun of righteousness arise with healing in his wings.
The path of the just is as the shining light, that shineth more and more unto the perfect day.
In everything give thanks; for this is the will of God in Christ Jesus concerning you.
The Lord is my strength and song, and is become my salvation.
I will delight myself in thy commandments, which I have loved. This is my comfort in my affliction: for thy word hath quickened me.
He hath not despised nor abhorred the affliction of the afflicted; neither hath he hid his face from him: but when he cried unto him he heard.
But though he cause grief, yet will he have compassion according to the multitude of his mercies.
For he doth not afflict willingly, nor grieve the children of men.
Like as a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear him.
For he knoweth our frame, he remembereth that we are dust.
Though our outward man perish, yet the inward man is renewed day by day.
For our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory.
Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him.
But God hath revealed them unto us by his Spirit.

A Western Pastor on Peace

Dear Christian Herald.—I noticed in your issue of May 25 an article entitled, "The Peace Movement." Also another setting forth some of the arguments and reasons for the inauguration of an aggressive and permanent peace tribunal, to be organized at the coming Peace Congress, to be held in Boston on October 3.
I herewith (being myself a minister of the gospel), hasten to express myself as decidedly in favor of such a movement, and endorse what you have said on the subject. I am thankful to Almighty God that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD presented to the World's Sunday School Convention, in session in Jerusalem, such a memorial, and best of all that it was unanimously adopted. I emphatically believe the time is ripe for a practical Peace tribunal, led by the United States of America, to enforce the settlement of any and all differences arising between nations, by arbitration and without war. There is, according to Holy Writ, a good time coming, when we will beat our swords and spears into ploughshares and pruning hooks; when the Lord will be our God and we his people.
Let us have no more child's play in this matter, but let us organize and institute a tribunal that will mean to maintain peace and will do it. If any one nation, disposed to war, were sure that all other nations were nobly combined to enforce peace, that nation would readily desist.

THE GREAT RECEPTION HALL IN LONDON, WHERE THE CONGRESS MET

The Salvation Army Congress

THE Salvation Army International Congress, which has just closed in London, was held in a great hall specially erected, in the Strand. Six thousand delegates, representing forty-nine countries, attended. Gen. Booth opened the Congress in person, and made a brief dedicatory address. The great iron building, with its metallic mediæval gateway, from the sham battlements of which fly the banners of the Army, was filled during the meetings with the most remarkable assemblages ever seen in London. Men and women of various races and nationalities in quaint and picturesque costumes, were there gathered for the International Congress of the Salvation Army. In front of them, over the platform, were the words, "The World for Christ"; behind them, "Christ for the World."

A Poet's Tribute

JUST as the funeral service of Victor Benke, the "Volunteer Organist," was commencing at the Bowery Mission, a lady stepped quietly within the Mission doors and asked the Superintendent to lay a flower upon the casket for her. She also handed him the following verses, which she had composed in memory of Mr. Benke:

The song is ended and the singer is
With God's redeemed. The hand that message wrought
From organ-keys now sweeps celestial lyre.
The organ that seemed very voice of God
When touched by this man's wondrous skill
To life,
Is silent now and sad; for not again
Will come its well-beloved friend, who wove
Such symphony from its white keys and black
That wearied men, sin-tired and weak, found rest
And faith and strength from its rare cadences.

The song is ended and the singer is
With God's redeemed. And yet there comes this hour
A benediction memory of the song
And dear remembrance of the singer, like
The melody that, lingering, entwines
Round golden harp-strings for the after-days
The singer's theme, the brotherhood of man;
The theme of song, the dear All-Father's love
Enwoven of the "Peace on earth," and faith
In Calvary, and Resurrection morn

The song is ended and the singer is
With God's redeemed. Our human will bows low
To the Divine. We bring in memory
Our love for him, told in sweet fragrant flowers
And golden emblem of life's harvest now.
We go our way, made better by this life
That is with God. May we, too, find the Cross;
May we take up the song that was more dear
To him than life itself; and may we win,
As did he, others to the Lord's redeemed.

Called Higher

Died in Bozeman, Mont., on Friday, May 27, 1904, Alonzo Reynolds, aged seventy-seven years and seven months.

Crossed the River of Death, June 5th, Mrs. Helen Pace, aged forty-seven years. She was a loving and devoted mother and a most kind and thoughtful neighbor. She lived a faithful Christian life every day.

Mrs. Esther Parks fell asleep in Christ, June 3, 1904. She had for a number of years been a reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Her Bible was her joy. She was a loving, gentle mother, and her children hope to live to meet her "at Home."

Mrs. M. I. Curtis, of Wheaton, Ill., died Oct. 27, 1903. She gave her heart to the Saviour in her childhood and was a faithful follower of his, and loved by all who knew her.

MY MOTHER SLEEPS

My mother sleeps; how sweet the rest
That now is hers, beyond the wave,
Beyond the storms that wildly rage
She sweetly sleeps, and she is blest.

Mrs. Melissa Phelps Dodge, born in Hartford, Conn., March 3, 1809. Her father's ancestors were among the first settlers of Connecticut. From an old English family in Staffordshire, embarked at Plymouth, 1630; settled first at Dorchester, Mass., then at Windsor. Her father removed to New York about 1813, and lived in Beekman Street, near old St. George's Church, where she was married to William E. Dodge, June 24, 1828, by Dr. Gardiner Spring, of the old Brick Church. She was the youngest member of this church when she united with it at the age of thirteen, and, at her death, she was the oldest member of the same church in its present locality. From early life she was interested in benevolent and charitable organizations and in all forms of Church work. She was connected with numerous religious and other organizations—the "City Tract" and "Bible" Societies, "House of Refuge," "Colored Home," Missionary Bodies, Indian Associations, and efforts for women and children, the Negro race, etc. She was a prudent and liberal giver, and untiring in seeking out worthy objects of charity. For more than fifty years she has lived at 225 Madison Avenue. Her husband died twenty years ago, and for some years she has been a partial invalid but retained her full mental powers. Every pleasant Sunday she eagerly attended her church, only two blocks distant. She exemplified old-fashioned piety, and lived a loving, lovable and useful life.

The roofs of mills, elevators, store buildings, factories, depots, roundhouses, hotels, churches and schoolhouses throughout the length and breadth of the land are being beautified, made whole and durable by ROOF LEAK. Has been adopted by the United States Marine Hospital Service, prominent railroads, and steel works. It gives equally good service on tin, iron, felt or shingles. When you buy it, you have the assurance that you are not only saving the price of a new roof, but that you are getting a roof that will last longer, look better, and be better than anything else you could get. It has been tried and stood the test.

There is but one ROOF LEAK, and is sold in our original kits, bearing our signature and trade mark, not sold in bulk. Anyone having a roof that he wants to get ten years more service from without the expense of a new roof, should write at once and get liquid samples and interesting book, showing various uses, all of which will be sent, absolutely free, on request. Write to-day and save the price of a new roof, or insure the prolonged life of roofs in good condition.

WELL SPOKEN

A Chat About Food.

"Speaking of food," says a Chicago woman, "I am 61 years of age and was an invalid more than 14 years."

"Was 5 years in the Presbyterian Hospital on diet most of the time. Had an operation for a dilated stomach, a very serious operation performed by a famous physician."

"After the operation of course, the doctors ordered Grape-Nuts as the most nourishing food, and easiest of digestion. That's how I know the stomach will digest Grape-Nuts, when it will absolutely refuse all other kinds of food. It has also done wonders for me to brighten up and strengthen my nerves and made me feel a desire to live, for I can enjoy life. What seems so strange to me is that I have never tired of this food since, but like it better all the time. I find it especially good in any kind of soup or broth."

"I have a sister who is an invalid from indigestion and she has been greatly benefited by Grape-Nuts which she eats three times a day and a bowl of milk and Grape-Nuts just before going to bed, in fact she lives on this food, and I also have two nieces who used to be troubled with indigestion but used Grape-Nuts with grand results, and so I could go on and name many others who have been helped in the same way." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Grape-Nuts food is used by hospitals and physicians very largely, for no food known is so easy and perfect for complete digestion while at the same time it is a concentrated form of nourishment of the highest grade and the stomach will handle it when everything else is refused.

A Visitor's Impressions of Mont-Lawn

Far Beyond the Power of Pen, she says, to Describe the Beauties of OUR CHILDREN'S HOME

THE pictures of the Children's Home in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD are good, but one cannot form an adequate conception of the buildings, the grounds, or the scenery from the pictures. Every feature of the Home was a delightful surprise. Fresh breezes from the Hudson made the place cool, and the view of the river is superb.

The clean, airy room or dormitory across the hall, with little pure white beds and large framed mottoes on walls, is certainly an ideal resting-place for tired little waifs from the hot, dusty streets and alleys of New York City.

From this large building we walked on the fine driveway to "Tibbal's Cottage," a fine new building, smaller in size, with inviting piazzas in front.

Opening from this, is a pretty little room for one of the teachers; but the principal attraction is the large, airy dormitory, with its twenty-nine beds, each one the perfection of snowy whiteness; the white iron bedsteads clad in pure white spreads.

One of the young lady helpers was just finishing her task, making the beds, at the same time teaching two little girls the art of putting on the pillow-slips. Beautiful large mottoes spoke from the walls, pleasing the eye, and cheering and inspiring the heart. A wee lad of four years, clad in blue overalls, was introduced to me as "Little Frank." He was asked to sing "Abide with Me," to which he responded in such a shy, sweet way. But the tune! I think it was of his own manufacture, and cannot be reproduced. But dinner hour is approaching, and we must go to the large tent, situated in the most charming spot, overlooking the Hudson.

This tent is not an ordinary one; it is very large, comfortably accommodating two hundred and twenty-five children. The floor is of boards joined and fitted; the sides or framework is of wood, not rope, and the thick canvas covering shelters from sun and rain. Imagine the many tables covered with pure white table oil-cloth and set with two hundred and twenty-five plates, mugs, etc. From this breezy dining-hall, open on all sides to the beauties of sky, trees, river, etc., we were ushered into an adjoining room, or kitchen, screened around with green lattice-work, and otherwise open to the heavenly breezes. While the various processes of dinner preparation were going on, loud "Hurrahs!" and other sounds of welcome were heard from many young throats. There is great commotion and joy among this army of children. What's the cause? Looking down the shady road, a carriage is seen ascending the long hill, and soon Dr.

Klopsch appears with his friends. There is no uncertain sound which greets his ear. Two hundred and twenty-five voices make the air ring with welcome, if not with music.

But the dinner! Fresh from the gardens appeared potatoes, juicy beets, string-beans, and with beef, bread and rice-pudding, there was no lack, but bountiful provision. As a crowning climax, Dr. Klopsch brought several bags full of chocolates, which were carefully divided and put at each plate.

The forming in line of boys and girls, the marching to the tables in military order and, when seated, singing an appropriate hymn, all was noted with delight.

Not the least enjoyable of the many privileges was the meeting with some of the teachers, the "housemother" or superintendent, and other workers. All are God's chosen ones, who have the best interests of the children at heart.

Scripture lessons are given daily in the Chapel. A new, larger Chapel is now being built. Seeds of truth are thus being sown in the tender hearts of hundreds of little ones, who it may be, for the first time in their lives, are hearing the Saviour's voice—"Suffer the little children to come unto me and forbid them not, for of such is the Kingdom of Heaven."

E. M. MASON.

CHARACTERS IN CONTRAST

By MRS. M. BAXTER

HAVING learned his lessons in the house of the widow of Zarephath, Elijah was fit for other and further tests and service. "Go, show thyself unto Ahab, and I will send rain upon the earth." And, without a word, Elijah went to meet the king who had set a price upon his head, and he went, to human sight, alone. On his way he met Obadiah, one of the king's courtiers, who was nevertheless a godly man, and was now on a mission from the king to search through one half of the land to find grass for the royal horses and cattle, while the king in person had undertaken the search in the other half of the land.

Obadiah fell on his face before Elijah. No doubt he had heard his words to Ahab, more than three years before (I. Kings 17:1), "Go and tell thy lord," said the prophet, "Behold, Elijah is here." And Obadiah was in terror, not for the safety of Elijah; that did not seem to occupy him, but for himself. "Wherein have I sinned that thou shouldst deliver me into the hand of Ahab to slay me?" Ahab has been seeking thee in every nation and kingdom, and made them swear that they found thee not; and now thou puttest the responsibility on me to know of thy whereabouts, and no sooner will my back be turned than "the Spirit of the Lord shall carry thee whither I know not," and Ahab will slay me. And, to recommend himself to Elijah, he told his story of how he had sheltered, hidden, and fed one hundred of the Lord's prophets in a cave. Elijah proved the truth of his profession, for he was without fear, while poor Obadiah, who was not in any real danger, was in terror of his life. What caused the difference? God was everything to Elijah. He had put his God to the proof, and he had let God put him to the proof; he had found God faithful, and he knew he ran no risk in obeying Him; and God had found Elijah faithful, and had confidence in him.

Obadiah's religion was of another order. He was undoubtedly a God-fearing man, but, nevertheless, was not prepared to give up his position in a heathen court; he wanted the world and God, too. Willing to be a benefactor to God's prophets, so long as he did not suffer for it; very philanthropic, but Ahab's courtier still; and evidently much trusted by him, as he had been chosen to share in the royal errand to seek grass, at that time more precious than gold. Oh, how many are there in this present time who are religious just far enough to hold their own as regards income, position, and reputation in the world! They have never gone so far as to deny themselves, take up their cross and follow Jesus, and yet he says, "Whosoever will come after me must do this, and without it no man can be my disciple." A real conversion to God does not consist only in believing, but repenting of and turning from sin, receiving pardon through believing, and yielding oneself unreservedly and for ever to the Lord. No conversion is thorough which has left a man master of himself in any way. "Ye are not your own, for ye are bought with a price; therefore glorify God in your body and your spirit, which are God's" (I. Cor. 5:19, 20).

Obadiah knew Elijah when he met him, but he was not in fellowship with the prophet. One might have thought that, coming from such a court, if he had had the honor of God at heart, Obadiah would have been grateful to have exchanged a few words with a man who lived so near to God. But, instead of that, only personal considerations absorbed him, and he yielded to an imagination of possible danger to himself, and was in no way ready to be at the service of God. With such a man, any good deed he has done plays a great role. Instead of listening to any words of God from such a man, he tells his story: "I, thy servant, fear the Lord, from my youth. Was it not told my lord what I did when Jezebel slew the prophets of the Lord, how I hid a hundred men of the Lord's prophets by fifty in a cave and fed them with bread and water?" "And now thou wilt risk the life of such a philanthropist." Oh, how little this man stood before God!

The Bible in Africa

THE teachers in Uganda (says a writer in the New York Sun), have had wonderful success. About 50,000 natives can read and write. Many may be recognized as "readers," by the little cloth or skin bags, in which they carry their precious books around with them. Only recently has the quantity of printed books been sufficient to supply the demand, but the opening of the railroad made it easier and cheaper to buy books. As long as they were carried from the coast on the heads of men, they were very expensive and in limited supply. A thousand cowries, which will buy five weeks' food for one man, were often given for a school reader or a copy of the New Testament. When a fresh supply arrived, the reed walls of the house in which they were stored, sometimes threatened to give way under the pressure of the crowds. At last there is an abundant supply of books at low prices.

The work of translating the entire Bible into Luganda was completed in 1897. In the first few editions, the book was ugly in appearance, three inches broad, and of the same thickness, and was called "the biscuit tin Bible"—for it was said that the Book was made to fit into one of the two-pound biscuit cans which were then plentiful in Uganda. The shape of the Book was, however, accidental and temporary, though the tins were largely used to protect it against white ants and other book-loving insects. The entire Bible was translated in six years, a fact considered remarkable.

SHIPPING EMPRESS SHIP'S PORTRAIT TO ST. LOUIS

The portrait of the Dowager Empress of China, painted by the American artist, Miss Carl, is now on its way to St. Louis, and it is here shown packed and in transit from Peking to Tongku. It was wrapped in a yellow satin covering bearing strange devices. A special line was constructed to carry it from the Palace to the station in Peking, as the Empress would not allow it to be carried by coolies. The soldiers on guard at the various stations through which the train passed went on their knees and covered their heads.

BUNCH TOGETHER

Coffee has a Curious way of Finally Attacking Some Organ.

Ails that come from coffee are cumulative, that is, unless the coffee is taken away new troubles are continually appearing and the old ones get worse.

"To begin with," says a Kansan, "I was a slave to coffee just as thousands of others to-day; thought I could not live without drinking strong coffee ever morning for breakfast and I had sic headaches that kept me in bed several days every month. Could hardly keep my food on my stomach but would vomit as long as I could throw anything up and when I could get hot coffee to stay on my stomach I thought I was better."

"Well, two years ago this Spring I was that sick with rheumatism I could not use my right arm to do anything, had heart trouble, was nervous. My nerve were all unstrung and my finger nail and tips were blue as if I had a chill at the time and my face and hands yellow as a pumpkin. My doctor said it was heart disease and rheumatism and my neighbors said I had Bright's Disease and was going to die."

"Well, I did not know what on earth was the matter and every morning would drag myself out of bed and go to breakfast, not to eat anything but to force down some more coffee. Then in a little while I would be so nervous, my head would beat like everything."

"Finally one morning I told my husband I believed coffee was the cause of this trouble and that I thought I would try Postum which I had seen advertised. He said 'All right' so we got Postum and although I did not like it at first I got right down to business and made it according to directions, then it was fine and the whole family got to using it and tell you it has worked wonders for me. Thanks to Postum in place of the poison coffee, I now enjoy good health, have not been in bed with sick headache for two years although I had it for 3 years before I began Postum and my nerves are now strong and I have no trouble from my heart or from the rheumatism."

"I consider Postum a necessary article of food on my table. My friends who come here and taste my Postum say it is delicious." Name given by Postum Co. Battle Creek, Mich.

The Cost of Obedience*

HOW glibly men are apt to speak of obedience and self-sacrifice! We admit it to be our duty to obey God in all things, to surrender our own will, to sacrifice our passions to our principles; but how bitter, how heartrending, sometimes is, to put our theories into practice! We desire so intensely, we long so ardently, that to yield to what we know to be our duty, seems worse than giving up life itself. Human nature is so weak on one side, so gigantically strong on the other, that there seems to be an irresistible compulsion to choose the easy path. There are few lives in which there come no such crises. Happy is he who can take to himself the promise given to him that vercometh.

The narratives of those ancient heroes, such as the one associated with the Topic, are set down for our encouragement. What a struggle he must have passed through! To be the victor in such a conflict entitles him to the name he bears, as the Father of the Faithful. Who that has stood by the bed of a sick child whose life has been trembling in the balance, has not tasted of that cup, before he was able to say, "Thy will be done?" Who that has seen the prize he has most coveted in life drifting from him, and has realized that one small sacrifice of principle would secure it, but has felt the agony which noble life involves? Who that has become aware that he ought to sever a friendship which has entwined itself about his heart, has not shrunk from the pain he must feel and the pain he must cause by obeying the voice of his conscience? Yes, it costs to obey, and it is intended to cost. If duty were always easy, where could be the glory of doing it?

Yet victory is always possible to the brave soul. God places within our reach power which we can use, if we will only avail ourselves of it. He who in that night in Gethsemane "sweat as it were great drops of blood," sees his poor weak blower when he is hard beset, and sympathizes with him, and the angels that ministered to Him will come to the victor and sustain him.

One of our great novelists tells the story of a great moral conflict of this order. The hero had placed in the hands of a friend the savings of his life, receiving as security a certain property, which was intrinsically worth more than the sum advanced. The time came when owing to the collapse of his business, it was necessary to realize on the security. Then he discovered that although he had not over-estimated its value, it was so situated in the grip of a great railroad corporation that it was practically worthless except as that corporation chose to deal with it. He realized that he was ruined. On the day of his discovery some English capitalists who knew nothing of the railroad complication, made him a liberal offer for the property, by which he would recover the whole sum he had advanced upon it. He had only to keep silence about the drawback, to regain his fortune. The offer was pressed upon him, but after a night of struggle he won the victory and told the whole story to the would-be purchasers.

A young man recently wrote this journal telling the story of a bitter struggle in his life. He had formed the acquaintance of a beautiful girl who was alone in the world. They grew to love one another passionately. He was never happy out of her society, and she clung to him with a tender affection. The time for their union was drawing near, when, in the course of conversation, the girl let fall a remark which showed that she was utterly hostile to religion. Some past experience had embittered her so violently that she would not enter a church or open a Bible. How it was that the young man had not discovered it earlier he did not explain, but so it was. To give her up was worse to him than death, but he knew that was his duty. He pleaded with her, argued with her, prayed for her, but to no purpose. Finally, he broke the engagement, at the cost of suffering which was like a martyrdom. Not even the girl knew how he had to fight for his victory, but he won, and the two saw one another no more. Those who overcome in such a struggle deserve a crown.

SERVICE

THREE blessed are they whose giving Outflowing like a song,
Enriches daily living
And makes it sweet and strong
Unwittingly, possession
Of inward growth is wrought,
For, lo! 'tis through expression
That gifts divine are caught.
'Tis thus the higher glory
Shines in our brain and heart,
Writes on the soul its story,
And blends with life its part.

AN AWAKENING IN WISCONSIN

A GREAT spiritual awakening has come to the beautiful city of Baraboo, Wis. For some months past, the pastors and prominent men and women in the churches at that time was ripe to make a tremendous effort for the salvation of souls. The churches and pastors in this movement are:

The Congregational Church, the Rev. Jesse Charles, pastor; the Presbyterian Church, the Rev. S. Muncke, S. T. D.; the First Methodist Church, the Rev. F. Ross; the South Side Methodist Church, the Rev. Mr. Jones; the Baptist Church, the Rev. Mr. Williams; the Advent Church, the Rev. Mr. Peterson; the German Methodist Church, the Rev. J. Meck; the German Evangelical Church, the Rev. Mr. Eiert. These churches organized various committees, and invited the Rev. M. Lyon, of Chicago, with his singer, Prof. L. Coultres, from the Bible Institute, Chicago, to lead the undertaking. A large tabernacle was constructed for the meetings. The outsiders wondered, and ridiculed. Many of the good people in the churches stood far off and said, "It can never be done; never can raise the money to meet these expenses." But the pastors and the committees were bound to go on, and they triumphed gloriously!

From the first, the tabernacle was crowded with anxious hearers. Hundreds did not miss a single service through the whole series. For the first ten nights the evangelist spoke on the Ten Commandments, and closed the series with a sermon on "The Wages of Sin is Death." Then he preached Gospel sermons, and invited the people to give up their sins and definitely surrender their lives to Christ. Mr. Lyon is an eloquent and an intensely earnest speaker.

A class of personal workers was organized, and every night they were laboring with men and women, persuading them to accept Jesus Christ as their Saviour. It was a stirring sight to see fifty people going up and down the large audiences and pleading with them. Many of these workers had never before spoken to any one about their soul's salvation. They now are ready to keep up this work, and the churches will be greatly blessed.

Prof. Coultres got together a large chorus, and in a short time had them well trained. During these meetings about five hundred people have confessed Christ, some of them being prominent business men. There is rejoicing in many homes because of loved ones having come back to God.

The last night of the meetings the great tabernacle was filled to overflowing, so that many people had to stand outside. The last Sunday afternoon service for men was especially memorable. Many men came to the front with tears and called on God for mercy.

From here the evangelists go to Chicago, where they are to conduct the summer tent campaign on the north side.

Questions & Answers

J. D. G., Gardiner, Me. Is it true that a lost coin was recovered through a medium, by means of a message from what seemed to be the spirit of Henry Ward Beecher?

No one knows, not even the man who recovered the coin and who relates the incident, whether the whole affair was not a gross piece of humbug, or a mere optical illusion. Dr. Funk tells the story in his book, The Widow's Mite.

J. P. Millbury, O. The Scriptures make faith the first step in the Christian life. Have men this faith by nature, or does God give it to some and not to others, or does he give it to all who seek it?

When a man hears the Gospel message it is open to him to believe or to disbelieve it. There is nothing mysterious about that, and we do not ask as to any other offers whether his belief comes by nature or by God's gift. If you heard that some philanthropist had offered to send any bright boy to college and pay his expenses there, you would not stay to inquire whether your faith in his offer came by nature or grace. If you wanted to go to college, you would go to the philanthropist and ask him to send you. The vital question would be, Do you want to go to college? And will you be prepared to study hard while there and fulfil the other conditions of the man who sends you? Do you want to become a Christian? Do you want to have your sins forgiven and lead a godly life? If you do, all you have to do is to go to God, pleading the name of Christ, and ask him to receive you. You show your faith by doing this, and it does not matter how you got it. The first question of all is whether or not you want the blessing; if you do, you can have it. God will keep his word.

Elmer, West Detroit, Mich. What is the Anti-Profanity League and how does it operate?

The League was organized a little over two years ago in Massachusetts and now is operating in forty States, two Territories, Canada, England, Scotland, Switzerland, and South Africa. Some of the most distinguished pastors, thousands of Christian workers, and a host of young peoples' societies are allied with it. It pledges members not to swear and to reprove swearing in others, and employs buttons, slips, cards, mottoes, etc.

M., Detroit, Mich. Who was Abgarus, and what were the circumstances of his correspondence with the Saviour?

According to ancient writings (by Moses of Chorene and others), Abgar Ucomos (or "the Black"), was the fifteenth king of Edessa, in Armenia, and reigned from A.D. 13 to A.D. 50. Having heard of Jesus, he wrote him a letter, entreating him to come to him, and heal him of his disease. Some of the writers believe him to have been a victim of leprosy, contracted in Persia. According to the legend, he received a letter in return, in which Christ announced that he would send one of his disciples to heal him. He afterward sent Thaddeus, through whom the promise was fulfilled.

Reader, Olathe, Kan. Does gunpowder ignite with the blaze proper of a match, or does it require a spark from the match or cap to cause the explosion?

It will ignite either with a blaze or a spark. It ignites when a portion of it begins to develop light and heat. Thus, a single grain of granulated powder is ignited by contact with fire (either spark or blaze), and its component gases are instantly liberated. This condition is communicated from grain to grain with the utmost rapidity, the successive ignitions seeming almost simultaneous.

W. B., Baltimore, Md. Was our Lord baptized as an example to his followers? Is there any statement in the Bible explaining his baptism?

The answer of Jesus to John (Matt. 3: 15) is the only clue we have to the meaning of the baptism. He did not deny the truth of John's objection, but said, "Suffer it to be so now, for thus it becometh us to fulfil all righteousness." It could not have been in his case a symbol of purification or cleansing of sin; but a desire to identify himself with the race, to be in all things as his brethren. It may have been, too, a public renunciation of sin on his part, a declaration that he intended to live a pure life. Though he was not a transgressor, he was thus "numbered with the transgressors," as Isaiah had predicted.

F. C. P., Greer, S. C. Will you kindly inform your readers what is the signification of the term, "Yankee," and give us the historical application?

"Yankee" is an American-Indian corruption of the word "English" into "Yenghees." In 1713, Jonathan Hastings, a farmer at Cambridge, N. Y., first used the word in the sense of genuine American-made, and the students adopted the phrase, which soon spread and became a popular expression in New England.

E. P., Poplar Ridge, N. Y. 1. What is the present condition of Babylon? 2. Is Dr. Edward Everett Hale, now chaplain of the United States Senate, a Unitarian?

1. Research has partly succeeded in identifying the site of Babylon about five miles above Hillah, on the opposite bank of the Euphrates, where there is a great mass of ancient ruins. Scattered over the country are a number of irregular mounds, the most striking being that known as Birs Nimroud, 2,000 feet high, which many regard as the tower of Babel. Another great mound is thought to have been the temple of Belus. There is, however, no positive or indisputable identification of any of these places. The best literature on the subject is by Layard, Loftus, Fergusson, and Rawlinson. 2. So we understand.

L. C. F., Clear Lake, So. Dak. Was Paul a member of the Sanhedrin? If so, was he a member at the time of the crucifixion of Christ?

This was answered in a recent issue. The only words that might indicate membership were: "And I gave my voice against them" (Acts 26: 10); but this cannot be regarded as conclusive. Paul's expressions concerning marriage have been taken as proof that he was not a member of the Sanhedrin, as all members were married men.

A. A. S., Wapella, Ill. When a man is so far gone in drink that his salvation is like rescuing a drowning man, is there hope even in such an advanced stage?

Yes; there is hope even for the drunkard. Where all human remedies have failed, God's was submitted to Mrs. Ross by General Washington, Robert Morris, and Col. George Ross. The design was thirteen stripes, alternate red and white, together with thirteen stars set in a field of blue, the same to be set in circular form. The official adoption of the flag took place August 8, 1776.

Mrs. M. S., Bethany, Ill. 1. How wide and deep will the Panama Canal be made? 2. Will other nations have to pay for the use of the same?

1. In the present condition of the plans it is impossible to tell. The French plans may be discarded and the Culebra cut abandoned. 2. Very likely toll will be exacted.

M. B. L., Oakville, Ont. Does a deed on the Lake front entitle the holder to land as far as the water mark? Can he prohibit any one from trespassing on the lake shore of his property?

This question is too general. Let inquiry state specific facts—name of lake, whether it is navigable, and the language of the deed.

L. A. T., Westminster, S. C. Did Judas eat the Lord's Supper with the eleven disciples?

Until comparatively recent times, the belief was prevalent that he did. Modern critics, however, think that he did not. They say that the ceremony, which Jesus adapted as a memorial for the Lord's Supper, came in the regular order of the Passover at the close of the ceremony of the sop to which John refers (John 13: 26, 27), came earlier. John says that after receiving the sop Judas went out. If the regular order of the Passover was observed, therefore, Judas was away when the part of the ceremonies was reached, when the bread and wine were distributed, and the Lord's Supper was instituted. Nothing absolutely certain can be stated, however, on this subject.

Enquirer, Langston, N. Dak. 1. Would a will be legal if drawn up by the party making it without the aid of a lawyer? 2. If a person died without leaving a will, what would become of the property if there were no children to claim it? 3. If a couple should marry, and one of them under a false name would the marriage be legal?

1. Yes, if properly executed according to law, and if the provisions of the will were legal. 2. Ask a lawyer in the State where the party dying is domiciled. The States differ. 3. Yes; a wrong name would not invalidate the marriage. G. H. C.

Mrs. Annie H., West Brook, Mass. When an American, a native of the United States, marries a Chinese or Japanese woman, does the wife, through this marriage, become a citizen of the United States?

Chinese and Japanese are not white persons, within the meaning of the naturalization laws of the United States, therefore, women of those races are not capable of being naturalized. The citizenship of legitimate children born abroad, follows that of the father.

The Story of Mrs. Bakhmiteff, an American Girl, who became the "Good Angel" of the Poor and the Distressed of Bulgaria

By EVANKA S. AKRABOVA, Philippopolis, Bulgaria

A NAME which will be engraved in golden letters upon the pages of Bulgarian history, and which will always be an inspiration in the Bulgarian heart toward truer, higher aims of life, is the name of one of America's daughters, Mrs. Mary Bakhmiteff, wife of Mr. G. Bakhmiteff, the present Russian Diplomatic Agent at Sofia, Bulgaria. Mrs. Bakhmiteff's father, Gen. Edward Fitzgerald Beale, attained distinction in the Mexican war. Her mother, who survived her husband, died in the spring of 1902, while Mrs. John R. McLean, Mrs. Bakhmiteff's sister, is one of the eminent residents of Washington, D. C. During Mr. Grant's presidency, General Beale was appointed United States Minister to Vienna, and there Miss Beale met Mr. Bakhmiteff. Since their marriage, her husband has served his government as military attaché at the Russian Embassy in London; later, as Second Secretary of the Embassy in Athens, Greece; chargé d'affaires in Lisbon, Portugal, and to-day as Diplomatic Agent at the court of Bulgaria. Born in one of America's beautiful homes, and brought up in Washington society, Mrs. Bakhmiteff possesses qualities of mind and heart which have enabled her to exercise great influence in high social circles of Europe. The few years of her life in Bulgaria have their eloquent story to tell. As soon as she entered the country, this American lady showed unmistakably her interest in the life and character of the people, and made them feel in every way possible that she did not intend to remain a stranger among them. She opened her elegant home to the prince, the statesmen, and the women prominent in society, and included them all in her generous hospitality. Prince Ferdinand well appreciates Mrs. Bakhmiteff, and respects her judgment on important questions. Rarely is a banquet given at the palace where she and her husband are not among his guests of honor.

Although much beloved and admired by those in higher walks of life, she finds the greatest delight in relieving the needy, rescuing those that are ready to perish, and in comforting and uplifting the oppressed and downtrodden. The Bulgarian people quickly recognized Mrs. Bakhmiteff's magnanimity of soul. As she was visiting the Alexander Hospital in Sofia, one day, by invitation, she was shocked at the condition of some of its wards. Inquiry revealed that this was due mainly to insufficient funds. Laying the matter to heart, she turned to Russia for help in securing competent nurses from the Red Cross. Seven nurses were speedily sent by the Dowager Empress and the Czarina; five of these entered the hospital wards, and the remaining two served as instructors of young Bulgarian women, who took the course in nursing. More than thirty graduates are already blessing the hospitals and homes of the land with their services, while more have recently been sent to the Far East, with two surgeons and all the equipments for a camp-hospital, to the relief of the Russian wounded.

Mrs. Bakhmiteff's visit to the Alexander Hospital not only revealed the need of better care of the patients, but also the fact that there was no children's ward, no special beds nor clothes for the little sufferers. To supply this lamentable lack, she promptly suggested a ladies' sewing society, to meet the needs of the neglected children, at least as far as their clothes were concerned. The ladies willingly met her suggestion. They quickly organized themselves as a society for hospital aid, with forty members, wives of the most prominent men of Sofia. Their second meeting was held at the residence of the first lady-in-waiting at the court, Mrs. Petroff Chomakoff, and the third, at the Russian Consulate. By a unanimous vote, Mrs. Bakhmiteff was elected president, a position she still holds.

Prince Ferdinand, on learning of the newly organized society, which had taken the name of his first-born daughter, Her Royal Highness Princess Evdokia, at once sent one thousand francs to its treasury. Fifteen suitable food, Mrs. Bakhmiteff proposed to the society to open a day nursery in that section, and thus help to give a good start in life to as many children as possible. The society gladly acted upon this suggestion also, and the first day nursery in Bulgaria was opened last year, providing accommodations in the beginning for fifteen children from six months to three years of age. No charge is made for any child. The membership of this philanthropic society of Bulgarian women now numbers 135, and its yearly income is six thousand francs. In token of his appreciation of the services which Mrs. Bakhmiteff has rendered to his nation, Prince Ferdinand has decorated her with a beautiful cross.

When, two years and a half ago, Miss Stone, the well-known American missionary, was captured by brigands in Macedonia, who held her for ransom, it was Mrs. Bakhmiteff, who, under God, finally became one of the indispensable factors in her rescue. When Miss Stone was given up for lost, because all endeavors to find her put forth from the time her capture had become known, had up to this time, utterly failed, it was this able-minded, tender-hearted American woman, mistress of the imposing establishment of Russian diplomacy at Sofia, whose heart became strangely moved on behalf of the captive. She had never heard of Miss Stone until that time, and as she read in the daily papers of the kidnapping, her heart began to burn within her to help to save her suffering countrywoman. She chanced to meet an acquaintance of the captive, who interested her still more by the terms in which she spoke of her, and at the same time mentioned the fact that the court stationer at Sofia, Mrs. B. J. Kasuroff, a woman of fine character and great influence, was a former pupil of Miss Stone, and also a dear friend of hers. Mrs. Bakhmiteff lost no time in making an errand to the court stationer, to obtain the information for which she was now eager. Finding Mrs. Kasuroff, she plunged into the subject which lay so close to her heart, and was soon revealing to her the absorbing desire of her soul. "I am almost insane," she exclaimed; "I cannot eat, sleep, or think of anything else but of that unfortunate!" meaning Miss Stone.

Mrs. Kasuroff, who had neglected her home, business, social duties, everything, in her anxiety to do something to save her lost teacher and friend, received the diplomat's wife as one divinely sent to her. No pleasanter task could have been asked of her than to give information of the one she almost revered. Hope sprang up in her soul that, somehow, this American woman of rare ability, might become the means of rescuing the beloved sufferer. She, therefore, eagerly acquainted her questioner with all the facts about Miss Stone's life and work.

Mrs. Bakhmiteff had felt great pity for Miss Stone, but now admiration for her was awakened. She visited Mrs. Kasuroff daily, often several times a day, to talk the matter over, and to try and contrive some means to reach the captive to find out whether she was alive or dead. "If only she is alive, she will be saved!" said she to her Bulgarian friend, showing how determined she had now become to rescue her. As for Mrs.

MRS. MARY BAKHMITTEFF

small bedsteads were quickly ordered from Vienna, and the first ward for children was opened in the hospital. Now there are five wards, with sixty children's beds, all daintily furnished, and clothing for as many little patients. Only the poorest children are admitted. The government doctors and nurses attend them, thus relieving the society from all expense for these services. The ladies find great pleasure in visiting the children, and their president allows no day to pass when she is in Sofia, without blessing the small patients with the sight of her loving face and the sound of her voice.

When she learned that the largest number of sick children came from the poorest quarter of the city, where they lived in unwholesome dwellings and had no

DIVINE ENTHUSIASM

A Sermon by Rev. Charles M. Sheldon, Topeka, Kansas*

REV. CHAS. M. SHELDON

A RECENT article in a New York magazine, written on the New Evangelism, takes the ground that the Church of the present time has been a practical failure in preaching the Gospel demanded by the particular age in which we live. Comments on this article by men like Dr. Russell H. Conwell of Philadelphia, and Dr. William S. Rainsford of New York, practically acknowledge the truth of the statements made in the article. I do not believe myself that the facts in the case would prove the Church of this generation to be open to such sweeping indictment as the writer declares. But the impression prevails among average men, especially in the manual world, that the Church is composed of men and women who are not in sympathy with the great struggle of humanity, and this impression, even though it may be to a large degree not founded on the facts, is something which cannot be changed until the Church of Christ has made it absolutely plain to the world that it is here in this world on purpose to bring Christ into every part of men's lives. In other words, the passion of the Christian to save the world must be more apparent in more directions than it is now before the men of the world will be convinced or converted. I want to talk to-day about the need of Christian enthusiasm in establishing the kingdom of God on the earth.

The greatest thing in the world is the soul of a man. It is worth more than all the gold and silver. It is of more value than all the riches, machinery, agriculture, crops, industries, armies, navies, palaces or inventions of men. The man himself is greater than anything he ever makes, of more value than the things he discovers. The crowning act of God was the creation of a man in his own image. "What shall it profit a man to gain the whole world, and forfeit his soul?" The Christian has no other ground on which to stand to do his work except this, and he cannot do the work of a Christian in the world unless he has a tremendous conviction that life is the most valuable of all things in creation.

The Church Indicted

Where is the passion of the Church of Christ to save men? Where does the world see this passion illustrated? According to Charles Booth, who has written a most intensely interesting book about London, the Churches of that great metropolis have not even held their own in the necessary conflict with sin in that boiling centre of humanity. They have, according to his careful estimate, gone backward. He suggests no remedy of any kind in his book for anything. It is simply what he calls a statement of facts. If what he says is true, both the Established Churches of England and the Free Churches are under indictment in both pulpit and pew, for not putting the Gospel of Christ into the lives of the unchurched masses of London. If the souls of men are of more value than countless wealth, has not God a right to expect that those who have been made in his image, and who profess to call themselves by the name of his dear Son, shall exhibit in some way to the world an illustration of their belief. And it is no more than fair that we should ask ourselves as a Church, at what point are we displaying to the world our professed belief in the value of humanity?

I think it is safe to say that every disciple of Christ who has really caught some true vision of the Master, has felt his heart burn within him over the great problem of life, and the inevitable question has arisen: "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" It is unthinkable that so great a tragedy as that of the Son of God should be enacted on the face of the earth, and not leave its lasting impress on the hearts of men who have anything Godlike in them. And it is appropriate at the present age of the world, and at the present time of the age, that the Church, as a whole, should draw close enough to the Master to ask: "What is amiss with us that the kingdom of God does not grow with more manifestation of power?"

One of the answers to this question may possibly be found in the great need of a larger measure of responsibility on the part of God's children. The carelessness with which otherwise good people discharge their religious obligations, is one of the heart-breaking things in the history of a life which otherwise would be crowned with majestic glory. Members of churches take solemn vows when they unite with that body to support its work, to be faithful to its service of prayer, to engage in some specific task, to do their part in the great whole; and then with what seems like unforgivable carelessness, to all outward appearances, neglect the opportunity to grow in the grace of the Lord. Duties which were plainly visible to the member when he joined the Church, gradually fade away and vanish out of sight. The world, with increasing clamor, demands insistently more and more time. The commonest excuse Church members make for not being faithful to their duties, is the worst excuse of all: "I have not time."

An overburdened minister in a manufacturing town went in succession to six different leading members of his Church and asked for a simple service in the mission work which he was carrying on, and each man in turn declined the opportunity for service, on the ground that he could not give the time to study the Sunday School lesson on account of pressing business engagements. It is an astonishing thing that some of the busiest men of our Churches have been found to be among the most earnest Sunday School teachers, mission workers and city missionaries, while other business men who belong to Churches never for one moment think they can give any time to such work. The fact is, the soul that is not fired with the thought of the needs of dying humanity, and the needs of living humanity as well, can always find excuses enough to shirk the most necessary work of the world. I believe one reason why the Church is continually shorn of its power and registers partial failures in the place of overwhelming successes, is because it is not realized yet to the fullest extent what it means to promise to love God and keep his commandments. The prayer-meetings of our Churches ought to number every week at least half the Church membership.

Amusements Preferred

Somehow or other the members of the Churches manage to go to things where they are interested, no matter what the weather, no matter how tired with business, no matter what the occasion or the hindrances. Let us be frank about this, and say without hesitation that the reason the prayer service of the Churches all over the world are not attended by half the Church membership, is because their hearts have never been fired with the divine enthusiasm. "For where the treasure is, there will the heart be also," and where the heart's love goes out, there will the bodily presence be found. I do not wonder myself often at the scarcity of young men entering the ministry, when I remember that in the best Churches that we possess to-day there is in many ways a heart-breaking failure to respond to the spiritual appeal, and a total lack in many cases of any feeling of responsibility for Christian duty.

The statement was made a little while ago that a group of young people had promised definitely to do a certain clearly defined Christian service to one of the heads of departments in our own Church, and when the day came no one appeared, and there was no excuse sent, no reason given for non-appearance—the whole matter evidently entirely forgotten and carelessly relegated to the rear. The person to whom this promise was made could not understand the absolute lack of responsibility shown, and no wonder. Talking with a business man on the street the other day, he said one of the most vexing things that touched him in his business life was the failure on the part of men to keep their promises, a total lack of appreciation of one's word. I heard one man say to another on the avenue, "You can have the money without any note. I'll trust your word for it, just as much as if you had signed it on a piece of paper." The other man said, "I appreciate that, but of course I want you to take the note, in case of my death or sudden accident or anything unexpected," and insisted upon it as a business transaction. Nevertheless, he said, speaking of it afterwards, "I have never had that said to me by any one before, and appreciate to the full what it meant, coming from the man who made the statement." The fact is this man had never disappointed anyone in a verbal promise and was absolutely trusted. Yet, is it not true we who profess the highest calling of all as children of God break our promises to him unblushingly and fail to keep trust at the sacred meeting place, where God promises more than anywhere else to bless his children?

The Church's Protest

If the Church is really under indictment to-day for failure to win the battles of the Lord and establish the kingdom in the earth after these two thousand years of Christ, the failure is one which ought to occasion great searching of the heart and sane answers to the questions which must necessarily arise around so great a possibility. And we are reluctantly compelled to say that there is not only a lack of responsibility on the part of Christian disciples, but also in many cases a failure to comprehend the scope of the kingdom of God and its far-reaching authority. The writer of the article I mentioned which brings this charge against the Church in general, claims that the Church of the present time has no message to the prevailing sin of the age; that it sometimes grows indignant over child labor, that it becomes aroused on the question of Sabbath observance or temperance or gambling, but that it has little to say along the line of the Gospel to the rich sinner, or to the transgressions of corporate life. The indictment is too sweeping. There is no voice being raised anywhere in the world to-day against these prevalent sins of the age to compare with that which arises everywhere out of the Church. Where else is there any prophet voice to be heard by way of warning: the sins of the great Babylon of the metropolis? I at its best, the voice is not loud enough nor inspiring enough, to make the impression it should.

Religion in Business

It seems as plain as noonday that the Christian man in business should apply the same principles to money getting as he does to his home making or religious life at any point. Yet it is an unmistakable fact that men in the Church to-day, very many of them have apparently determined on a set of rules for their conduct in public life which would not for one moment bear the test applied to the life of the home or religious life. In some ways the curse of a dual activity blights the true life of the Church in the world more than anything else. Not only a lack of responsibility, but a lack of consistency mars the perfect progress in the development of the Church.

I think nothing is more obnoxious to the sight of God, than a professed Christian who prays, and preaches, and acts the pious life on Sunday, and then breaks the Golden Rule, the Decalogue, the Sermon on the Mount, every other day in the week. If there is any stumbling-block which has kept men and women out of touch with the divine life, in all the ages, it has been the stumbling-block of inconsistent, unspiritual, worldly minded Church members. Enthusiasm, divine enthusiasm for serving God, can only spring out of a soil which is watered constantly with spiritual showers from heaven.

The real source of a live coal is a burning fire somewhere, and the seraphim can never get any live coal bear to any life, except from the altar of God. All culture of creation is of no value whatever to inspire man to do the will of God; all the power of the world is powerless to drive any engine of service; all the wealth of the universe is poverty to put any lever under the burden of sin, unless the whole thing is aglow with fire which comes down from above. The source of the Christian's enthusiasm is to be found in the divine nature. The earth on which we live has fire within it, deep down, and the manifestations of that heat which is intense, is generally of a destructive character. It breaks out through the volcano, it deviates through the earthquake, it pours its boiling springs and its muddy upheavals from the rumbling darkness to waste the fair fields and kill the landscape. There is heat enough in the way of passion, deep down in the life of a man, but it is the fire of destruction rises to overwhelm, it glows to burn up.

Over the earth is the benignant sun which touches with its light for the purpose of healing and growth. Its beams find their way into the damp, dark places, and beauty and food for the earth, and joy for men, the result. Like the sun above us is the fire of God. All the best things we know anything about come from above, not from beneath. The fires of individual passion in the soul; the destructive forces which dominate so much of life can never heal nor help. But the light and life of God's spirit which is above us, is the only real source of lasting strength. The Church of Christ will never rise to do its God-given work, until it has spiritual life drawn from the sources above and beyond its own human weakness. We may expend mountains of strength in building up systems or encouraging methods, or systematizing details, in elaborating ceremonies, in formulating exact plans of work; but if fire from off the altar is absent, the whole thing will be a weariness of the flesh.

I think what our church members need more than anything else, is to get close to God, to know him through personal knowledge, to love him with passionate eagerness so that it is meat and drink to do his will. To live our lives at such high speed, with all the demands of business and social calls, and everything else, that we do not take time, or think we cannot take time, to nourish our spiritual existence. It is very much as if a man should spend the largest part of his strength and skill in laying out beautiful walks for his garden, and then let the things he had planted, flowers, vegetable food, be choked with weeds. The main thing about life is not beautifully bordered walks, but the things that grow for beauty or power. There are lives of Christians in our Churches that are so cumbered with social engagements, so choked with numerous earthly cares, so loaded down with engagements which are purely conventional, that there is no time left to the poor, burdened soul to practice what has been called the presence of God. There are members of Churches who belong to so many organizations that they have no time to give what belongs to the right work and worship of the Church.

It was said of Joshua that he left nothing undone all that the Lord commanded. If our Church membership did as well as he, there would be a rising of entire

*Text Isaiah 6: 6, 7, 8: "Then flew one of the seraphim to me, having a live coal in his hand. . . and he laid it upon my mouth, and said, 'Lo, this hath touched thy lips; and thine iniquity is taken away, and thy sin purged. And I heard the voice of the Lord, saying, Whom shall I send, and who will go for us?' Then said I, 'Here am I; send me.'" astic service which would instantly make itself felt on the sin of the world. The Church is certainly suffering today from the fact that its members, many of them, are more interested in a score of things which have nothing to do with their spiritual uplift. I would like to ask the members of this Church how much time they spend in communion with God every day. You say you are busy, and you are, and the Lord wants you to be. You are busy with your business; you are busy with your household work; you are busy training up the children in your family circle; you are busy getting an education; you are busy with books, with literary societies, with social duties. God does not quarrel with these things in themselves. He does not ask us to add to the Bible all the time. There is a wonderful variety to life, and God wants his children to enjoy it. He does not say, "You must not belong to this club; you must not join that society; you must not read so many books; you must not have so many duties." He says to his children, "Enjoy the beautiful, wonderful, interesting things of the world. They are all mine. They are like the pictures that hang on the walls of the house, each one different, each one having its own beauty and value. Enjoy them all." But God does say to his children, "You have no right to take these things and let them so fill your life that you have no time left to think of me, and worship me, and love me." The busiest of men take time every day to read the daily papers. This world would be a far better world if everybody in it took half the time they spend reading their daily paper to read their Bibles, and even a good part of the time took the other half to pray, commune with God, and learn of him. I wish to emphasize this fact, that the Church as a whole can never expect to make any great conquest, or leave any impression worth talking about on the world of sin, until its members are acquainted with God, until they know something of him from personal knowledge, gained in ways which are clearly pointed out by him. The fire from the altar of God will be brought to us by the seraphim when we have reached the point where we are ready to do what the Lord wants us to do. The consecration of one's whole being to the service of God is a mark of discipleship. If there is any part of a life that is held back and reserved for any purely selfish purpose, that means a life that is not wholly given to God's service. That is not what God requires of a human being. He wants all of the life. The command is, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, mind, soul, and strength." God is a jealous God, and is not content that a child of his should give him anything less than the whole. What would you think of one of your own children who obeyed you half the time, or obeyed a certain kind of command and disobeyed other commands, or of a child who was obedient one day and disobeyed the next—kind, and loving, and thoughtful, and gentle, and good on Sunday, and hateful and cross and cruel and disobedient on Monday? All earthly parents who are good parents in any sense want the undivided affection of their children. How can we think God has any other thought of his children? The church of Christ needs to be baptized with the fire of consecration. This means in very great measure volunteer service, the thing which is sadly lacking in very much of the organized work of the kingdom.

Where is the Christian discipleship in our Churches which springs for the hard things, which bears the cross without complaint, which rejoices to be counted a sufferer with Christ. The late William E. Dodge, of New York, used to tell about his father, David Dodge, in conversation with a devout Quaker, who, like Dodge, was intensely eager to see the triumph of the kingdom of God. They were talking about the apathy of the Church people, the strange dullness and sluggishness of Church members as to the salvation of souls and the non-progress in general of the kingdom of God. They both agreed, it is said, in the need of vastly more zeal and enthusiasm, and more prayer and consecration, and finally the Quaker broke in with, "Friend Dodge, suppose thee and I make a beginning." That is the only way it will be done, by disciples in the Churches, without waiting for the millennium, or for any mysterious or miraculous moving of the Spirit, begin to consecrate themselves to a higher service, and be ready to say with him who saw the seraphim take the live coal, "Here am I; send me."

What is consecration but the offering of one's self to whatever God may choose to have done. The children of God have always been a peculiar people. That is, they have been his own people. They have not been like the men of the world. "Come ye out from among them and be ye separate," said the Lord. It is the glory of the Christian that he is not like other men. If he is a real disciple, he is willing to suffer, to endure, to serve, to meet with loss, to spend much time in the presence chamber of the Divine, in order that the greatest thing in the world may come to pass, and that is the redemption of mankind through the work of the Church.

The world is not the same place now, and never can be the same place again as it was before Christ came into it. The entrance of that life changed the thought, the purposes, and the standard of humanity. A man who knows anything about the Son of God, or who believes in him in any real sense, cannot live on a lower plane than the highest, without being conscious of a certain rejection of the Holy Visitor who has knocked at the door and begged to enter. The Church, as time passes on, cannot be satisfied with externals. It cannot be at ease with the outward forms of worship or with social customs which have outworn their usefulness. There is throughout Christendom the permeating presence of the Spirit of God surely and insistently felt. There have always been in all the ages some who have kept alive this fire from the altar, some whose lips have been touched by these living coals. It is impossible to quench this divine passion since once it had a place in human thought.

I would not have you bear away from this service the impression that I am hopeless concerning the ultimate power of the Church in the world. With all its failures and its faults, with all its hesitation to enter upon the highest and holiest way, it yet contains the leaven of the truth, that thing which shall not perish from the sons of men. It is only with loving sorrow that those who love the Church for which Christ gave himself, note within her any lack of cheerful zeal. When the vision of life is dim, when the highest ambitions are blunted and thwarted by untold selfishness, when the faith which has made our lives know the best and highest things that we ever know is almost dead, even then there is no reason for despair if we remember the presence of the living Christ who certainly will not desert the Church for which he gave himself. But let us make his heart glad by doing all we can to make of this Church what he wanted it to be, something without spot or blemish or any such thing.

Let us see to it that we are of those to whom the seraphim with the live coal shall fly, and let us be of those who are eager to say: "Here am I; send me." The enthusiasm which is not afraid nor ashamed, the enthusiasm which is equipped, which knows how to do things, and is eager to do them, which exalts into the most honorable place the Lord Jesus Christ as King of all the earth, which recognizes no power or authority greater than his, which places him on the throne of the universe and puts within his hand the sceptre of the ages. This is our ideal, and this by the grace of God, shall be our purpose for the days that yet remain to us, in order that his kingdom may come, his will be done in earth as it is in heaven. It was the live coal from off the altar that stirred the prophet, and if our souls are in the attitude of worshipful service, he who can give to any heart the necessary measure of divine light and heat, will give us all we need, that we may give to the world and lift it up to Him who wants to redeem it, and can do so, if we will do what we can do, even as He did what He could do.

Kasuroff, the Russian Consul, was opened to her at hours in those days of extremity, and together the two loving women worked to save the third, who was the grip of the brigands.

During those terribly anxious days, Mr. Mason, the American Consul at Berlin, accompanied by a newspaper correspondent from the United States, visited Mr. and Mrs. Bakhmteff. A bright thought flashed across the mind of the quick-witted wife of the Russian diplomat, and she went with it straight to Mrs. Kasuroff. "I am planning," she said, "to give a dinner-party in honor of Mr. Mason, to which I shall invite all the Consuls in Sofia, and learn their opinion on Miss Stone's case." Queen Esther of old gave a banquet to save her nation; why should not Mrs. Bakhmteff give one to save her countrywoman? While the guests were enjoying her feast, the hostess introduced the subject of the captivity, which was then baffling the combined efforts of the United States, Turkey, Bulgaria, and Russia. From the discussion which followed, Mrs. Bakhmteff concluded that a letter must be written by someone whose handwriting Miss Stone would recognize, but that no name should be signed; then that a sum of money should be paid to someone who would undertake the hazardous undertaking of going to hunt in the mountains of Macedonia in the hope of finding some traces of the bandits who held the captives, and to learn the unfortunate women were still alive. Mrs. Bakhmteff had decided to send the body-guard of the Consulate out into the city for this purpose.

Early next morning, the American correspondent went to Mrs. Kasuroff, and presented the request from Mrs. Bakhmteff that she should write a letter to Miss Stone. "Write a letter to Miss Stone!" exclaimed Mrs. Kasuroff, completely bewildered, "How can I write? I do not know whether she is dead or alive!" "Oh yes, you can write one," said the correspondent, assuringly. "Just write as you would if you knew she were alive."

Mrs. Kasuroff wrote as her heart dictated, hardly daring to hope that it would ever reach her captive friend. She took the letter to the Consulate, where it is read and approved by Mr. and Mrs. Bakhmteff. They were agitating the perplexing question how to find a man who would dare to take the letter, a circumstance recurred to Mrs. Kasuroff's mind which at least suggested a solution. One day a rough-appearing fellow seemingly put himself in the way of one of her ends, and had boasted in loud tones that if money enough were given to him to make it an object, he would undertake to find the brigands who held the captives! No one knew anything of the man, whether he could be trusted or not; but it was decided to risk it. When the man was spoken to, and consented to go if two hundred francs were paid to him, Mr. Bakhmteff threw down three hundred francs, saying, "Let the man go, and go this very night."

Meantime, Mrs. Kasuroff wrote to her friend:

Particulars I cannot write you now, but it is sufficient to assure you that I have done all that I possibly could, and have felt all the time that not I was acting, but another power has moved me from within. I am only looking how God hath put it into the hearts of others who have never known Miss Stone to work perhaps the hardest of all for her to be saved. Mr. and Mrs. Bakhmteff are trying as much as their own brothers would try if they were here. I feel that if Miss Stone is alive she will be saved.

A little later, when new difficulties appeared, Mrs. Kasuroff wrote to the same friend:

A few nights ago I could not sleep, and got up and wrote a long letter to Mrs. Bakhmteff. She has sent it to her mother in Washington, with the request that without delay it be given to Mrs. Roosevelt, wife of the President.

After a waiting, which seemed interminable, the strange messenger returned, bearing a written word in Miss Stone's own handwriting! Both she and her companion in captivity, Mrs. Tsilka, were alive and well! The joy Mrs. Bakhmteff and Mrs. Kasuroff experienced at the success of their attempt was too great to be expressed in words. This was early in November, two months after the capture. Negotiations were commenced with the brigands, the ransom was finally paid, and the captives freed.

Mrs. Bakhmteff passed on to other deeds of mercy. Terrible troubles befell the poor Christians in European Turkey, when, in the autumn of 1902, unable longer to endure Moslem misrule, they rose against the Turkish Government and fought for their rights to live as men. Instead of following the armed insurgents to the mountains, the Turkish troops and bashi-bazouks fell upon the helpless women, children and aged people in the villages, burned up their homes after pillaging them, dishonored women and girls, and massacred thousands. Those that could escape crossed the mountains and found safety in Bulgaria. Destitute, cold and in need of all things, they found sympathy in this warm-hearted American woman. She was the first to go to their relief at Rilo Monastery, Dubnitsa, and other points on the Turko-Bulgarian frontier. For this purpose she left her home in midwinter, and, accompanied by a government official and a corps of nurses, undertook a journey of one hundred and eighty miles by carriage, to visit the sufferers, and personally to give them, from Russian bounty, food, warmth and clothing. She heard their sad tales, understood their miseries, and with their tears her own were often mingled. The most awful things for Mrs. Bakhmteff were the descriptions of the outrages upon women and girls, committed by Turkish soldiers, and the pitiable condition of many of the victims. For these she established, from her own purse, a refuge in Dubnitsa, provided with all needful facilities, and left nurses in charge. Only a few months ago, she gave twenty-five thousand francs more from her private purse to the refugees.

Her recompense of reward is: She is not only followed by the fervent prayers and blessings of all whom she has succored, including the ransomed captives, but has gained the hearts of a people on both sides of the Rhodope Mountains.

The Great Summer School at Chautauqua

"SEVEN THOUSAND SEATED IN AN AUDITORIUM THROUGH WHICH THE SPARROWS FLY TO AND FRO, DURING THE MEETING"

BETWEEN the opening day of the Chautauqua N. Y., Assembly, June 30, and the day of its closing, Aug. 28, the programme offers a continual intellectual, artistic and spiritual feast. Concerts daily, except Sundays; organ recitals, artists' recitals, and a Sacred Song Service every Sunday evening, are among the features announced. Lectures are being delivered on sociological and historical subjects, by men eminent along these lines. The literary world is represented by such students and professors as Judge D. P. Baldwin, Prof. Richard G. Moulton, Mr. Edward Howard Griggs and others. Pedagogical and scientific subjects are treated by Dr. Richard G. Boone and a number of equally well-known teachers. Religious topics will be treated by such eminent orthodox leaders as Bishop J. H. Vincent, Bishop Dr. J. M. Thoburn, Dr. Frederick J. Stanley, Bishop W. F. Oldham and Rev. J. Wilbur Chapman. There will be an American Week, a Civic Week, a week devoted to the School, one to Missions, one to the Bible in Modern Life and a Recognition Week.

From the announcements of Chautauqua assemblies held this season, in all parts of the States, it may be seen that many of these centres of influence are proving their permanent value. The proportion of assemblies which have not inaugurated Summer School departments is very small, and the growth of Summer School facilities is one of the striking phases of assembly improvement. The tendency in programme-making is marked by the increase of special weeks or days, devoted to different topics and interests.

A noted lecturer, in speaking of the meetings in the great Chautauqua Auditorium, says: "To address an audience there, is an experience one is not likely to forget. There is a seating capacity of about 7,000, and it requires lungs as strong as an organ bellows to make yourself heard in this wide, open edifice, unclosed on three sides, under whose roof the sparrows fly to and fro during the lecture, and where the audience, if the speaker fails to please, can softly arise, straggle toward the outer benches, and then silently vanish into the woods. But when the speaker succeeds in holding the attention of this vast assemblage, the inaudible but yet perceptible response, which like a rebound wave rushes toward him, fills him with a sensation which fairly lifts him off his feet. There is an intense delight in the power to move, arouse and quicken other human minds, which arises from something more than pride or gratified vanity. A Chautauqua assembly audience is a sensitive one, and very discriminating, unless one possesses the faculty of pouring forth a very soul in fluent and easily comprehended speech. A good proportion of his audience will have vanished before he has finished. If there is vital breadth and power in the speaker's words, and his personality is sympathetic, he soon touches a responsive chord. But if he fails to impress his audience, their cold faces will be like a gray stone-wall before him."

A goodly proportion of people who attend Chautauqua assemblies are middle-aged men and women who have left their business and homes to gather something more than mere amusement; they want something which is a moral and intellectual uplift; something to serve for thought and discussion during the year.

TO WORK TOGETHER TO WIN SOULS

FROM time to time articles have appeared in these pages describing the remarkable evangelistic work in England of Rev. Dr. R. A. Torrey and Mr. Alexander. This month Dr. Torrey is resting in Switzerland, while Mr. Alexander is spending the recess among his old friends in America. It is not an ordinary holiday he is taking on this occasion; it is a honeymoon trip, for he was married at Birmingham on July 14 to Miss Helen Cadbury, third daughter of the late Mr. Richard Cadbury, of Moor Green, Birmingham. Two days later, Mr. and Mrs. Alexander sailed from Liverpool, arriving at New York on the 23d. There they were met by Mr. A. P. Fitt, president of the Moody Bible Institute, Chicago.

The wedding, which was attended by about four hundred guests, took place in the Friends' Meeting House, Bull Street, Birmingham, and was in the simple, old fashion of the Quakers. Side by side, accompanied by relatives or friends, sat the parties who had agreed to enter the holy bonds of matrimony together, and in simple language each accepted the other. Mr. Alexander had at his right hand Dr. and Mrs. Torrey, while to the left of the bride sat her mother and her brother, Mr. Barrow Cadbury. In presence of the congregation Mr. Alexander arose and spoke these simple words:

"Friends, in the fear of the Lord and in the presence of this assembly, I take this my friend, Helen Cadbury, to be my wife, promising through Divine assistance to be unto her a loving and faithful husband until it shall please the Lord by death to separate us."

Words of a like character and significance were spoken by the bride, and in this simple way the wedding ceremony was celebrated. Other Friends also spoke.

The congregation included nearly all the members of the bride's family, and many friends of both bride and bridegroom from different parts of the United Kingdom. The bridesmaids were the Misses Margaret and Beatrice Cadbury, sisters of the bride; Miss Blanche Torrey, the Misses Dorothy and Geraldine Cadbury, and Miss Irene Clarke, nieces of the bride; and the Misses Isabel and Dorothea Cadbury, cousins of the bride. Mr. Arthur Bradley of Thornton Hall, North Chester, acted as best man. After the marriage, Mrs. Richard Cadbury, mother of the bride, held a reception at Uffculme, Moor Green. Both bride and bridegroom were the recipients of a large number of valuable presents, those to the bride including many gifts from the various religious bodies and societies with which she was connected. One of these was a handsome mirror given to her by a body of little children among whom she worked and on whom she bestowed much of her love. Wishing to show their affection for their friend, the children agreed to give her a present, each of them giving a half-penny toward the cost. No coin of higher value was accepted.

Mrs. Alexander is the daughter of the late Mr. Richard Cadbury, who was well known for his munificent gifts to philanthropic objects. It was in Birmingham during the great missionary campaign of Dr. Torrey and Mr. Alexander in that city that she first met Mr. Alexander. Miss Cadbury threw her energy and her talents into the meetings and became one of the most earnest and zealous workers.

The young wife inherits in large measure the characteristics and ideals of her father, to whom wealth was simply a tricts of the city, or when romping with shouting, laughing children over the beautiful grounds of her home at Moor Green. Mrs. Alexander, in addition to her love of philanthropy, is an accomplished linguist and has very decided musical tastes.

Mr. Alexander himself is too well known to our readers to need description here. His great gift of Gospel song has delighted and electrified multitudes. For fourty years he has been engaged in evangelistic work, singing the Gospel into the hearts and souls of men all round the world. There is magnetism in his look and every motion. Everybody knows his staid and solemn ceremony is the average congregational singing. People go to the Torrey-Alexander meetings expecting the service of praise to resemble that which they are accustomed. Quickly they are undeceived. They start to sing in an ordinary mechanical manner, Mr. Alexander is down on them at once, exhorting and illustrating, and almost before they know it, the audience have put aside the stiffness and formalism and are singing out with all the energy of a well-trained choir. He communicates his own enthusiasm to those in front of him and readily do they respond to his every movement.

Dr. Torrey and Mr. Alexander have recently conducted meetings in most of the large cities in England with wonderful success. In Liverpool, the meetings were held in the beautiful Philharmonic Hall, the largest building in the city. Over 4,000 people confessed Christ during one month's meetings. Next November they will begin in Liverpool a large evangelistic effort ever attempted in England. The campaign will last for three months. A special building being erected. It will seat 11,000 people with standing room for at least an additional 2,000. An army of about 1,000 stewards is being organized, and the choir membership number 3,000. The special building and all the work connected with it will involve a large outlay, and to meet the expenses a special fund of $20,000 is now being raised.

At Dundee, Scotland, the work of the evangelists was greatly blessed, and over 2,000 people professed conversion. Their Manchester campaign was another great triumph, thousands rejoicing who had previously been strangers to God. They next visited Greenock, Paisley, Ayr, Dunfermline, Kilmarnock, Dumbarton and Dumfries, all Scottish towns. Three or four days were spent in each. Then followed the great Birmingham mission. Bingley Hall, with accommodations for 8,000 people, and standing room 2,000 more, was crowded at every meeting. There were 7,000 who confessed Christ during the month.

March was devoted to Dublin, Ireland, where great meetings were held in Colston Hall, the largest in the city. Overflow meetings were required almost every evening. Bradford, in Yorkshire, was next visited. Next Brighton and then Blackpool, another popular watering-place.

In the whole nine months there were about 33,000 professions of conversion—surely a striking testimony to the power of the old Gospel to lift men and women out of sin. These, however, do not represent all, or nearly all, that has been accomplished. Hundreds and thousands of Christians have been stirred up to higher endeavor and greater zeal: churches and congregations have been materially strengthened, and great blessing has come to many ministers through taking part in the meetings.

J. KENNEDY MACLEAN

The Czar's Minister Assassinated

All Russia Agitated by the Tragic Fate of M. Von Plehve--The War in the Far East

IMPORTANT developments in the Russo-Japanese conflict during the last two weeks have again brought up the question, whether, even at this late date, Great Britain, and possibly other Powers, may not yet become involved. Notwithstanding the reported backdown of Russia after the seizure of the British Peninsular liner Malacca, and the intimation from St. Petersburg that the Volunteer Fleet would be ordered to make no more seizures and would probably be recalled, the St. Petersburg and Smolensk appear to be still engaged in the same active service. Another British O. liner, the Formosa, was seized by the Smolensk in the Red Sea and is still held as a prize, while a third, the Ardova, was also seized, but quickly released. Indeed it is even asserted that the Russian Admiralty contemplates publicly proclaiming the Smolensk and Petersburg as warships, holding there is nothing in existing international laws to prevent such action.

Hardly had the excitement over the Malacca incident subsided, when news came from Vladivostok that the Russian fleet, under Admiral Bezobrazoff, had been driving off the Japanese coast, in the Pacific, and had captured and sunk the British steamship, Knight Commander. The Russian cruiser, Rossia, had demanded her manifest, which was refused. She was then boarded, her captain and crew transferred to the cruiser and the Knight Commander was fired upon and sunk. She was hauled from New York to Yokohama, via Shanghai, and had a cargo of railway materials and coal. Her crew was afterward transferred to the British steamer, Manan, and brought to Yokohama. Two Japanese sailing vessels were sunk by the Russians during the same raid, no effort being made to save the crews. The British steamer, Calchas, from Puget Sound for Japan, loaded with American flour, was also reported seized by the Russians in the Pacific. Fears were entertained for the safety of several large American Pacific liners now afloat with valuable cargoes and specie.

It is reasonably certain that Russia's new naval tactics, which all the governments concerned unite in pronouncing a violation of international law, will not be prolonged. Britain, Germany and the United States have each suffered from these seizures, and while they do not decline to recognize Russia's right to stop vessels suspected of carrying contraband and to inspect manifests and other papers, they insist that, in the event of a seizure, the question whether the vessel is or is not a lawful prize should be decided by a prize court properly constituted and not by the captain of a warship.

British and Japanese warships are now patrolling the Yellow Sea to prevent further seizures in that quarter, and it is probable that some of the vessels of the United States Pacific Squadron will be detailed to safeguard our Pacific interests, for a time at least. Russia will be held accountable in damages for the loss of the Knight Commander's American cargo. On July 28 it was announced that Russia had given to England definite assurances that the whole question would be amicably and satisfactorily settled; that she would withdraw the Volunteer Fleet, and that full reparation would be made for all damages.

The Campaign in Manchuria

Japan's campaign in Manchuria, notwithstanding all delays occasioned by the rains, has progressed rapidly during the week. After much preliminary skirmishing, the armies of Gens. Oku and Mutsu combined and attacked Tschechiao, on Sunday, July 24. After a stubborn four-hour battle, in which the Russians are said to have lost 10,000 and the Japanese 3,000 in killed and wounded, the Russians were driven from all the important positions, and retreated in the direction of Liao-Yang. The combined Japanese forces are estimated at 70,000, the Russian strength being 40,000, with 100 guns. After their defeat, the occupation of New Chwang by the Russians became impracticable, and its evacuation was ordered by Gen. Kouropatkin. This was accomplished on July 25, and the Japanese flag is now flying over the city. It is expected that another battle will be fought at Haicheng, and probably the greatest fight of the war in Liao-Yang.

Gen. Kuroki's army is reported as being very active between Liao-Yang and Moukden, and that several severe engagements have taken place. It is the object of the Japanese to secure control of the railroad, in order to prevent the Russian retreat from Liao-Yang, after the expected battle there. If Kuroki should succeed, the cordon will then be drawn tightly around the Russian army. The Russian army has been practically bisected by the troops of Gen. Oku, and Gen. Kouropatkin has now only a force of 40,000 under his immediate command, available for protecting his line of retreat. Meanwhile, it is not improbable that he may skillfully evade a battle at Liao Yang, and withdraw his forces to Moukden, there to await reinforcements.

The Assassination of M. Plehve

On Thursday, July 28, at 10 o'clock a.m., M. W. K. Plehve, the Russian Minister of the Interior, was assassileft nothing of the carriage but the wheels, springs and frame. Both of Von Plehve's legs were blown off, also his left arm. His face had entirely disappeared.

Various rumors were current as to the identity of the assassin, who came from the Hotel de Varsovie a moment before throwing the bomb. A supposed accomplice in the hotel was also arrested. One report was that the assassin was a Finn, another a Jew, and a third that he was a partisan of the Zemstovs, who have suffered much oppression at M. Plehve's hands. It is said the Emperor was prostrated when he learned of his Minister's fate.

Senator and Minister Wjatcheslav Konstantinovich von Plehve was universally recognized as the most powerful politician in the Czar's empire. Bold, austere and ambitious, he obtained a position of eminence which, in the case of a man of broader statesmanship and more humane impulses, might have been made a blessing to Russia; but Plehve was neither statesman nor humanitarian. He was a man of indomitable perseverance, bull-dog tenacity of purpose, narrow views and relentless antagonisms. To him, in conjunction with M. Pobiedonosteff, Procurator of the Holy Synod, is attributed the origination and execution of the diabolical policy of Jewish persecution and extermination. He was long employed by the government as a procurator in the law courts, and though he was himself of Polish descent, he conducted a merciless persecution of the Poles that was never relaxed till the day of his death. In Warsaw, Tula, Moscow, and elsewhere he hunted down many cases of alleged treason, and was the means of sending scores to a lingering life of exile. As procurator of St. Petersburg he turned his energies fiercely on Nihilists and Jews. He organized such a system of espionage, search, inquisition and torture as have not been known in Europe in nearly a century. When he was made First Chief of the State Police his power was hardly second to that of the Czar himself. A biographer wrote:

A reign of terror was inaugurated in Russia. Hundreds of highly educated and prosperous Russian citizens were banished to Siberia or sent to the prisons with relentless persecution. For three years the Chief of the State Police dominated the policy of the empire. The outside world summed up all his qualities and the dominant note of his policy in the word "Reactionist." Yet, he maintained his policy was Russia for the Russians, and in furthering it banished German colonists in Russia, the nobility in the provinces on the Baltic, and the Jews. One of the institutions inaugurated by Plehve at this time was the class of presidents, to whom was given authority to terrorize the people in ways they were left to devise. In 1884 he was made Minister of the Interior.

In 1901 he was made Secretary of State for Finland, and he played a leading role in the drama which took from that unfortunate land the last vestige of its liberties. He returned to Russia in 1903, and his administration since that time has been marked by a long and tragic series of riots and rebellions in Kieff, Saratov, Poltava, Cherson, and Charkov. It is an open secret that he, more than any other man in Russia, was responsible for the Kishineff massacre, and he was denounced as the instigator and the palliator of that infamy. Later, in the same year, he issued a secret circular against Zionism, putting all Jewish movements under the ban. Complaints to the Czar against Plehve's policy availed nothing. That policy, it is openly charged, was also responsible for the Odessa labor riots, which culminated in a pitched battle in the streets, when some 900 men were injured by a charge of the troops.

That Plehve represented, to the fullest extent, the principle of autocratic supremacy and military domination in Russia, and that he was a faithful upholder of the imperial policy, is unquestioned. But he was a malign influence in the dominions of the Czar. He was known as "the best hated man in Russia." His mail was burdened with threatening letters, and many plots were laid against his life. He is said to have spent $500,000 in measures for his own protection, in recent years. He kept his movements a secret, but everyone in the Russian capital knew that on Thursdays, the Minister visited the Czar to make his weekly report, and that day was therefore chosen by the assassin. While it is true that modern civilization finds no excuse for assassination, it was apparently inevitable that in a land so oppressed and distracted, one who had made himself specially obnoxious to the masses, should at last become a victim of his own policy of violence.

nated while on his way to the Baltic railway station, St. Petersburg, whither he had just been driven in his carriage, intending to visit the Czar at Peterhof. A bomb was flung under the carriage, completely shattering it. The Minister was instantly killed, his body being terribly mangled. The coachman was also killed, together with several persons who stood nearby, and a number of others were injured. The murderer, who came out of an adjacent restaurant on the Zalalkonski Prospekt, a moment before he flung the bomb, was arrested. He is a young Russian, fair-haired and well dressed. When the dynamite exploded, he was wounded in the stomach and fell to the ground, and was seized by the police before he could rise. The wounded horses bolted, but soon fell dead through loss of blood.

In the cabled reports of the assassination, it is stated that the Minister was literally blown to pieces. The bomb was filled with nails and bullets, and when it exploded

The Lesson of Von Plehve's Fate

IF disorder and violence be the logical outcome of tyranny, then the whole world must recognize, in the assassination of M. Von Plehve, Russia's Minister of the Interior, the inevitable sequel of a policy of harsh repression and gross injustice which had already provoked a series of tragedies that are without a modern parallel. Within a comparatively short time, six remarkable events of this character have occurred in the Czar's dominions. Gen. Mezentzeff, Chief of the Third Section of Police, and Prince Krapotkine, Governor of Kharkoff, perished by assassination. They were followed by M. Bogoliefoff and M. Sipiaguine, both predecessors of Von Plehve in the Ministry of the Interior, who also fell under the hand of conspirators. Gen. Bobrikoff, who occupied the post of Governor-General of Finland, formerly held by Von Plehve, met a like fate a few months ago, and the Deputy-Governor of the Caucasus was struck down even more recently. Von Plehve's assassination was the crowning venture of those who were resolved, at whatever risk, to remove the men who stood nearest to the throne, and who were chiefly responsible for the oppressive policy of Russia, and had distinguished themselves as the relentless enemies of personal liberty and popular progress throughout the vast Empire.

But Von. Plehve was more than a mere representative of the autocracy. He was known as "the man most feared and hated in all Russia," because of his personal malignities and his heartless cruelties, his detested system of police espionage, his arbitrary exercise of authority, regardless of law or justice, and his utter lack of compassion in dealing with those whom he singled out for special oppression. He was hated for himself alone, and for the innumerable outrages of which he was the author and instigator. If he made himself cordially detested by the Finns, he was equally abhorred by the Poles, whom he had mercilessly and treacherously persecuted, and by the Jews most of all, who laid at his door the responsibility for the horrors of Kishineff. That he could have averted the massacre with a word, and thus have saved Russia from the shame of one of the darkest pages in its history, is now well understood: but the whole course of his administration was opposed to such lenity, where that race was concerned. The man who had ruthlessly hounded them from city to city, and who had herded them like cattle within the Pale of Settlement, heedless of the suffering and ruin that resulted from his tyranny, could not be depended upon to save them from an infuriated mob of ignorant peasants, goaded to excesses by official suggestion, and with his full personal approval.

It has been urged, in mitigation of Von Plehve's course, that he was faithful and loyal to his imperial master; but it is impossible to conceive of the Czar as approving of acts such as we have described. Rather we should believe what is more likely to be the truth, viz: that Emperor Nicholas knew little of the real workings and aims of those who composed the reckless, autocratic Pan Slavist cabal, of which his Minister of the Interior was the willing executive. He could have had no more cognizance of their plans and purposes than the Spanish ruler had of the brutalities of Weyler in Cuba, when that infamous official undertook the "pacific decimation" of the reconcentrados by starvation.

Von Plehve's fate enforces a grim and terrible lesson. It is a note of warning to tyrants throughout the world. He was Russia's evil genius, and did more than any other man in half a century to plant barriers of sharp antagonism between government and people, and to arouse enmities which a wiser man and a diplomat would have been skilful to avoid. But he was no diplomat, but rather a coarse-grained, unscrupulous detective, a modern Fouché, whom Napoleon once called "a miscreant of all colors." "Plehve's death," remarked the Berlin Tageblatt on the day of the assassination, "was the execution of a criminal," and this seems to be the general impression everywhere, save among the bureaucracy to serve whose interests he had committed crimes national and international. His was the influence that maintained Viceroy Alexieff's supreme control in Manchuria, even against the Czar's wishes, and supported the cabal of exploiters who involved Russia in the present disastrous war with Japan. Almost his last official act was the suppression of four Jewish newspapers in St. Petersburg, and the ruin of 1,500 Hebrews connected with and dependent upon these journals.

Political assassination is always a frightful thing, and a crime to be condemned, since no wrong or series of wrongs can be redressed by violence. It should not be forgotten, however, that in the present condition of Russia—with its host of internal troubles, its undercurrent of revolution, and its oppressed and terrorized people, worn out with vain efforts to obtain justice from those who even refuse to hear their appeals, and who, by criminal indifference, encourage their oppressors—there are latent elements of danger which may at any moment find expression in deeds like that which has just shocked the Russian capital and startled Europe. To reform this condition of affairs is a task to which the Czar and his advisers must sooner or later address themselves earnestly and wisely, if still greater calamities are to be averted.

A more liberal government, a free press, and better laws are imperatively needed. And Russia would do well, also, to give heed to the great lesson which history teaches with regard to the fate that has overtaken every nation and government that has oppressed and maltreated the Jews. Sooner or later those nations, however proud or exalted their position, have been humbled and laid low. God's promise to his peculiar people: "And I will bless them that bless thee, and curse him that curseth thee," is still in force; and the nation that disregards it, in the face of unequivocal warnings, is surely destined to a bitter experience. God grant that, in the case of Russia, the awakening and repentance may not come too late!

Moral Crises

AMONG the mail received at the office of this journal recently, there is a letter describing a situation, which is typical of many, about which others have written for advice. It is the case of a man who knows that he has made a mistake, knows what he ought to do, but shrinks from the suffering that the right course will entail. More than this, he fears that he will not have strength, even if he takes the initial steps, to continue firm to the end. He believes that even if he had the moral courage to bear his own anguish, he would not be able to bear the spectacle of the distress which others would have to undergo through his act. He is intensely miserable, and wants to know what he ought to do.

How many in every age have been in this position! The way of the transgressor really is hard. But there can be no question as to the right course. Christ referred to precisely that situation, when he said it was better to sacrifice a right hand, or a right eye, than to lose the soul. There are some sacrifices far more painful than the loss of a physical member, and this is one of them. Only the truly heroic soul is sufficient for the crisis. To do the right, demands courage of the highest type, and fortitude in perseverance that is even more rare than courage. It is idle and deceptive to tell such a man that he will not suffer so much as he expects. He will suffer, and perhaps his struggle will be long and agonizing. But there will be compensations. There will come into the soul a self respect, a consciousness of heroic power, which will be a consolation. The approval of conscience, too, will count for much. The sweet peace which he has who does the right, may not come at the outset, but is sure in the end. More than all this, however, is the promise of divine strength. Christ promises to him that overcometh, that he shall have hidden manna. That is angels' food, and it gives sustenance that none know but they who have tasted it. The man who enters the struggle in faith, is often faint at the beginning, but he is surprised as he proceeds, by finding his spirit strengthened and his arm nerved by a mysterious power, which, as he knows, is not his own. God helps men who trust in him, if they take a course dictated by their conscience, when they depend on his strength. They go on from victory to victory, and in the end they are honored by being made, as Christ promised, a pillar in the temple of God.

Mont-Lawn Cots

ONE of the pleasantest sights to visitors at the Children's Home, is the rows of white-drap little beds in the dormitories. These cots are in white enamel, and everything about them is spotless in freshness and cleanliness. At first sight of the beds the children hardly know what to make of them, they are so different from any they have ever seen, and they approach them with a sort of awe, hardly seeming to comprehend that such beautiful couches are for them to sleep in. Then, when they read the little framed placards on the walls, containing the names of the donors who endow the cots, they ask many questions about the kind people whose generosity has given them so much comfort, and they listen with wide-open eyes to the recital of how many good friends they have whom even if they should never see, they will never cease to remember.

Not a few of the children who come to Mont-Lawn have never slept in a real bed. The floor, on which is thrown anything in the shape of rags that will make the boards a little less hard, is the nearest approach to a bed many of them have ever known. Clean sheets and pillows many have never seen, and there is a mystery about night-dresses, for children who have never taken off their clothing at night, but have always slept in whatever poor rags they wore during the day. At Mont-Lawn this is changed, and the joy of the children, when they are undressed, bathed, and slipped into these cool, white beds, is something not to be understood, except by those who have seen it. Mont-Lawn has now one hundred and five (105) endowed cots for the season of 1904. To the kind donors, the thanks of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and of the poor little ones are due, and they are given with a will from grateful hearts. We hope to make the number of endowed beds one hundred and fifty this year. The friends of the Children's Home are generous, and it costs but $21 to endow a cot for the season, thus ensuring ten nights each of sweet rest for seven little boys and girls from the crowded, stifling, city tenements.

Some Don'ts from Experience

DON'T expect large things from a little-minded man. Some folk are built on the penny scale and weigh but much only.

—Don't laugh over others' mistakes. You may stumble soon.

—Don't think you know it all, for you don't. One can't hold a hog's head.

—Don't look for oak trees out of acorns in a day or a year. It takes time to ripen both crop and character.

—Don't judge a sermon by your ears. There is a vast difference between a tickle and a truth.

—Don't trust your feelings as proof of piety. The "conscience register" is far more trustworthy and reliable.

—Don't lie. For two good reasons: First, it makes you a liar; and second, it doesn't pay, long run or short.

—Don't worry over the criticism of brainless people. Barring, whether by biped or quadruped, is only noise.

—Don't lose faith in humanity because there are so many black spots. Look at the sun, and then at the looking-glass.

—Don't quarrel over circumstances, nor fret over impossibilities. It's far better to climb mountains than curse the weather.

—Don't be stingy because some of your charity work is wrong. Think how much wasted mercy has been poured out on you.

—Don't read these "Don'ts" and then do them, for you will suffer. I know it, for I have tried it. Some before conversion, some after.

Relics of Ancient Egypt

UNDER the leadership of Mr. John Garstang, excavations have been going on for three years past in Egypt, which have now led to a remarkable discovery. A whole cemetery has been found, in the vaults of which are mummies, placed here before Joseph was carried into Egypt, and with them are a number of relics of extraordinary interest. It was already known, it was the custom of the ancient Egyptians to put in the vaults with their dead, tools and symbols of the trade which the buried person had carried on during his life. With women were placed articles of household use, or models of them, and with the children were put their favorite toys. In opening these vaults, therefore, there are tangible objects depicting the ordinary life of people who lived more than four thousand years ago. Among them is a drum, several harps and flutes, metal dishes, a bronze battle-axe and a bow and arrows.

Besides these, there are a number of models beautifully carved. There is one of a war vessel, on which are figures of men holding swords and spears; models of persons making bread, of a granary, with figures of laborers and overlookers, and a group engaged in the slaughter of an ox. There is also a wooden portrait statuette of a man talking, with a staff in his left hand. In this figure the lines of the face and the marks on the figure show a marvelous attention to detail, and indicate that it was a life-like statue. There were carved objects of art in ivory, crystal and obsidian, indicating a very high degree of skill. Ivory tablets were found in the tombs bearing inscriptions referring to the persons interred. Their date corresponds in many instances to B. C. 2300. The whole collection proves that at that remote date there was a very high state of civilization in Egypt, and confirms the Bible account on which sceptics have cast doubt, of the condition of the country at that time. It is remarkable that these tombs, closed four thousand years ago, should have been opened at this time, when confirmation of Bible statements is valuable. Truth shall spring out of the earth (Ps. 85: 11).

Operating in a Fire

The heroic coolness of a surgeon and a nurse saved the life of a patient in Oakland, Cal., recently. The surgeon had been treating a lady in that city for some time, and at last came to the conclusion, that only by an abdominal operation could her life be saved. He would not go to a hospital, so the operation was performed at her home, and for the sake of quiet, the other inmates were sent out on various pretexts. The surgeon had administered the anæsthetic and had commenced his work, when he noticed a thin line of smoke outside the door, accompanied by the smell of fire. He sent the nurse to investigate, and she returned with the alarming news that the house was on fire. It could have caused the death of the patient to leave her to turn in an alarm, so the doctor and the nurse proceeded with the operation while the flames were licking the walls of the house. Fortunately, a neighbor saw the fire and notified the Fire Department. Just as the firemen arrived, the operation was completed. The room had become intensely hot and filled with smoke. The patient, still insensible, was carried out through the smoke and the doctor and the nurse, with nothing scorched, made their way to a place of safety. Usually, the discovery of a house being on fire causes the inmates to instantly make their escape, but both doctor and nurse felt that they had a higher duty at that time. In staying to save the life of their patient, they gave evidence of a devotion to duty highly honorable to them. The whole human race owes its opportunity of salvation to the fact that the Son of God had in an infinite degree that sublime spirit of self-sacrifice. Even his enemies recognized it, though they did not understand or appreciate it.

He saved others, himself he cannot save (Mark 15: 31).

A Litigant's Inconsistency

Application has been made by a Southern lady to the courts, for a new trial in a case which was decided against her. She sued a wealthy man for breach of promise of marriage. He, on his side, did not deny having made the promise, but stated that since making it, he had been seized with illness, and the physicians had pronounced him incurable. They assured him that he would be an invalid all his life, and in these circumstances he deemed it his duty to break his promise of that during last season there was an impression prevalent that the select circle had been too widely extended, and that many persons were included in it whose claims were not well established. The leaders of society discussed the subject, and it was agreed to arrange a function which would draw the line decisively and more narrowly. It was decided that the function should be a ball, and the attendance should be limited to two hundred persons. The leaders numbered forty, and to each, five tickets were given for distribution. Efforts have since been made to increase the number of tickets to ten each, which would bring the number of guests up to the normal four hundred. This, however, has been strenuously resisted by the advocates of exclusiveness and they have had their way. The number will be two hundred, and the holders of the tickets are embarrassed by the number of applicants whom they will have to refuse. This is one case in which money will not count, as one of the objects sought to be attained is the exclusion from select society of rich, uncultured people. Only members of the very best families have any hope of obtaining tickets. What a blessing it is that the society of the kingdom of heaven has not been so limited! The invitation to enter there could not be wider than Christ makes it:

Whom that cometh unto me I will in no wise cast out (John 6: 37).

Alien Pronunciation

A curious linguistic phenomenon is quoted by a correspondent of a journal in which a discussion is being carried on about the comparative power of heredity and environment. He says that when dining recently at a restaurant in Philadelphia, he noticed that the colored man who waited on him, spoke with a decided German accent. He was still more astonished when he observed that the German idiom was as noticeable as his pronunciation. Having never heard a colored man speak in that way, he asked the man if he had ever been in Germany, but he said no, but he had been reared from infancy in the home of a German family near Reading, Pa. The same correspondent mentions another coincidence of a similar kind. It was that of another waiter who was really a German, but he spoke English with a marked Irish accent. He explained that on his arrival in this country he went into the service of an Irish family and learned English with their assistance. He had no idea that he was acquiring a brogue, but it is now well-developed. So much association will do in influencing the speech. But it will do more than that; it will influence moral character and may ultimately affect the final destiny.

He that walketh with wise men shall be wise; but a companion of fools shall be destroyed (Proverbs 13: 20).

The application of the plaintiff for a new trial is based on the fact that he has since married another lady, thereby proving that the plea on which he escaped punishment at the former trial was not genuine or sincere. The excuses they give for not fulfilling their obligations do not keep them from indulging in pleasure nor engaging in business.

CHAPTER VII.

THE FAMILY OF DE VAUDÉMONT

THE family of de Vaudémont, like that of de Barras, was as old as the rocks of Provence, yet they were not originally of that section of France. When the beautiful and charming Louise de Vaudémont married King Henri III., the last of the Valois, that monarch had, as was natural in view of his marital ties, extended his fortune to various members of the family of his devoted wife.

Among the younger branches of the family which he distinguished with his royal favor was one upon which high rank was eventually bestowed, and to which large domains were granted in the extreme southeastern corner of France in the county of Provence. Living in sight and sound of the sea, the de Vaudémonts had gradually elected to bear arms in the service of the king in the navy of France. From father to son for several generations they had been sailors. The success of the famous de Suffren in the East Indies had been largely due to the able seconding he had received from the Marquis de Vaudémont, his most trusted subordinate. This had been recognized at Court, and upon the untimely death of the great seaman ten years before, de Vaudémont, who had already been promoted to be a rear-admiral, was made de Suffren's successor as Vice-Admiral of the Royal Navy of France, the rank he at present enjoyed.

The long period of peace had given the Marquis de Vaudémont no opportunity of distinguishing himself. The Revolution had found him, as could scarcely have been otherwise, a staunch and devoted adherent of the king. He had been stripped of his dignities and rank by the Republic; he had been proscribed and condemned to death. Fortunately, his place of concealment was not discovered by his enemies. His vast estates had been confiscated, his hotel in Paris and his chateau at Vaudémont had been sacked and gutted, and he found himself in his old age an outlaw, and practically a penniless exile at that.

Those were not the worst of his misfortunes. In the frightful days of the Septembrists, after the death of the king, his son, capitaine de vaisseau in the Royal Navy, had been arrested, found guilty of being concerned in a plot to rescue Queen Marie Antoinette, and had been promptly guillotined. Returning to Paris in disguise, the old vice-admiral had risked his life in vain efforts to save his son. He had succeeded, through the expenditure of the last vestige of means that remained to him from the wreck of his once magnificent fortune, in securing the liberty of his granddaughter and grandson. By the aid of Brébœuf and Aurore, he had hurried these two young people from Paris to the coast of Provence, where he had arranged a boat should meet him which should convey his party to Italy, then in the grasp of the Austrian armies at war with the French Republic.

One Jean Garron, a former peasant on the marquis' estate, who had followed his master's fortunes on the sea, and who had proved himself a reckless, insubordinate, not-to-be-trusted sailor, and whom the marquis had had well-flogged at his gangway on occasion, had espoused the cause of the Republic; and, as he was a man of some ability and courage and utterly without bowels of compassion, he had speedily made himself an important member of the famous Jacobin party, which at that time swayed the destinies of France. He had actually been a member of the convention which had sentenced and executed the king.

On account of his previous sea service he had received an appointment in the French navy as captain, a post he was totally unfitted in any way to fill. In that situation, however, he was not alone. All the ranking officers of the old French navy belonged to the nobility. Almost without exception they had resigned their commissions and had fled the country. The Republic was obliged to find officers where it could.

Garron was the most bitter and unscrupulous persecutor of the family of the marquis. He had conceived a passion for the beautiful daughter of the house and wanted to marry her. His wooing, as we have seen, had been a rough one, and he had totally failed up to the present. He was an indomitable man, however, and had not even yet despaired.

The political party which at first dominated the Revolution had been the Girondists. They were not sufficiently violent to suit the Jacobins, however, and the latter, constantly growing, had assumed the reins sacres at Lyons and Marseilles, had advanced against it and had invested it, whereupon those who had assumed authority within its walls promptly notified Lord Hood, the English Commander-in-Chief in the Mediterranean, to come to their succor and take possession of the town in the name of France.

The forces besieging Toulon had been commanded in succession by a painter, Carteaux; by a doctor, Doppet; and at present by a veteran soldier, Dugommier, who had not the slightest spark of military genius in his composition. He had invested the place on the landward side in the old-fashioned way, and with the allies in command of the sea he could have remained there forever without effecting anything. The situation was satisfactory enough for Dugommier from any point of view, for by doing nothing he could at least save his head. If he risked a battle and lost it—well, the convention had an abrupt habit of sentencing a general in the position to death. Dugommier's natural caution, therefore, was accentuated by these untoward conditions.

CHAPTER VIII.

THE LAST HOPE OF THE ROYALIST

TWO days after the affair in the tower de Bollène in October, 1793, the Agamemnon, under the influence of the flood tide and a gentle breeze, slowly moved up the harbor of Toulon to her anchorage. The batteries of the besiegers had been extended to enclose the shores of the bay on either side of the city and harbor. Opposite the two points of land separating the outer and inner roads, on reefs and piles of rocks, in the water had been erected formidable works to command the channel at its narrowest opening. Forts Balaguier and L'Éguillette on the southern projection, Forts La Malgue and St. Louis on the northern. Back of Fort Balaguier, upon the mainland which here rose from the water in precipitous hills, the English had erected a series of heavy earthworks facing the French lines, which they called Fort Mulgrave, to prevent its seizure by the Republicans.

"There, my lord," said Captain Nelson, pointing toward Fort Mulgrave, "the Agamemnon slowly swept up the channel, 'is the key to Toulon.'"

"Evidently," said the vice-admiral. "When we arrived," continued Nelson, "there were no fortifications to speak of there, on the landward side that is, and the forts covering the channel might easily have been seized had there been any military talent in the opposing army."

Admiral Hood had disposed his available ships, those which were sufficient light in draught to allow them to approach near to the shore, in such a way that they re-enforced every fort and covered every point. Ship's batteries in addition to those in the town were blazing on every hand all the time, and the promontory they were besieging was surrounded with ships, whose broadsides gave efficient aid to the shore batteries.

Captain Nelson was not alone in his opinion of the importance of Fort Mulgrave, or the promontory on which it stood, which the English had made so formidable that they facetiously christened "Little Gibraltar." There was one officer in the French army, a mere boy in years, who at a council of war held a short time before, had put his finger upon that very spot on the map, and had remarked to the veteran with whom he happened to be associated in the council by a fortuitous chance, because he was the only trained artilleryman with the Republican army, that there was the key to Toulon. He had pointed out that the might assail the walls forever and in vain, but if the once got possession of that point the harbor would be untenable, for guns on the promontory would command every portion of the harbor, the allied fleet would be forced to withdraw, and the town would fall at once.

"He bent low over it and kissed it" of government by forcibly dispossessing the Girondists and putting many of them to death. Robespierre and Danton were in control of the Jacobins.

Against the excesses of these inhuman monsters the Girondists revolted. Lyons, Marseilles and Toulon espoused their cause. By the middle of 1793 the whole of Provence was in revolt against the convention. The Royalists seizing the opportunity, made common cause with the Girondists in the rebellion against the Republic. The Jacobins had not been idle. Lyons had been overwhelmed by the Republican forces. Marseilles had also been taken, and after its capture the Republic had been disgraced by wholesale butcheries and massacres of the most atrocious character. Toulon and La Vendée still held on.

Toulon was the greatest naval depot in France. The Republican army, flushed by its triumphs and mas-

THE TWO CAPTAINS

The Agamemnon swung into the inner harbor to the berth pointed out to her by one of the scouting boats, dropped anchor, and Captain Nelson, accompanied by the French vice-admiral, his guest, repaired to the victory, the flagship of Lord Hood; the one to report and the other to pay his respects to the English commander. Thereafter the marquis and his party were tended by the Agamemnon's boat at the principal quay of the harbor. Macartney had charge of the boat.

No one on the Agamemnon had made much progress, in the two days that had elapsed since she came aboard, in the acquaintance of the comtesse. Indeed, the girl had scarcely been visible. The recent death of her father, the great peril she had so narrowly escaped, the shock she had sustained in the knowledge that such a man as Garron had actually aspired to her hand, had unnerved her. When to this was added an animosity to the English far more unreasoning and more bitter, for it was the causeless antagonism of youth, than that of her grandfather, it is easy to see why she kept to herself to the great disappointment of the young sailors of the Agamemnon.

Macartney was a seasoned officer of thirty years of age, neither better nor worse than men of his class. He had followed the sea since he was ten years old and was expecting every day his promotion to a frigate. A penniless Irishman, of good but poverty-stricken family and nothing else, he had risen from cabin boy to first lieutenant by merit alone. Had it not been for a streak of reckless audacity and a native impatience, restraint, which sometimes caused him to break out in different ways, he would have been a captain long since. In his love affairs he had always been confident at each successive woman to whom he pledged his heart was the affinity provided for him by the immortal gods. But in the case of Louise de Vaudémont it seemed to him that it was different. The fickle Irishman fell in love frequently and easily, and always at first sight. He had done it before, and therefore he had no difficulty in recognizing the symptoms when Louise de Vaudémont swept into his empty and—for the time being—ungarnished heart. Yet, in this instance, he felt that something was changed. Other stances had not affected him quite this way, if his memory served him.

Macartney was a gallant and handsome officer, with blue eyes full of merriment and tenderness on occasion; with curly dark-brown hair and with a mouth whose jolly, laughing curves did not conceal his decision and courage. He was a tall, broad-shouldered, powerful fellow, as light on his feet as a cat, and in every respect the antithesis of his little captain, to whom, by the way, he was devotedly attached.

Macartney was deeply disappointed at his inability to see much of the comtesse. When he did see her on a short voyage she was never alone. The marquis, the taciturn and saturnine Brébœuf, or the pert and bluble Aurore, were always at hand. Brébœuf had come into the service of the de Vaudémonts in attendance upon the daughter-in-law of the old marquis. He was an ancient retainer of the family of de Croisic Morbihan, and when Mademoiselle Louise de Croisic was married to the young Captain de Vaudémont, Brébœuf, who had known her from a child, came with her to Provence. Madame de Vaudémont shared her husband's love of the sea, and her daughter, strange to say, was born on a ship.

"You have no fear of the sea," had said Macartney to his fair young charge as they approached the Agamemnon for the first time.

"Fear!" exclaimed the girl. "Monsieur, the de Vaudémonts fear nothing but God." The simplicity with which she made this doughty declaration, robbed of its arrogance. "And I," she continued gravely, "was born on a frigate."

"Is it possible?" exclaimed the young Irishman.

"Monsieur, it is certain. My mother had been visiting in Brittany. She had gone there on my father's ship. When they embarked for Vaudémont that I might be born in my father's chateau, the ship was caught in a storm. They were forced to run before it miles to seaward. It was a long, weary beat back to the Mediterranean, and I was born on the sea, under the flag of France, in the midst of a storm."

"The blue ocean's daughter," murmured the young man, delighted at this confession.

"Yes, monsieur," said the girl, smiling faintly, "I live a ship. When I was a child, before I was sent to a convent in Paris, my father took me with him on any a cruise. My mother died when my brother was born and we were much with our father when we were children. I can steer a ship. I have often—monsieur will scarcely believe it—been over the cross-trees."

"You are the very wife for a sailor, mademoiselle," said the Irishman boldly.

"I shall be wife to no one," she answered gravely, "I live for my grandfather, for my king, for France."

"'Tis a brave resolution, mademoiselle," answered the young sailor, awed for the moment by the solemnity of her remarks; "but 'tis one," he added under his breath, "that you will never keep," and by all the wars of war he resolved that he would do his best to compel her to break it.

But fortune had given him no opportunity, nor had all his ability availed to enable him to create one before reaching Toulon. He did not see her a moment alone until they stood on the quay to separate. The vice-admiral was occupied in greeting his old friends and acquaintances at the landing. Honoré, whose devotion to his grandfather amounted to idolatry, stood close by his side. Brébœuf was attending to the luggage, and Aurore was lost in admiration of the brilliant scene on the quay.

Macartney and Louise were alone for the moment.

"Mademoiselle," said the young man eagerly, "I have had no opportunity to speak to you alone, scarcely even to see you, for a moment. I want to see more of you. May I not?" he went on ingenuously.

"To what purpose, monsieur?"

"Does one ask why one wishes to see the roses bloom or why one longs to hear the birds sing, mademoiselle?"

"Roses do not bloom and birds do not sing for those who love their king in France to-day."

"Ah, there you are wrong, mademoiselle," returned the Irishman confidently. "You may kill the king and subvert the government. You may change the orderly course of events in whatever way you will, with whatever consequences, personal or otherwise, but roses will bloom and birds will sing, if nowhere else, in human hearts. May I not come to see you?"

"To what end, monsieur?" asked the girl once more. "I am for France."

"Just that I may look upon you. We sailors are shut off from half the joys of life that womankind can bring and —"

"You must not talk so."

"I will say nothing if you will only give me leave to come."

"You saved my life, monsieur," said the girl slowly, at last. "Perhaps more than my life—" she shuddered at the thought of Garron—"and I owe you much. I would not seem ungracious, as I am not ungrateful. If my grandfather permits you may come. But I will be frank with you. It seems unkind, perhaps, but the truth is usually so, I am told. I do not love the English people. I wish any other had saved me than yourself."

"Comtesse," said the vice-admiral turning at that moment.

The girl smiled frankly, extending her hand to Macartney. He bent low over it and kissed it, after a fashion already disappearing from France, and there was a fervor and a passion in his touch that in spite of herself thrilled the recipient of the courtesy.

"My compliments to your captain, Monsieur Macartney," continued the marquis, "if I mistake not we shall hear of him some day. He knows his ship, there is a temper in him like that in a Toledo blade. The hôtel which has been placed at my disposal in town is open to him, to you, and to your officers. We hope to see you there. We owe you much. Au revoir."

"Thank you, my lord," said Macartney delighted at the invitation. "Be sure that I shall come, sir." Then he whispered to Louise. "You hear? I may come, then?"

"Come," whispered the girl turning away, leaving him enraptured on the quay.

CHAPTER IX.

AMID FLAME AND SMOKE

ON the night of the sixteenth of November, the Republicans, led by the young captain of artillery, captured Fort Mulgrave by storm. Forts L'Eguillette and Balaguier were rendered untenable by this bold operation. They had not been built for defense against attack from the landward side. The promontory, under the artillery captain's skilful dispositions, soon bristled with guns, and by morning a rain of bullets swept the outer and inner roads.

Hood and Langara at first endeavored to overwhelm it by the fire of their heavy ships-of-the-line, but without avail. As the young artillery captain had said, that promontory was the key to Toulon. There was no help for it, they had to go, nor could they stand upon the order of their going.

The decision to withdraw was at once communicated to the people of the town. From a state of confident security the inhabitants passed into a condition of the direst alarm. Toulon had committed the last affront against the French Republic by admitting the English to its harbor. There was no hope but that the vengeance to be meted out to it would be more terrible than that which had been visited upon any other spot in France which had taken arms against the Republic.

In the harbor were thirty-one French ships-of-the-line, besides twelve frigates and many smaller ships. To leave the ships intact was to hand them over to the Republican government. No objection could be made therefore, either by the allies or the Royalists to the orders which Hood issued for their destruction. Hood and Langara offered to receive on their ships as many of the inhabitants as they could carry, or at least as many as could get aboard in the short time that remained.

Macartney had been promoted a short time before to the command of a captured forty-gun frigate, formerly La Topaze, but which had been renamed the Inconstant, and was ordered to attend to the burning of the French ships. In this he was assisted by a number of officers and men detailed from different ships in the fleet and by several English and Spanish gunboats. The party were provided with captured vessels, to be used as fire ships.

Meanwhile, the embarkation of the Royalists proceeded with frantic haste. Boat after boat left the crowded quays and wharves loaded to the gunwales with frightened people. The ships-of-the-line, the frigates, the transports, were crowded with soldiers of the garrison and with the terrified inhabitants of the town. One by one as they were filled, they weighed anchor and left the harbor, running a gauntlet of fire from the batteries as they passed out to sea.

Macartney's state of mind can scarcely be imagined. He had a duty to perform of the greatest importance. To attend to that duty required every particle of skill and courage that he possessed.

There were in Toulon a number of Republicans who had been restrained from exploiting their political views by the overwhelming preponderance of Royalists and Girondists. They belonged chiefly to the lower orders of the city, and immediately the abandonment of the town began they declared themselves. Joined to them also were the forçats, the galley slaves, who were released from confinement to the number of several thousand. They were led by some men of talent, who had divined that the best service they could render the Republic was to save the ships. In spite of all they could do at first, however, the English towed the fire sloops into the middle of the French liners huddled in the basin and successfully ignited them. They were soon blazing furiously.

As the several boat crews from the frigate and the gunboats went from ship to ship in the roads and in the inner harbor, or having landed in the navy yard set building after building on fire, they were met by a constantly increasing opposition. After setting fire to a number of ships, it became evident to Macartney that with the force at his command he could do no more. There was nothing left but retreat. The Spanish had bungled things badly and effected little. A fire-ship in their charge blew up, wrecking some of the English boats. Reluctantly the Irishman gave the order to abandon their endeavor and pull for the frigate.

Now Macartney's perturbation was caused by his incertitude as to the fate of Louise de Vaudémont. During the long days of the siege he had availed himself of that reluctant permission to visit her which he had extorted from her on the wharf; and from each interview he had come more deeply enamored than ever. He had no resources but his sword. His pay as captain was small, but such as it was, it was the only revenue he could command. Louise de Vaudémont was even poorer than himself, but she was the granddaughter of one of the greatest nobles of France. No one believed in the permanence of the French Republic. Upon the restoration of the monarchy, de Vaudémont would find himself once more in the enjoyment of the princely revenues of his vast estates. He would disdain the simple captain in the navy of his dearest foe.

What mattered that? Macartney had the happy optimism of his race. He had also much of its freedom from care for the future. He made love to the comtesse as persistently, as openly, and as desperately as he dared—and in the pursuit he dared much.

The capture of Fort Mulgrave had been so sudden and unexpected, the necessity for the prompt withdrawal of the fleets from the harbor had been so important, that Hood had summoned him to the flagship without the loss of a moment and charged him with the duty, which, under other circumstances, he would have received with unmitigated joy. So exacting had been this duty that he had no time even to go ashore and inquire about her.

One by one the boats made for the frigate, which he had placed in such a position as to render her least liable to damage from the fire of the enemy. Macartney had been but a short time in the frigate, but he had already endeared himself to her crew. Naturally, the captain's boat was the last to leave the French fleet. It was a heavy, twelve-oared cutter and contained half a dozen marines forward. Moved by a natural impulse, instead of steering the boat directly to the frigate, Macartney, who had the tiller himself, swung her parallel to the crowded quay of the city at a short distance from the shore.

The scene in the harbor was one of appalling magnificence. From Fort Mulgrave and the other batteries a constant roar of artillery was kept up. The forts on all sides ringed the inner harbor of the city with smoke and flame. The flying English and Spanish ships swept down the harbor, their broadsides hurling death and destruction at the batteries on either hand.

ELIJAH KILLING A PROPHET OF BAAL
From a picture in the Monastery of Mt. Carmel

A Visit to Mount Carmel

ON April 5th, last, the writer was one of a company whom the steamship Grosser Kurfürst brought to Caifa from Beyrout. There being no port in Caifa, we were landed in small boats, and found carriages awaiting to convey us to Nazareth, and beyond to the Sea of Galilee. After journeying about twelve miles, we stopped on the plain of Jezreel. Nearby, on Mt. Carmel's western slope, was pointed out the traditional site of the contest between Elijah and the prophets of Baal. We had hitherto associated that event with the eastern end of Mount Carmel, which rises 1,600 feet above the sea.

Having completed our journey to Nazareth and the Sea of Galilee we returned to Caifa, and were comfortably lodged in one of the convents which serve as hotels for tourists all over Palestine. In front of the convent, less than a hundred yards away, is the blue Mediterranean. In the rear of the convent are lemon and orange groves. On the table oranges are served, decorated with orange blossoms. Here a carriage party was formed to go to the top of Mount Carmel. The roadway was hewn out of the mountain side. Nervous people felt dizzy ascending it. But once on the top, how grand the panorama!

"Nature rises in a series of great stages from sea to alp; the Mediterranean's long coast from north to south, with its hot sands and palms; Esdraelon covered with wheat; Tabor and the lower hills of Galilee, with their oaks; then, the barren peaks of upper Galilee, with haze about them; the clear snow of Hermon, hanging like an only cloud in the sky." (In this description we have adopted and adapted the words of Geo. Adam Smith). And then our thoughts were centered upon the mountain itself, and we recalled its place in history, connected with the Romans, and Richard Cœur de Lion, the Crusaders, and Napoleon. But most of all, our thoughts turned the Bible to history, and we sought the places connected with the life of Elijah.

We were invited to visit the monastery which is built over the cave in which Elijah is said often to have come for rest. We found it decorated and gilded after a fashion that would have made the sturdy, rugged old prophet feel very ill at ease. We asked to have the site of the sacrifice pointed out to us, and were directed to observe a rocky ridge near by, and were told that hundreds of Hebrew pilgrims come from Lebanon every year to offer sacrifices there.

After leaving the monastery we took our way to the observatory, which is situated more directly on the point than the monastery, and there sat down with Bible in hand to read the story of what had occurred there almost two thousand years ago. We shut out the vision of the sea by turning our backs upon it. There arose a vision before us. A vast concourse of people covering the mountain, for the most part, Israelites, whose hearts had been turned from the true God to worship Baal, the sun god, and his images, and vile Astarte. In their midst the prophet Elijah, dressed in his sheepskin coat and striped overcoat; also King Ahab, having an anxious and uncomfortable look. And gathered about an altar which they had erected, four hundred and fifty priests of Baal, in a great frenzy, calling upon their "god" to send down fire to burn up the sacrifice they had laid upon the altar. He is the Sun, and had fire enough. His devotees for hours call upon him in vain.

After their failure, we see Elijah erecting an altar of twelve stones, just twelve, to remind the Israelites from whence they came. We see Elijah fill with earth the hollow square between the stones. He lays the sacrifice upon the altar, and then asks attendants to pour water upon it again and again, until the trench around the altar is filled with water. Then he calls upon God to send down fire. He calls only once, and the fire descends and consumes the sacrifice and the altar of earth and stones, and even the water.

The vision changes, the vast concourse of people fall upon their faces and declare their allegiance to Jehovah, the true God. Their hearts have been won back from Baal. The scene changes again, there is dismay and confusion as the prophets of Baal, who have taught the people that vice is virtue, are being dragged down the mountain to be slain at the river Kishon, by order of Elijah, to prevent the possibility of their ever leading the people astray again.

Again, Elijah is on the mountain, he has bowed himself down upon the ground, and is praying, not for fire this time, but for rain. He has his servant watching for a cloud which shall be the answer to his prayer. At length it appears on the horizon, no larger than a man's hand. Elijah's faith is confirmed, and he sends word to King Ahab to get down, drive swiftly from the mountain to his palace in Jezreel, lest he be overtaken by the rain. Ahab has not seen rain for three years and a half, but he cannot doubt Elijah now, and so he hastens to obey. The strength of God is in Elijah, and he outruns Ahab's horses, and comes first to Jezreel, as if he had been a herald of the King.

Illustration and Application

1. The folly of idolatry. We must not miss the humorous episode in this story. "Cry aloud for he is a god!" said Elijah, satirically, while the prophets of Baal cut themselves in wild appeals to their god of fire. "Either he is musing, or he is gone aside, or he is on a journey, or peradventure he sleepeth, and must be awaked." So Isaiah describes the idol makers cutting down a tree to carve a god from one end and burn incense to it with the other. And the Psalmist ridicules the idols that "have eyes, but they see not; hands, but they handle not." Even a child looking at idol worshippers bowing down to wood and stone, exclaims: "I should think they'd know 'twould take a better god than that to make the moon and stars."

It is expected that the Emperor of Japan, by advice of his chief men, will officially declare that country is no longer pagan, but Christian. Its gods were about the only cheerful ones, but now as the people become educated these gods seem to be laughing at the folly of their worshippers. To put a carved fragment of creation in place of the Creator is folly indeed; but are our modern forms of idolatry, the worship of money and rank and pleasure, any less absurd for an immortal mind, putting amusement or money-making or office seeking in the supreme place in our thoughts in place of God?

2. The essence of Baalism is in those of every age of whom Paul speaks, when he says, "whose God is their can, and that we are to blame if we do not, whatever the hereditary tendency of our natures, whatever the temptations of environment. Amid all the foolish talk, that even prisoners seize for excuses, about the relations of skull measure to character, let every sensible man set up Chicago's motto, "I WILL." The Carmel battle to-day is to show the supremacy of will, human and divine, over all the powers of nature in us and about us.

3. Human responsibility is therefore the towering fact on the earth side of this mountain story. We need to tell again and again the answer made by the brainiest of American statesmen when asked for the greatest thought that ever passed through his mind. With great solemnity he replied, "The thought of my individual responsibility to God." Never was there so much demand as now for "personal liberty," and never less of the sense of personal responsibility. If we do not lay the blame of our wrong doing on heredity—e.g., "I was trained too strictly," or on environment—e.g., "My comrades led me astray"—we excuse ourselves because our political or commercial bosses ordered us to do the mean thing and we "had to do it."

Many of the Jewish people who did not really approve of Baalism adopted it, saying, no doubt, "They all do it," or saying, "When you are with the Romans do as the Romans do." To all such to-day rings out Elijah's challenge, "How long halt ye between two opinions? If Jehovah be God serve him, or if Baal, serve him." What a pity that so many whom God made to be vertebrate men are content to be jellyfish, saying, "Yes, yes" to everything.

"A weak man," says Josh Billings, "wants just about as much watching as a bad one, and has dun just about as much damage in the world. He iz everyboddy's friend and therefore he iz no one's; and what he iz a-going tew do next iz as unknown tew him az to others. He hain't got enny more backbone than an angle-worm haz, and wiggles in and wiggles out ov everything. He alwuss sez 'yes,' when he should say 'no,' and staggers thru life like a drunker man."

Another has said of those who try to walk in two paths at once, that they are awkwardly limping first on one side and then on the other. "How long halt ye?" Stiffen up your staggering will, and dare to be what you believe. And when by an act of will you have chosen God, get into a state of right willing that will make right doing the persistent habit of life.

4. The essence of moral courage is in right will combined with a sense of God's presence. I think it is much harder to be courageous in little things than in great ones. In an accident or a battle man "rises to the occasion" as if by a might inspiration. But to do right in little thing is a rarer courage.

"Let us meet here at a quarter to seven and have a moonlight coasting party!" cried Fred Baker. "We will have supper at six, and that will give us lots of time to get here." "I can't come until half-past seven," said Will Adams, after the other boys had shouted a noisy assent. "I have to wash the supper dishes and put them to rights." There was a chorus of derision. "Wash dishes—a boy washes dishes! Who ever heard of such a thing?" "I have," said Will, quietly. "I know of three boys in the Hamilton Hotel who have to wash dishes three times a day. 'Oh—but they are paid for it.' 'Well do you mean to say that you would do for pay what you wouldn't do to help your sick mother?'"

5. The freewill of God an explanation of prayer. On the heaven side the supreme fact in this story is that God answers prayer, the possibility of doing which without "violating the laws of nature" is seen in the analogous fact that man's will, responding to the appeals of his children, interposes in the laws of nature every day to grant those requests. There is no doubt that discoveries of "the laws of nature," that is, of the habits of God, has created an impression in careless minds that there is no room left for miracles or prayer or providence. But man's own interpositions among the laws of nature are so many and so mighty as to make reasonable and credible all that the Bible teaches about the interpositions of God's will, with fuller knowledge and completer power, to accomplish his purposes. Man can set a wooden altar on fire; can even smelt stone, and evaporate water—why should not God do all this on Carmel?

The Suez Canal was cut and united the great Mediterranean Sea to the little Red Sea, although scientific men said it was impossible. It seemed to be inconsistent with the laws of sea levels and other natural laws. But a wise mind adapted these laws to the case, the work was done, and vessels went through the canal to return with treasures from the East. Men of science said prayer could bring no blessing from on High, but faith cut the channel and the little sea of the immortal within us was connected with the Infinite above. And so the soul sends heavenwards its prayers, and these come back argosies laden with blessings.

More things are wrought by prayer
Than this world dreams of. Wherefore let thy voice Rise like a fountain for me night and day;
For what are men better than sheep or goats,
That nourish a blind life within the brain,
If, knowing God, they lift not hands of prayer,
Both for themselves and those who call them friends?
For so the whole round earth is every way
Bound by gold chains about the feet of God.—Tennyson.

"THEN THE FIRE OF THE LORD FELL AND CONSUMED THE SACRIFICE"

belly." Baalism was nature worship, Baal, the sun, and Astarte, the moon, represented the male and female forces of nature. Many nature worshippers do not go so far as "forbidden pleasures," but they make a god of pleasure in the various forms of "creature comfort," which Gladstone, in his last days, said was the greatest peril of Anglo-Saxon peoples in these prosperous times, when the materialism of luxury re-enforces the materialism of natural science in turning thought almost wholly on visible things. The Epicureans were nature worshippers, and they have not died out, for there never were so many whose real watchword is, "Let us eat and drink for to-morrow we die." Nature worship claims all those who are dominated not by brain but by mucous membrane. The tendency of a prosperous time to reverse Paul's order to "keep the body under," and make body dominate mind and spirit, has been greatly re-enforced by materialistic evolution, that man is not free to shape his character, but is a helpless chip on the current of heredity and environment. He has no occasion to say, "I have sinned," and no power to say, "I will arise and go unto my Father." It is as foolish as image worship, this denial of our conscious freedom to choose, this denial of conscious responsibility. We know we are free as surely as we know that we see. We know we ought to choose the right, and

The New Periodical for Women Issued from the Office of the Cosmopolitan Magazine : : :

THE TWENTIETH CENTURY HOME is the bringing into life of a purpose long ago conceived, to make of the American home a great university under the tutelage of a thousand instructors—the wisest obtainable, the most far-seeing, the cleverest, the most entertaining, and, consequently, most capable of imparting knowledge.

★ ★ ★

The Twentieth Century Home is issued in the belief that there are many millions of people who have arrived at the point of demanding the treatment of Household topics in a scientific way; that everything affecting the home and the members of the family deserves the most thoughtful consideration of the ablest men and women who have in mind the improvement of the conditions which make for happiness.

★ ★ ★

The words, "Twentieth Century Home," stand for the perfected ideals of the century. Certainly the home as it will be developed, will be one in which reason will be applied to every affair of life. Everything is submitted to the crucial tests of good common sense—economy, organization, scientific process. Nothing is accepted as right, because it is, even in such matters as dress.

★ ★ ★

The kitchen is treated not as a place where drudgery holds sway, but as a laboratory in which wonderful chemical transformations take place, worthy of the interest of any mind if only it be knowing enough to comprehend.

Between bits of fiction and travel, comes the serious side of The Twentieth Century Home, intended primarily to raise up, to give all members of the family a better knowledge of life, of the world around about them and of their neighbors and of their duties to themselves and to others.

WE WANT ONE MILLION NAMES

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is planning to send out next Fall, one million invitations to Christian families likely to subscribe. To accomplish this, we require the assistance of our present subscribers. They know what THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is, and they also know whether its introduction into new homes should be encouraged. We leave, without misgivings, the decision in their hands.

THE MAGAZINE OF ACTION

PEARSON'S is one of the youngest magazines in the United States, and is one of the strongest.

More than a million active people read PEARSON'S each month.

PEARSON'S has gained its enormous circulation wholly through the sparkling interest of its stories, and the strong and helpful qualities of its articles.

Following is a list of a very few of the well known writers whose names and works have contributed to the success of PEARSON'S:

General Charles King	T. Jenkins Hains
Conan Doyle	Ian MacLaren
Anthony Hope	Stanley T. Weyman
Cutcliffe Hyne	Bret Harte
Robert Barr	Holman Day
Rudyard Kipling	Gelett Burgess
Cyrus Townsend Brady	Rider Haggard
Clara Morris	Jack London
H. G. Wells	Seuman MacManus
Susan B. Anthony	E. H. Sothorn
Ida Husted Harper	Marguerite Merrington
Max Pemberton	Andrew Carnegie
Ray Stannard Baker	John Wanamaker
Albert Bigelow Paine	Hetty Green
Hesketh Prichard	Rev. Dr. Parkhurst
Henry George	Gen. Nelson A. Miles
	Chauncey M. Depew

During the next six months the greatest leading features of PEARSON'S will be stories of

Indian Fights and Fighters

By CYRUS TOWNSEND BRADY

One of the most widely discussed magazine features of the year. Written with great care, after exhaustive study, this brilliant writer has produced a history of our frontier which reads like fiction.

The Chronicles of Don Q.

By K. and HESKETH PRICHARD

A sparkling series of short stories (each complete in itself), showing the workings of the remarkable code of honor of Don Q.—The strongest live character in modern fiction.

Dr. Nicholas Stone

Pathologist of Recidivism

By E. SPENCE DE PUE

A new novel, commencing in the August number. A detective story of great cleverness, written in an entirely new vein.

Samantha at the St. Louis Fair

By JOSIAH ALLEN'S WIFE

PEARSON'S has engaged Miss Holly (Samantha), for what may prove to be her last literary work, to amuse the public, in her quaint way, with an account of her visit to the Fair.

The famous Samantha is getting to be pretty well on in years, and it took considerable persuasion from PEARSON'S editor to get her to consent to write this story.

It is needless to say that the story is written in a fictional style in which dear old Josiah Allen and his wife are the central characters.

Thomas Nast, Cartoonist

By ALBERT BIGELOW PAINE

These Nast papers (commenced in the April PEARSON'S, but each part complete in itself) are the most fascinating stories of history which have appeared since the days of Ida Tarbell's Life of Lincoln, almost ten years ago.

The Smashing of the Tweed Ring

Nast's greatest achievement, is described with rare skill in the August and September numbers, and is probably the most dramatic story ever inspired by any record of civic history.

A new work of tremendous importance, dealing with the great social problems of the day, entitled

The Decline of the Republic

By HENRY GEORGE, JR.

This work, following closely upon Mr. George's stories of Wall Street's scandals, is sure to attract widespread interest in all walks of life.

In these articles, Mr. George proposes to compare modern follies and vices with those of the ancients; showing the consequential tendencies toward the lowering of ideals and morals; and sound a note of warning with a view to accomplishing reform.

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

The Twentieth Century Schoolgirl

SHE is a pretty creature, the twentieth century schoolgirl, and the things she has to learn are amazing to old-fashioned people. She does not have lessons, as her mother and her grandmother had, but she has a certain amount of "work" to be done in English, in mathematics, in French, in science, in Greek and Latin, very possibly, too, in psychology. I have seen girls of fourteen gravely attacking the ethereal, elusive, baffling, puzzling work of this most obscure subject, their brows bent into a dainty frown, while between whiles they nibbled away at fudge or chocolate cream-drops. So much work, the teachers all one, is mapped out for a given period, so much for another period, and the schoolgirl has only to submit herself to the process, and in time she will be turned out, a finished product, the work all happily behind her.

A conservative looker-on has her doubts. Is there sufficient margin left in the scheme of today for the girl who is rather ill, and must needs go very slowly, and for the opposite girl, who is very clever and forges ahead with swiftness and despatch? The ordinary girl, who keeps an even pace, will probably get through her school work with credit to herself and to the satisfaction of her instructors. The girl who memorizes with ease, asks few questions, and does her allotted "stint" without much difficulty, comes out well on examination days. But her friend, who is perhaps a wee bit stupid, and her friend, who is a genius and does not run into the usual mould, both fail when the school tests are applied. Neither succeeds brilliantly under the twentieth century regime.

One of the foremost authors of the day, a woman of marked length of character and of wide versatility, said, not long ago: "I don't wish to be thought a fossil, but I long for a return in the schoolroom to the simple methods of my youth. My daughters were taught grammar and rhetoric in an elaborate and painstaking fashion which moves me to awe and surprise. But when they had a rule for any usage, they came to me, whose early teaching was not in the least like theirs. I was obliged to commit the whole of Brown's Grammar to heart, and I recited it, rules, dates, exceptions, references, as perfectly as I recited my catechism. I parsed through Pope's Essay on Man, and Cowper's Task, and Milton's Paradise Lost, and I learned to appreciate the English, and to know a good style when I saw it. And I was never a nervous wreck in vacation time as many a girl is now."

Another middle-aged critic expresses her doubt as to whether the extremely careful and arduous education of the twentieth century schoolgirl is likely to be a good thing for her, physically, later on, when maternity shall make upon her its inexorable demands. Here, the looker-on discovers that authorities differ. Some who speak very positively, seem sure that a girl who is to be wife and in due course a mother, does not need the severe training of schoolroom and college; needs rather a training in domesticity. Others point with pride to the college women who are shining examples of the good that is done the sex by exhaustive application during school-days and resultant mental discipline. The last analysis it resolves itself into a question of how much the girl herself amounts to, of what she can do in the long run from text-books and teachers.

Why-Lilies

A clump of day-lilies in an old garden! They stood sweet and sturdy and faithful, and as the lady of the manor gathered them she said to a friend at her side, "There is nothing

I wish for my boys quite so much as that they may be like these lilies."

"That seems strange," replied the friend. "One associates girls with lilies, but not boys. It would never have occurred to me to wish that a son of mine should resemble a lily, or any other flower. A tree, now; I might wish my boy to grow like a tree, planted by a river."

"Well," returned the first speaker, "the lily is my symbol of purity. Its fragrance is so clean. It makes me think of, 'Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God.' I cannot be contented to have my sons anything but clean in every thought and word and deed."

The little conversation set one listener adrift on a tide of reflection. Do we not want of our boys and young men the stainlessness of the knight's shield, the whiteness of mind that is unsullied by any coarseness? A boy should be not less pure from every gross taint than his sister. When the child is born into the home, when the little fellow kneels first beside the bed to say his prayers, he is not in any way different from the little maid who plays with him. Nor should there be, as he grows older, the slightest affinity between the boy and the thing that is evil, that does not exist between the girl and the same thing.

One associate every boy should avoid, and that is the comrade who is furtive, who does not look people straight in the face, and who never cares to meet the home and family

People Who Lean

"SEEMS to me," said Aunt Betsy, "that there are just two classes o' people in this world."

"Saints and sinners?" Aunt Betsy's nephew Tom laughed as he looked at her pursed up mouth and twinkling eyes.

"If you choose to call 'em so, I think you're not far out. But I mean people who hold up their own end, and people who lean. There's far too many of the last."

"Down the street now goes Frances Ames in her fresh blue frock and her white chip hat. She looks as pretty as a flower. Her father went past the window an hour ago in his rusty black coat and threadbare trousers, with patched shoes, and a hat that came out o' the Ark. Thomas, you know well enough that Joseph Ames is an industrious, careful man; clever, too, and worth something to the firm that employs him. 'Tisn't stinginess that makes him so shabby, and 'tisn't carelessness. I can remember when he was as spruce as any young fellow in town, but ever since Frances has been grown, it's taken every cent her father can raise to dress her. Last winter she set her heart on new furs. Mr. Ames needed a new overcoat. He didn't get one, but Frances got the furs. The other day she wanted a summer silk and a white mull, and she went to Boston and came home with both. Mr. Ames made up his mind that he could do with his old suit a while longer, and as for Mrs. Ames, she never stirs out of doors, and Frances never notices why."

"Is Frances so selfish?" Tom's merry face clouded over. He rather admired the beautiful Frances Ames.

"She belongs to the people who lean."

"Why doesn't she earn her own things?"

This inquiry came from Linda Bates, who was knitting a white shawl and had just finished counting her stitches.

"Frances Ames? You don't know her, Linda. She wouldn't be a stenographer, it's too confining. She might be an artist, but she'd hate the confinement. She has no particular talent, she always says proudly, and—her parents are proud to support their only daughter, and sacrifice their own comfort. Oh, she's not singular. There are plenty like her. Plenty of people who lean their whole weight on people who'll stand still and let them do it. I," and Aunt Betsy drew herself up, "have no use for that sort of person."

Tom walked off, whistling. That evening, in her pretty rose-colored organdie, ruffled like the satin petals of a hollyhock, Frances waited for him in vain. He did not call.

The Modern Foe of Disease

Science is the sworn foe of disease in modern times. Looking back only a few years, we see diphtheria a n almost incurable scourge, scarlet fever an unspeakable dread, and consumption an inexorable enemy marching on to death. In the latter malady especially it was a familiar experience that one by one, entire families were swept to the tomb by this pitiless sickness. A morbid deposit on the lungs, however slight, used to mean a fatal result, and often the caretakers were the next victims after death had cut down the young man in his prime, the maiden in her bloom, or the mother in the midst of her years. Modern science has minimized the perils of tubercular disease and taught us that, taken in time, and fought in pure air and a dry climate, consumption is curable. The same may be said of most diseases. The keen knife and the deft hand of the surgeon daringly cutting away sources of poison or dangerous foreign growths, have saved lives by the thousand, and we need only courage, faith and obedience, as a rule, to overcome disease and get well when we are ill.

TAKE THE ROAD GAILY

The road of life is sure to have
Its rough and smooth by turns;
Our ups and downs we must accept,
Each gets what rest he earns.
And some may walk at easy pace,
And some bear heaviest load;
But wear a smile upon your face,
And gaily take the road.

ESTHER WATKINS.

AN IRIS GARDEN IN TOKIO, JAPAN

THE Japanese, who seem to do most things exceedingly well, have brought to perfection the art of gardening. Their tea-houses stand in beautifully cultivated gardens, where sometimes a single flower, as here, enchants the guest, and sometimes the features of a wide landscape are repeated in miniature. We may learn much from the bright children of the Island Empire.

of his boy companion. A boy's mother has almost always a wonderful divining faculty where her son's companions are concerned.

Not that a fellow should limit his friendships to boys who are precisely in his own station, or who have precisely his social or educational opportunities. It is well to have many friends, and to have them of all varieties and grades of culture. The son of the judge and the son of the motorman, the son of the President and the son of the moulder in the iron furnace, may very properly sit side by side in school, and share the same games in the field. "Why do you like that boy so much, John," a man asked his son, who had just parted very cordially from an acquaintance. "I like him because he's the best pitcher I ever saw," was the quick reply. One may have friends in ragged trousers; one ought not to have friends whose morals are frayed and ragged.

If you take a glass of clear water, and drop into it from a filter, ever so little ink, the water is discolored. Sin has gone over it, as sin goes over a character. Once we form the habit of thinking impure thoughts, the soul is darkened; its crystal cleanliness is impaired.

Closely allied to impure thought, is impure speech. A parent should watch the words of his children, and a boy should not resent criticism, if reproved for using language which is not fit for the ears of women and little children. The moment a boy finds that other boys descend to vile speech, he would better seek friends elsewhere.

Ah, to be like the lilies, white, clean, all through.

A Summer Camp for Boys

Gen. A. C. Kenyon, who for many years has been connected with the Children's Aid Society of New York, is engaged in summer work for boys. His summer camp at Stamford, Conn., has a successful record of twelve years as a guarantee of its usefulness. Upwards of 700 boys passed more or less of their vacation in his encampment last season.

Ocean Grove Vindicated

"The Christian Herald" Proves from the Internal Revenue Records that the Story about 200 Licenses is Wholly Untrue

FOR several weeks past, Ocean Grove has been stirred to its depths by the wide publicity given to a statement that two hundred Federal liquor licenses were in actual operation at the Grove. This startling assertion was made by Rev. Dr. Boom of Trenton, one of the speakers at the New Brunswick District Ministers' Association, on July 11, and was published in the daily press throughout the country as follows:

"In Ocean Grove and her sister city, Asbury Park, the United States has 440 good customers, paying, each of them, $25 a year for the privilege of selling rum. This is the price of Uncle Sam's silence and connivance."

Naturally, such a statement has attracted almost universal attention, the principles that govern Ocean Grove and its inflexible temperance record being well-known all over this continent. Those multitudes who have been accustomed for over a generation to regard the Grove as the purest and most moral of all the great summer watering-places and as absolutely free from the drink evil, were greatly shocked at the boldness of the attack. The Ocean Grove Association met the next day in executive session, and Dr. Ballard vehemently denied the assertion made by Rev. Dr. Boom.

As the charge was insistently repeated, notwithstanding denials, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD decided to procure absolute evidence of the truth or falsehood of the allegation against the fair name of Ocean Grove. The editor of this journal accordingly commissioned the Rev. Hervey Wood, Field Secretary of the National Temperance Society, New York, to visit Camden, N. J., and procure the necessary authority to examine the Tax Collector's book for Monmouth County, N. J., the district in which Ocean Grove is situated. His report is a complete refutation of the scandalous charge, and as it comes direct from the only official source—the Internal Revenue records—it is conclusive, and shows that the authors of the charge against Ocean Grove were either grossly misled as to their sources of information, or were guilty of deliberate misrepresentation.

Rev. Mr. Wood's report is as follows:

"In compliance with the request of the Editor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, I have investigated the story that has been going the rounds of the daily papers, stating that 200 Special Taxes are now paid in Ocean Grove, and 240 in Asbury Park. For the benefit of your readers, I may say that the Federal Government collects a tax of $25 per year from every person who sells alcoholic liquors as beverages, and druggists have to pay this Special Tax, because they sell alcoholic liquor on a physician's prescription.

"I visited the office of the Collector of Internal Revenue, in Newark, N. J., on Saturday last, and requested the privilege of seeing the Tax Collector's books. I found that Ocean Grove and Asbury Park were in the First District of New Jersey, with offices in Camden. I then went to Camden, and learned on my arrival that Circular No. 651, issued Dec. 10, 1903, forbade the collector, without permission from Washington, to allow anyone to see the Tax Collector's books. I then called up on the telephone, Commissioner J. W. Yerkes, of the Internal Revenue Department in Washington, D. C., who very kindly gave me the necessary permission to examine the books, and informed me that 'No. 10. Special Tax-Payers' Record,' contained all the names of both wholesale and retail liquor dealers in Monmouth County, New Jersey, and that I had permission to examine it.

"I examined the record named very carefully, going over it twice. I found that only two (2) persons in Ocean Grove had paid this special liquor tax of $25.00, while in Asbury Park forty-eight (48) persons had paid said tax of $25.00. The two in Ocean Grove are druggists. There is not a single liquor license, operated as such, in the entire place.

"Your investigator is not a Methodist, nor a member of the Ocean Grove Association, yet with Christian people, and temperance people all over the world, he rejoices that there is no stain upon Ocean Grove's fair name. The Tax Collector's book, showing that the story that 200 licenses are held there is absolutely untrue, and without even the flimsiest foundation in fact. It is a fabrication, the purpose of which it is difficult to conceive. Pain and shame, and much profanity have been the results of this story. It has been quoted by liquor men and haters of Christ's Church wherever the name of Ocean Grove Camp-meeting Association is known.

"I desire to express my appreciation of the courtesy and kindness of J. W. Yerkes, Commissioner of Internal Revenue at Washington, D. C., and Isaac Moffat, Internal Revenue Collector of the First District of New Jersey, at Camden, and his assistant, in furnishing me Record No. 10, containing the names of all special taxpayers in Monmouth County, New Jersey, and for their valuable assistance in finding the desired information.

"The Christian and temperance people of all denominations throughout our land will thank THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for producing the evidence enabling us to effectually disprove this false and unjust charge concerning the temperance and morals of Ocean Grove."

(REV.) HERVEY WOOD.

The Sun-Bright Clime

HAVE you heard, have you heard, of that sun-bright clime,
Undimmed by sorrow, unhurt by time,
Where age hath no power o'er the fadeless frame.
Where the eye is fire, and the heart is flame—
Have you heard of that sun-bright clime?

A river of water gushes there,
Mid flowers of beauty strangely fair,
And a thousand wings are hovering o'er,
The dazzling wave and the golden shore,
That are seen in that sun-bright clime.

Millions of forms, all clothed in bright,
In garments of beauty, clear and white—
They dwell in their own immortal bowers,
Mid fadeless hues of countless flowers,
That bloom in that sun-bright clime.

Ear hath not heard, and eye hath not seen,
Their swelling songs, and their changeless sheen,
Their ensigns are waving and banners unfurl,
O'er jasper walls and gates of pearl,
That are fixed in that sun-bright clime.

But far, far away is that sinless clime,
Undimmed by sorrow, unhurt by time;
Where amid all things that's fair is given,
The home of the just, and its name is heaven,
The name of that sun-bright clime.

The Jew and his Persecutors

The Blessing to Abraham and the Curse upon his Enemies holds Good to this day

IN a recent sermon by Rev. W. Bruce Doyle, of Jackson, Ala., upon "The Jew," the preacher, taking for his text the words of Genesis 12:3: "I will bless them that bless thee, and curse him that curseth thee; and in thee shall all families of the earth be blessed," reviewed the fulfilment of this remarkable promise through history, from the earliest days down to the present time. We are enabled, through the courtesy of The Hebrew Standard of New York, to reproduce the preacher's remarks below:

God in this passage promises three things: will bless them that bless thee, and curse him that curseth thee; and in thee all families of the earth shall be blessed. Come down the line of the peculiar people, the royal priesthood, the holy nation, and see it has not been as true as the God who made it. The sons of Jacob were great-grandchildren of Abraham. Joseph was one of the younger, and his brethren hated him. They put this meek child of Abraham in a pit to die. They found that they could get money by selling him, and, true to that money-making nature of theirs, they pulled him out and sold him to strangers, who took him away into slavery. And those men lived to see their land scorched to a crisp by drought and heat. They saw their cattle ready to die for want of food and water. They lived to see their children crying from hunger, and they became beggars of bread in a strange land. It seems that if even a Hebrew opposes a Hebrew he must suffer.

Joseph went into Egypt as a slave and became a virtual king. The Egyptians were kind to Joseph, the son of Abraham, and God was kind to them. They raised Joseph from the position of trust to another, and God blessed Egypt and prospered her every step. Joseph being treated well the kingdom was saved from the awful famine. Through Joseph, God showed Egypt the coming years of plenty and marked out the dates of the famine. The Egyptians treated the Hebrews well and God saved them both. When this Pharaoh died there arose another king who knew not Joseph. Then the Hebrews were put in cruel bondage. Then it was that Joseph no longer ruled. There was another king who knew not Joseph, and that was the turning point in the history of Egypt. From that day until now Egypt has scarcely seen a prosperous period of seven years. And in recent years Egypt has come under a foreign yoke and has seen a foreign people carrying away the embalmed bodies of her ancestors to make fertilizer for foreign soil. The promise was true in Egypt, "I will bless them that bless thee, and curse them that curseth thee; and in thee shall all families of the earth be blessed."

The Assyrian power under Sennacherib oppressed the people of God. They smote the land and destroyed cities and came up to Jerusalem. They intimidated the Jews, offered at the rulers, made fun of Jerusalem and laughed at Jehovah. But they entered the city. Sennacherib left and went back to Nineveh. Second Kings says in the nineteenth chapter that while he was worshipping the house of his god, Nisroch, two of his sons slew him with the sword. Assyrian history says that Sennacherib's death came while he was on his third campaign to Egypt. Second Kings says, "Esarhaddon, his son, signed in his stead." Assyrian history says that he requested that one son should reign at the home throne and another with some lordship should rule over the conquered ground of Babylon. Now, history says, at after twenty years these two sons became engaged in war, and while the home throne won the cause, it was greatly impaired and received a blow that gave it a downward turn, ending in its ruin. "I will curse him that curseth thee," it was spoken by Jehovah. As a wave of the sea rises upon the beach, Babylon arose as a world power. Babylon conquered people, gathered wealth, gained bound and won battles until she enslaved the Jews, and after that she lasted only seventy years and Cyrus came for her. She brought Jews to Babylon as slaves and saw them send them away rich. She laughed at them as they wept under her willow trees, and uttered them by saying, "Sing us one of the songs of Zion." And they saw a man friendly to the Jews sprinkling the blood of Babylon on the ground. "I will bless them that bless thee, and curse him that curseth thee," said Babylon found it so. It was spoken by Jehovah.

Forty years after the death of Jesus, Jerusalem was destroyed by the Romans. The Jews collected themselves and their provisions in Jerusalem. The siege lasted for months. While Jewish men stood on the walls fighting the enemy without, the wives in the streets of the city were exchanging babies and eating them, that they might hold out the siege a little longer. Jerusalem was doomed and fell into the hands of the Romans. Hundreds of thousands of Jews were butchered without mercy, and the others were scattered to the four ends of the earth. But what of Rome? It was only a few years until the dust in the streets of Rome was moistened with Latin blood, and Rome was buried in the grave that she was digging for herself when Roman soldiers crucified the King of the Jews at the place of the skull. She was covered in the grave that she finished when Titus pulled the last brick from Jerusalem.

In the thirteenth century the Jews in England were lying at the mercy of the natives. They were maltreated, given no voice in legislation, and getting no justice in courts of law. Finally, in 1290, they were driven from the shores by the actions of an infuriated mob. But what of England? Seven years later she saw Edward II. come to her throne—a man whose credit was not good. At twenty-four years after the expulsion of the Jews England lost in the great battle of Bannockburn, and a little later Parliament deposed the king and he was soon assassinated. "I will curse him that curseth thee."

For centuries England has been a peaceful home for the remnant of God's race; and where is there a nation upon which Providence has bestowed more fortune? There Jews are protected by the laws of the land as other citizens, and where is a better governed nation? England does no violence now to the Jews, and who does violence to England?

The most melancholy hour of modern Jewish history was probably in 1492, when a decree came from the Crown of Spain bringing down steel and fire upon all non-Christians and Jews. As astrologers, astrologers, teachers and philosophers, they had worked prominently in making Spain in what she then was. And while the doors of most nations were closed against them, they suffered terrestrial hell. Some went to Portugal, where children were torn from their mother's breast, and enslaved to Gentiles. We said the Jews worked prominently in making Spain what she then was. And Spain was great. Spain was rich—a monarch on land and a mistress of the sea. In 1492 she laid claim to one-half the world in a single day. But that was the year that the Crown sent out a decree against the Jews. That was the decade when Spain started down the ladder of fame, down the hill of fortune, down the road of poverty, blood and ruin. Bit by bit her land was gone: dollar by dollar her money has been spent. Little by little her soil has grown poor; drop by drop her life blood has been drawn. But the Jews lived to see her fleet go down at Manila, and her navy drowned at Santiago. "I will curse him that curseth thee."

From the first this country has been friendly to the Jews. They live here freely, dwell quietly, and are esteemed as citizens, and what nation has God treated better than our own? When did we have a famine? Our droughts have been of short duration. When have we had a great storm? Our storms have all been local. When have we lost a war? That one in 1812 was indecisive. May the time never come when this country shall raise her hand to smite the Hebrews. He who smites God's people, him will God smite, for he has said, "I will bless them that bless thee, and curse him that curseth thee."

Gentlemen, you may stop building fences and begin to use your can fruit, your may mortgage your home and turn in your insurance policy for its face value. You may hunt up your sackcloth and sit down in ashes if ever you see this country shedding Jewish blood. If you live to see this country doing violence to the Jews, you may close your store and get a spade, for it is time to dig a grave for this nation. Jehovah is yet the lover of that people, and vengeance still belongs to him, and he says, "I will bless them that bless thee, and curse them that curseth thee."

Now what of Russia? If the Almighty God does not some time curse Russia with a mighty curse, then two things are true: History does not repeat itself. And I am not right in my mind on the promises of God to Israel.

We have a way of taking all the good promises to Israel and claiming them as being made to the spiritual Israel or to the Church. And we take all the threats and curses for Israel and apply them to the real Jew. If the Church takes the blessing promised to Israel, then tell me into whose back yard we shall dump the curses pronounced upon Israel?

But there has been many secondary ways in which they have been a blessing. What was Joseph to Egypt when he saved a whole nation in a seven years' famine, and with it the Church of God from starvation? They were a blessing in Babylon. They were a blessing to Spain, and have been to the United States and to England.

These people are the salt of the earth, the light of the world, the progenitors of all that is elevating in civilization. In business they have bridged the way to financial glory. They teach business, exemplify economy, practice industry and abolish pauperism.

Jewish laws have been copied by the senators, their legislation modeled by the world, and their rules of equity are chosen of men. The constitution adopted by them at Mount Sinai, thirty-four hundred years ago, contained the fundamentals of ours drafted at Philadelphia thirty-three hundred years afterwards. They came to fill our empty treasury in the dark days of our own revolution. History testifies that they largely fought the battles, built the cities, and founded the schools of the South American continent. They did more than their part in constituting that army which vindicated the equity of the Monroe doctrine by bringing Spain to her senses and liberating the Cuban people.

Where the Bible is not read there is no light, no justice, no morality, for in it the way of earthly happiness, the pictures of a reward to follow, and the penalty for sin are fully drawn. It is the inheritance of the Jew broken up among us.

The two pillars standing beneath the social and moral world are the Sabbath and marriage. They stand upon the earth reaching into heaven, and upon their summits are resting the destinies of men. They are the bulwarks of home, society, Church and State. For the preservation of them both we are largely indebted to the Jew. Have they not been a blessing to all families of the earth!

To-day woman is chained and libertined in every corner of the earth where the synagogue makes no shadow. By every Gentile tribe which has ever existed she has been fettered in shame until the dawn of Jewish influence, when the cords of slavery and bonds of servitude melted away, and Israel came to reveal her virtues and purity. They teach us laws of health. The average age of a Jew is said to be ten years more than that of a Gentile. The Black Death which carried off a quarter of Europe's inhabitants, left the Jewish homes almost entirely untouched.

Not many years have passed since the peace of three worlds was hanging upon the Jewish Prime Minister of England. It was not long ago that an English Jew absolutely leased the ancient Persian Empire. The Rothschild family has arisen from a German Jew, which family now holds possibly more financial power than did ever the line of Pharaohs or dynasty of the Cæsars.

Shall we forget Hirsch, Montefiore, or Beaconsfield, for years the virtual ruler of England? Shall we not mention Mendelssohn, who was in his age the world's musician? Shall we not speak of Judah Benjamin, who was loved by the Confederate States, and afterwards became famous in the English courts?

They have been a blessing, for they have devised for us laws to elevate, politics to raise, morals to purify, and a religion to save. Their potency is felt, their latent power immeasurable, and their destiny unseen.

The proudest, the purest, the most holy race which has ever blessed the earth, has been that of the Jews; and to their father, God gave the promise: "I will bless them that bless thee, and curse him that curseth thee; and in thee all families of the earth shall be blessed."

—A CONVENTION of Syrian preachers and teachers was recently held at Beirut, when it was decided to speedily introduce Christian books and tracts generally throughout Syria.

—MISSIONARY JOHN PATON, the veteran founder of the New Hebrides mission, writes that he is just starting on an eight months tour among his island converts at Anewan. The whole population, once cannibals, is now Christian, and living quiet and orderly Christian lives.

—REV. A. E. BISHOP, of the Central American Mission, Guatemala City, writes that a Guatemalan dollar is worth but five or six cents American, so that a fifty-cent book costs a native about ten dollars of his hard-earned money.

—MISS ELIZABETH CLARKE, of Boston, a missionary at Samokov, Bulgaria, sometime ago opened a mission kindergarten at Sofia, the capital, which is doing excellent work. Miss Clarke is arranging to erect a building to accommodate this growing work. Those interested should address Secretary Wiggins, A. B. C. F. M., Boston, who will reply to inquirers.

August Delights at Mont-Lawn

UNLESS one is familiar with conditions in which many of the children of the very poor live in New York City, some of the stories the little ones tell would seem almost beyond belief. No wonder many of them are so thin, pale and so stunted in size.

When the steamer Chrystenah starts upon her trip up the river, it carries a motley throng of little folks. They are a joyous lot, and very happy at the prospect of ten whole days and nights at Mont-Lawn. Some of the children have been there before, and it is laughable to see the air of superiority with which a boy or girl who has made the trip before imparts instruction and knowledge to the less fortunate one, who is beginning his first vacation. The veterans call the newcomers, "Spring Chickens," which is taken in good part by those, who, in a few days, will greet the fresh arrivals with the same air of importance, and of having been a long time at Mont-Lawn. Sometimes the stories the children tell—not without questioning, however—are very pathetic, as the following incidents will show.

One of the teachers, while holding a crowd of children in line before getting on the boat, and trying to keep the attention of two or three of the most mischievous by talking to them, asked one who had some pennies in his hand, what he was going to do with them. He said: "Buy some candy."

She then turning to another little boy, asked him what he was going to do with his. The child replied that he had none. The teacher asked if he was saving his money, and the boy said: "I don't have any pennies, 'cause we are too poor, and if I do get any, I always give them right to my mother, if it's only a cent."

This child had had no breakfast or dinner before starting, and had had only bread and water the night before. He said sometimes that they had some tea with their bread, but "not much, only once in a while."

The father, who is an electrician, had met with an accident, and had both hands taken off, and the mother was sick in the hospital. They had a grandmother and grandfather, but they were too old to do anything, and an older sister of eleven, who had been trying to get something to do. The grandfather and grandmother had had nothing to eat for two days. They had sent out one of the little boys the day before to get a few pennies, but no one would give him anything. He only succeeded in getting one penny.

The teacher said she would give him some pennies, but he said: "I will have to send them home to my mother."

Some one had given the little fellow three cents, but he had run back and given them to his grandmother. "Cause there is no one working," he said, "And I have to give her everything I get."

Many pleasant letters are being received by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, regarding the work at the Children's Home at Mont-Lawn. These communications show a heartfelt interest in this labor of love. Mrs. Adelia S., of La Grange, Ind., writes:

Please accept in Jesus' name three dollars, for the most forlorn waif you can find, for the ten days' outing at Mont-Lawn. My prayer is, that with God's blessing many may be brought to realize the beauties of a pure, noble, Christian life, through the influence of the Home.

Another friend, in Kansas, sends five dollars, saying:

I trust the lessons taught the children while there will be so impressed upon their youthful minds by the Holy Spirit, that they may take root downward and bear fruit upward to the praise and glory of God, the Father.

Mr. John S., of San Francisco, writes:

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has afforded me an opportunity of doing some good to those who are not so well circumstanced as I, by showing me that there are so many children in New York in the condition in which you picture them. The six dollars which I enclose, is just a partial return to God, of that which he has bestowed upon me.

Dr. O. W. J., of Richmond, Va., encloses six dollars:

To be used to give two needy children ten days' joy at Mont-Lawn. The blessings of our dear Lord go with this little gift. I am an invalid and a great sufferer, but I wish to do what little I can to help bring the light of eternal life into these little lives. Whatever we do we must do now, as we pass this way but once.

Mrs. Margaret L., of Poughkeepsie, N. Y., sends three dollars. She writes:

A few young women are willing to contribute their mite toward bringing sunshine into some child's life. I pray God will touch the hearts of many who have enough and to spare, that they may send many children to enjoy the sweet country air and the beauties of nature, suggestive of the summer-time of life. As the young women's representative, I enclose three dollars for one child.

God's Heroes

HEROES have never been lacking in the cause of God in any age of the world. There have been times of darkness, when the whole world seemed to be given over to the dominion of evil, but in no time has God been without a witness. Moses, Joshua, Samuel, Elijah, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Daniel, Ezra, John, the Baptist, Paul, and in later times, Luther, Knox, Savonarola, Wycliffe, and a host of others, have dared to declare themselves on the side of righteousness, against overwhelming adversaries. Their names have been crowned with honor and have gone down in history with a lustre which can never fade. Men have only to look into their own hearts, to discover the reason why such men are honored. We know whether we are equal to such a task as they undertook. There is in most men a shrinking from a stand, in which not only strangers, but those near and dear hold aloof. It is the solitariness of such a stand that chills the heart and robs a man of courage.

Yet are such men really alone? When Elisha prayed for his timid servant, a host of angelic protectors was revealed. So it has ever been with the valiant representatives of God. Angels they may not have seen, but they "endured as seeing him who is invisible." God does not always interpose to save them from suffering and death. If he did, there would be no merit in their championship. They knew that they might have to undergo torture and to lay down their lives in the struggle, and with that knowledge they took their position, determined to be faithful unto death. The records of the martyrs show that they received divine support in the conflict. Like Stephen, they saw in the hour of their death a vision which sustained them in their suffering, and turned their apparent defeat into a triumph.

*Topic of the Christian Endeavor Society, Epworth League, and Baptist Young People's Union or Aug. 21. Rom. 8: 31-39.

If God be for us. One of the most thrilling scenes in history is that of Luther standing before the Emperor and the assembly of princes at the Diet of Worms. Huss had been burned in spite of his safe conduct, and there were men in that Diet capable of treating Luther in the same way. They had been assured that there was no sin in breaking faith with a heretic. Yet, there stood the poor monk alone, declaring simply that he could do no other, and would not retract. Happily for him and for Germany, he was snatched from their power and was permitted to complete his work.

It is God that justifieth. Knox was another heroic soul. He was blamed for the harshness with which he treated his beautiful Queen. But there was no other way of treating Mary, unless Scotland was to be betrayed. Better that one woman's heart should be wrung and one woman's tears be shed than that a whole country should be sold to the Pope. Mary was amazed at the bold front of the man. Her nobles ridiculed and scorned him, but Knox never quailed. His conscience told him that God justified him, and in the end he was vindicated, though in the galleys and in many a crisis death came very near to him.

Distress or persecution. A great writer describes a scene in the dormitory of a famous school. A new boy was there and had undressed. Some twenty big boys were laughing and talking and romping, when the new boy knelt down by the side of his bed to pray. There was instant silence as of wonder. Then a laugh at the "Young Christian" and a shoe was thrown at him. The new boy, girlish as he looked, had courage which none of the older boys possessed. He found a champion who protected him, and soon, other boys, encouraged by his example, did as he did.

More than conquerors. The story is told of a young man, who, in the days of the Civil War, was the only one of his set who did not volunteer. People looked askance at him as a cowardly citizen, and even the girl he loved turned from him with something like contempt. Yet the young man had good reason for not going, and showed more moral courage than some who were in the ranks. The time came when in the draft riots in New York it was put to proof. When a certain house was surrounded by a howling mob, who insisted on the colored servants being brought out to them, and were threatening to smash in the doors, this young man who had been taunted with cowardice, opened the door, stepped out on the stoop, closing the door behind him and there stood alone, declaring that not one of the men or women within should be given up. It was a deed of daring all the greater, because he stood solitary against hundreds, and not a soul was there to give him support.

Called Higher

Frances V. Lucas, daughter of Johanna and Francis was born in Coles county, Ill., Dec. 12, 1836, and died in Fisher county, Tex., July 15, 1904. On June 25, 1868, in Davis county, Iowa, Frances V. Lucas and Hamilton Foster were married. To this union were born nine children—five boys and four girls, of whom eight remain to mourn their mother's death. At the age of fourteen, sister Foster was happily converted, and joined the Methodist Episcopal Church, and ever lived faithful to God. She was steadfast in religion, and a great blessing wherever she went. Her husband says of her, "She was the most perfect Christian I ever knew."

At her old home in Person county, N. C., on June 14, 1904, Mrs. Adelia Overby entered the Christian rest. She was seventy-eight years and eleven months of age. She had been a Christian for more than fifty years. She was one of the faithful members of Virgilina Baptist Church for many years. Her life was beautiful and a benediction to others. She was ever willing and ready to do what she could to advance the cause of Christ. In all her afflictions, which were many, she never murmured or complained, but was humble and submissive to the divine will.

GOT IT

Got Something Else, Too.

"I liked my coffee strong and I drank it strong" says a Penna. woman, telling a good story, "and although I had headaches nearly every day I just wouldn't believe there was any connection between the two. I had weak and heavy spells and palpitation of the heart, too, and though husband told me he thought it was coffee that made me so poorly, I did not drink it himself for he said it did not agree with him, yet I loved my coffee and thought I just couldn't do without."

"One day a friend called at my home that was a year ago. I spoke about how well she was looking and she said:

"Yes and I feel well, too. It's because I am drinking Postum in place of ordinary coffee."

"I said, what is Postum?"

"Then she told me how it was a food drink and how much better she felt since using it in place of coffee or tea, so I went to the store and bought a package when it was made according to directions it was so good I have never bought a pound of coffee since. I began to prove immediately."

"I cannot begin to tell you how much better I feel since using Postum in place of leaving coffee alone. My health is better than it has been for years and I can say enough in praise of this delicious food drink." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Take away the destroyer and put a builder to work and Nature will do the rest. That's what you do when Postum takes coffee's place in your diet. There's a reason."

The Mission Organ

DEEP, deep, the organ tones,
Deep, deep as the grave,
Floating out on the midnight air,
Stealing forth on the pave;
Low, low, they tell of love,
Boundless as ocean's wave.

Sweet, sweet, as a mother's song,
Pure, pure as her love,
Out on the night from the mission door,
A voice from Heaven above, Pleads from the depths of the organ's soul,
The hearts of men to move.

Down, down, in the reek of sin,
Where tides of misery flowed,
Where hopeless lives in anguish reaped
The harvest folly sowed,
The Master looked with pitying eyes,
His heart with mercy glowed.

Light, light, is the magic touch,
On each responsive key,
Hope softly speaks to weary men,
Who cry on bended knee,
"Lord, Lord, to thee I come,
Be merciful to me."

Loud, loud, peals a glad refrain,
The voice of the organ sings,
And to each penitent heart bowed low,
In trumpet-tones it rings,
While the Father, 'round each contrite soul
A mantle of pardon flings.

Mute and pulseless lie the keys,
Awaiting the loving hands
That nevermore their touch will feel—
Silent the organ stands.
His Father spoke—the player heard,
And bowed to God's commands.

MARY SARGENT HOPKINS.

How Prayer Brought Protection

Mrs. L. G. P. Bakersfield, Vt. A little over year ago, my son was in Australia. He was companion to a young man for whose health long sea voyage had been prescribed. They went in a sailing vessel. They sailed from Boston, May 11, 1902, and after a short stop at Buenos Ayres, they sailed to Australia by way of Cape of Good Hope, and had a rough, perilous voyage. Constantly my heart was going up to God in prayer in their behalf. One night I seemed to see Jesus walking about that vessel, as in pictures I have seen him walking on the sea of Galilee, and he placed his hand on it, and commanded the vessel to ride safely through rough wind and wave, free of reef or hidden rocks, until it reached its destined haven. When I fell asleep like a tired child, trusting in my Saviour. The first letter which came from my son, written during the voyage, said: "A strange thing happened when we were off the jagged rocks of Cape Horn. Down in this open region of icebergs and blizzards, the wind had been sweeping towards the rocks in such a threatening way, that for several nights the captain said to us: 'You had better not undress, for if anything should happen so that we have to take to the boats, you wouldn't have time to dress.' Beside the decks, we were in imminent danger of being washed up against icebergs. But the wind suddenly calmed down at this point dreaded by all the navigators, and we had the most delightful day we have had since we sailed. It was soft and balmy like a spring morning at home." Now, that beautiful calm day—the day of my visit—I claim as my token from the Lord that our prayers were heard, for at was the locality that always seemed to come up in my mind when praying. Your correspondent, C. A. T., was right in thinking, whatever is to be obtained in this life is altogether due to our own exertions," only with the whatever somewhat modified by divine providence. And, as in the material world so in the spiritual, our own exertions must be made. The pearl of great price is to be found in the Word, but only by the diligent seeker.

Tested on Carmel

By MRS. M. BAXTER

ISRAEL failed, when God, through his prophet, put to them the question: "How long halt ye between two opinions? If the Lord be God, follow him; but if Baal, then follow him" (I. Kings 18:21). Not one of them stood out on the Lord's side as Joshua had done at Shechem, when he said to the people, "As for me and my house, we will serve the Lord" (Josh. 24:15). Baal was proved to be a false God, but how should Jehovah be proved to be true, when not one man of his chosen nation, save Elijah, dared to brook the wrath of Ahab, and the unpopularity involved in bearing witness to the true and living God? Had Elijah gone through a less intense school, had he not been shut up to God for those three years and a half, had he not seen the dead raised for the first time in the history of man—he might not have been fitted for this supreme moment. It is alone with God that battles are fought against the powers of darkness. The God whom the prophet had proved in his contest with death itself, over the widow's son, would not fail him now.

Elijah had learned how to wait God's time; he let the foolish prophets go on, hour after hour, with their senseless appeals to a god who was not, until the evening drew near; and then he who had come near to the people, called them, now that they were disillusioned, to come near to him. As he had taken command of the king, he now takes command of the people; and they obeyed. In the presence of king and priests, false prophets and people, he "repaired the altar of the Lord, which was broken down." He took twelve stones, for every tribe must have its representative stone, and thus repaired the altar, building it in the name of his God and Israel's. How the people must have watched him! What searching of heart, what shame and remorse, must have possessed them, as they saw once again an altar reared to Jehovah, the God of Abraham and of their fathers! But what is he doing now, as he digs a trench about the altar, sufficient to contain two measures of seed? And as he puts the wood in order, and cuts the bullock in pieces, and lays him on the wood, and says, "Fill four barrels with water, and pour it on the burnt sacrifice, and on the wood." What was this? Was it not fanaticism to make it as difficult as possible, indeed almost impossible, for fire to kindle on the altar? Was not this fool-hardiness? Might it not be considered tempting God? The event will show.

But the prophet did not stop there. He said, "Do it the second time. And they did it the second time. And he said, do it the third time. And they did it the third time. And the water ran round about the altar; and he filled the trench also with water." And now we get the clue to this strange proceeding: "And it came to pass, at the time of the offering of the evening sacrifice, that Elijah the prophet came near, and said, Lord God of Abraham, Isaac, and of Israel, let it be known this day that thou art God in Israel, and that I am thy servant, and that I have done all these things at thy Word." This explains all. God had told Elijah how long to wait; God had told him to prepare the altar and the sacrifice. God had told him to dig the trench and to pour water over the sacrifice three times; and God is responsible for all which he commands. A prophet fears nothing which is done in obedience to God; he only fears to disobey.

Pastor Stockmayer, in his little book, At God's Disposal, says regarding this: "Here lay the secret of the prophet's power, and the victory at Carmel; all had been done at the Word of the Lord. We cannot compel the powers of darkness to come before us that we may fight the Lord's battles, and plead the cause of God; we should be crushed by them. We cannot provoke scenes like this on Carmel. The instrument must be prepared, everything must be ordered, all must be done at God's bidding, in his hour, in his way, and in his spirit. The instrument must be so sanctified that he will not move either finger or tongue save at the bidding of the Lord. Otherwise there will be failure, and the powers of darkness will triumph over the efforts of the Church."

ANSWERED PRAYERS

Reader, Fall River, Mass. "I want to acknowledge God's great goodness to me in answering my prayers at all times. I have never found him to fail me in time of great trouble. What a mercy that we have him upon whom to lean for help and strength."

Old Subscriber, Pittsburg, Pa. "I always look for answered prayer column first. I add my testimony here. God has heard my prayer and brought back a wayward child. Praise his holy name."

V. M. J. "I am trusting in the promises of Christ, my Saviour, to remove the whole burden or he will give me strength to conquer. 'Cast thy burden on the Lord and he will sustain thee.' Sometimes I have prayed and the answer has been so direct that I can not doubt. Work and do all you can, then pray and trust God for the rest."

Mrs. G. E. H., Amherst, N.H. "I have always been much interested in the list of answered prayers and wish to add my testimony to that of others, of a prayer hearing and answering God. I know he has answered my petitions many times."

E. C. "I wish to bear testimony to 'tangible' answers to prayer. I have received for myself and family a most remarkable answer to prayer, and in the midst of a great sorrow we have received this blessing and grace and strength to bear."

Mrs. A. E., Salt Lake City. "I want to add my name to the list, as I have had my prayers answered a great many times, and I know when we trust God and believe he is able to answer our prayers."

Mrs. S. L. T., Tenn. "I want to acknowledge the goodness and faithfulness of my Heavenly Father in answering prayer. He has answered many for me in behalf of my dear children. I will still trust him. Praise his holy name."

Mrs. E. E., Huntsville, Ala. "I took my troubles to the Lord in prayer. I prayed most fervently. My burden was lifted. I feel now my Saviour heard and answered my prayer. I thank God most heartily, and will do all I can for his cause. Trust and don't give up. He will surely help us."

L. A. J., Hayesville, Ia. "I wish to acknowledge God's goodness to me in answer to prayer. I had long been praying for the conversion of my husband. The Lord heard me and gloriously converted his soul."

P., Portland, Me. "I had a difficulty to meet, and I prayed for God's help, promising that if I was helped I would so state among the Answered Prayers. We sometimes think we are not helped out of troubles by prayer, but we are if we only have faith. The help came in answer to prayer."

G. T. "I know that God answers the prayer of faith. Being encouraged by those who have testified, I took my trouble to him. He heard, and I am well. Praise his holy name."

Della K., Amarillo, Texas. "If you keep his Commandments, read his Word, and continue in prayer, ye shall ask what you will and it shall be done unto you." He answered a prayer for me that was impossible with man; but praise his name there is nothing impossible with God."

THE LAST SURVIVORS OF A FAMILY FAMOUS FOR ITS LONGEVITY

Mrs. J. B. Thomas and her sister, Mrs. L. J. Schell, of Terre Haute, Ind., are the last living representatives of a family famous for longevity. This picture was taken recently at the home of the old ladies. Mrs. Thomas is eighty-three, and her sister eighty-six. Their mother was Miss Elizabeth Gower, who lived to be ninety-three years of age, and was a native of Philadelphia.

OLD FASHIONED

But Still in the Fashion.

It is an ever new and interesting story to hear how one can be entirely made over by change of food.

"For two years I was troubled with what my physician said was the old fashioned dyspepsia.

"There was nothing I could eat but 20 or 30 minutes later I would be spitting my food up in quantities until I would be very faint and weak. This went on from day to day until I was terribly wasted away and without any prospects of being helped.

"One day I was advised by an old lady to try Grape-Nuts and cream leaving off all fatty food. I had no confidence that Grape-Nuts would do all she said for me as I had tried so many things without any help. But it was so simple I thought I would give it a trial she insisted so.

"Well I ate some for breakfast and pretty soon the lady called to see her 'patient' as she called me and asked if I had tried her advice.

"Glad you did child, do you feel some better?"

"No," I said, "I do not know as I do, the only difference I can see is I have no sour stomach and come to think of it I haven't spit up your four teaspoons of Grape-Nuts yet."

"Nor did I ever have any trouble with Grape-Nuts then or any other time for this food always stays down and my stomach digests it perfectly; I soon got strong and well again and bless that old lady every time I see her.

"Once an invalid of 98 pounds I now weigh 125 pounds and feel strong and well and it is due entirely and only to having found the proper food in Grape-Nuts." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Questions & Answers

1. Under what circumstances did Missionary Stevens lose his life in Mexico, some twenty years ago? 2. What action did the United States take in regard to his martyrdom?

1. Mr. Stevens, the first missionary of the American Board in Mexico, was killed by a mob at Almaluco, in 1874. One of his first converts shared his martyr's crown. The Board has now a strong mission with many workers, a number of churches and large congregations. 2. On Nov. 6, 1875, a letter was received by the Foreign Secretary of the Board, from the Department of State at Washington, which had brought strong pressure to bear upon the Mexican Government. This letter stated that five persons had been executed, in compliance with the sentence which condemned them to capital punishment, for the murder of Mr. Stevens.

S. A. K., Helena, O. You refer to the kingdoms of Israel and Judah; were they not one kingdom?

They were one kingdom under Saul. There was a division for a short time after his death (see I. Kings 2: 11). They were united under David and Solomon, but divided on the accession of Rehoboam, son and successor of Solomon (see I. Kings 12: 1-23). Judah and Benjamin remained faithful to the House of David, but the other ten tribes seceded and made Jeroboam king, and were known as Israel.

Regarding the Problem of the Poor, this letter comes from a reader in Evansville, Ind.:

Every one knows that the problem of the poor is to gain enough to eat. Their ambition is necessarily pulled down almost to that and nothing more, except for their children, whom they hope to educate and prepare for better things. I certainly speak with confidence when I say the trouble is not drink, not land options, not buying on instalments, but the cruel fact that men are not all employed enough of the time to properly support themselves and those who are and should be dependent upon them. There is enough willing labor going to waste in this country to make it blossom as the rose, yet we hear about the waste of everything but that. Yet our leading men can find no remedy but to do something for foreign lands in the way of commerce. Until our land is a paradise, there is no excuse for helpless poverty, and the conditions to-day are a disgrace to humanity. There should be a way provided somehow so that the poor man thrown out of work to-day, would be sure of work to-morrow at living wages. When he loses a day from useful employment it is a loss to the public.

N. O. S.

R. R. D., Cortland, Ind. Are two definite works of grace necessary to salvation? A preacher here contends that a second blessing is to be expected, and no one can be saved without it.

You have probably misunderstood the preacher. The sanctification which follows justification is the blessing he doubtless refers to. When a man believes on Christ, he is justified and becomes a child of God. His salvation is assured from that time; but he has to be made holy, to be trained and disciplined and made fit for the Master's service. This blessing does not always come at once, but is often a process continuing through life.

Reader, Mulberry, Kans. Of how many warships, cruisers, torpedo boats and torpedo boat destroyers, is the United States navy composed? Does the United States Navy possess any submarine boats?

The United States has in commission, or under construction, 24 battleships, 10 armored cruisers, 27 unarmored steel vessels, 38 torpedo boats, 16 torpedo boat destroyers, and 8 submarine vessels.

J. M. J., Cedar Falls, Ia. 1. How many people have been massacred and suffered bodily injury and loss of property in Russia, on account of their religious belief, in the last quarter of a century? 2. Have not life, liberty, property and the pursuit of happiness been secure in Japan during the last quarter of a century? 3. Is not a nation to be judged by its fruit the same as an individual, to determine whether it is, or is not conforming to the Christian religion? 4. Have not some of the prominent citizens and many of the common people of Japan declared their preference for the Christian religion?

1. No accurate statistics available, but the total, including Jews, Stundists, Zemstovs, and others, must run well up into the thousands. 2. Reasonably so. There were occasional periods of opposition to Christianity during the years following the revolution of 1868, but since that time the missionaries have made remarkable progress. 3. Yes. The attitude of a nation may, however, be the reverse of that of many individuals in that nation. Japan has been growing more and more tolerant of the new religion. 4. A considerable number of high-class Japanese are among the converts. Some of the leading generals and admirals in the present war are said to be Christians. The same can now be said of a few, at least, of the leading educators. The Christian census of Japan in 1903 was 42,400 communicants.

D. M. P., Norfolk, Va. Pushkin, Nekrasoff, Derzhavin, Lermontoff, Dimitrieff, and others, are well-known to students of Russian poetry. Write to Scribner's, New York, for translations.

R. J. M., Detroit, Tex. I am in doubt as to my duty in tithing. I had to sell some stock to pay expenses of illness and funeral. Ought I to give a tenth of the proceeds?

Do not needlessly distress yourself about the law of the tithe. The Christian is left free in that matter. If his heart is right, he will give freely, and will not worry about exact divisions. He will probably give more than a tenth, but will not follow the old Pharisaic system. In the case you mention, scientists, writers, and philosophers to convey a clear impression to human minds; but it is simply to be regarded as literary license, and nothing more.

W. A. W., Central City, Ia. In Sunday School we are being asked questions about Jeroboam and other kings. Would not teachers be better employed trying to save the souls of their pupils?

The teachers are following the course of lessons selected for them by the Lesson Committee. A wise teacher will try to draw from an Old Testament subject, lessons that will be of use to his pupils in the present day. People act in our times on the principles that proved so fatal to Jeroboam, and it is well that children should be warned against them. Human nature continues the same from age to age, and if the teacher shows how an ancient king offended God and was punished, he may make the incident a warning that may lead to the salvation of souls.

J. S., Paterson, N. J. Has the experiment of a Y. M. C. A. Health Farm for consumptives in Colorado proved a success or otherwise? What are the facts? What is the cost of a tent?

It has proved a remarkable success. Mr. Danner, the superintendent, informs us that there are now forty-two tents occupied; that the total number of patients admitted to the Farm since it opened has been eighty-four, of criminal, the physically defective, the insane and the pauper, as well as the anarchist. The tendency is to make these laws still more rigid. With these precautions, all that the Old World may send, can be readily absorbed by our population without the slightest danger. Ignorance is not a crime, but a misfortune, and here, in a free land, and under better educational auspices, the illiteracy of one generation is wholly overcome in the next generation.

Subscriber, Ocala, Fla. 1. Please tell me the exact date of Robert Raikes' birth. 2. When was the first Sunday School organized? 3. Who shall I address a letter to Margaret E. Sarster?

1. Sept. 14, 1735, Gloucester, England. In Gloucester, 1780. 3. Care of this office.

Minister, Chicago, Ill. A young man in my congregation wishes to join the church. He is all respects eligible, and is, I believe, a converted man; but he does not believe in the miracle of Jonah and the fish. I have argued, I cannot convince him. Ought he to be admitted while rejecting a plain Bible statement?

We would advise you to admit him. Give him all the help you can, in his endeavor to lead a Christian life, and let him aid you in your church work. We know that belief in this particular miracle is often treated as a test question, but it is not so good a one whether a person loves Christ, and is trusting in him, and is making the law of Christ the rule of his life. To insist on his accepting a statement that he does not believe, as a condition of his admission, may do him a serious injury and deprive you of a valuable work

CHRIST AT BETHANY

THIS beautiful picture, which once graced a cover of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, is now offered in enlarged form to a limited number of our readers at a greatly reduced price, with a view to making it available to Sunday School teachers for distribution among their class members.

With deep thankfulness, the Christian reads the brief references to the Bethany Home that are given in the Gospels. It is a relief to know that our Lord and Saviour did find at least one home in which he was a welcome and honored guest. This picture relates to the first of the visits of which there is a record in the Bible. (Luke 10: 38-42.)

The demand for the picture, when we originally placed it upon the market, was so great that nearly the whole of the first large edition was disposed of almost immediately, at 25 cents for each and every copy.

The lot which we now offer is the balance then unsold, and at the price mentioned below they are a veritable bargain. Sent out in tubes, with undamaged delivery guaranteed, we are offering them in lots of six for only 25 cents. No less than six will be sold to any one customer; that is, we are offering a half-dozen pictures at the same price at which we formerly sold them singly.

If you wish to succeed in securing one or more packages of six at 25 cents per package, order to-day, as it is needless to say such a bargain will not go begging. Please bear in mind that we fully prepay postage. Also remember that each picture is 14x18 inches, lithographed in 10 colors and gold, and printed on plate paper 17x21 inches, especially adapted for framing.

Reader, Pemberton, Pa. Will any length of courtship compel a man, by law, to support a girl, if he has never promised to marry her?

No. A promise, or an implied promise of marriage must have been made, in order to afford basis for an action for support.

W. F. L., Fair Grove, Mo. 1. Did all the ferocious animals dwell peaceably together, and feed on vegetation before the fall of Adam? 2. Is anthropomorphism taught in the Bible?

1. There is nothing on the subject beyond what the Scriptures give in Genesis 1: 28-31, which affords reasonable ground for the inference that all the living creatures were in peaceful subjection to man, and were at peace among themselves before sin and violence entered the world. 2. It is nowhere taught, or even suggested, in the Bible. The anthropomorphites, a sect of ancient heretics, held the belief that God had a human shape and talked in human tones, because they fell into the error of interpreting the Bible in a literal sense. The Mormons are the only anthropomorphites to-day. The ascription of human attributes to Deity was the natural result of the limitations of human thought and speech, and this method has often been employed by

PREPARING THE SERUM

CULTURE-PREPARATION IN THE LABORATORY

DRAWING THE SERUM

TO SAVE THE LITTLE CHILDREN

A New Serum Said to Have Been Discovered, which Neutralizes the Most Dreaded Scourge of Infancy

WHEN it was announced, sometime ago, that John D. Rockefeller, the richest man in America, if not in the world, almost heart-broken by the death of his little grandson and named after that dreaded scourge of childhood, cholera infantum, had offered a reward of one hundred thousand dollars to anyone who would discover a specific that would successfully combat this disease, the medical fraternity and scientists generally were deeply interested. It is estimated by the health authorities of the leading cities that seventy per cent of the deaths among children of five years and under are due directly to this disease, which sweeps through the land in the summer months with the virulence of a plague. So universal have been the sorrow and the heart-suffering from this disease, that it may be truthfully said, in the language of Longfellow:

There is no flock, however watched and tended,

But one dead lamb is there.

In all the great cities, and especially New York, Philadelphia, Boston, Chicago, Cincinnati, and New Orleans, the ravages of this infantile scourge form a very considerable portion of the annual mortality. Yet science, in its praiseworthy efforts to investigate the sources of disease and to avert pain and suffering, has confined its energies largely to adult afflictions, and childhood—weak, tender and helpless—has been comparatively neglected.

Quite recently it was again announced, that Mr. Rockefeller had decided to take a step farther in the direction of stimulating science to the consideration of this great problem of childhood and its sufferings, and that he purposed devoting a million dollars toward the erection of a great institute in New York, which would in fact, be a huge laboratory, covering two city blocks, with the most complete provision that could be devised for pursuing bacteriological investigation. With all the wealth and power at his command, the money king had not yet been able to crowd out of his heart the sorrow he felt over the death of his little grandson. He believed that if a part of his colossal fortune could be employed successfully in combating the great enemy of infancy, and in saving the lives of the little babes, it would bring joy to the hearts of fathers and mothers everywhere. Thus far, no detailed account of his plan has been given to the public.

But while the doctors and bacteriologists on two continents have been stirred up by the new prominence given to this special avenue of scientific inquiry, there were several who had been quietly conducting experiments of their own on purely humanitarian lines and without the slightest hope of pecuniary reward. As a result of these experiments, it is now claimed that a specific for the infantile scourge has been found and is now in use. The following, written especially for this journal by Dr. William H. Lippert, physician in charge of the Edward Martin Pasteurized Milk Laboratory, and consulting surgeon of the Christian Settlement, University of Pennsylvania, describes the discovery and the method of using it:

"A long and careful investigation of the cause of cholera infantum led Professor Simon Flexner, President of the Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research, to decide that the specific cause of the disease was the bacillus dysenteriae. Proceeding with the hypothesis that the particular bacillus, isolated by the Japanese scientist Shiga as responsible for the acute and sub-acute dysentery of the tropics, was the enemy to be attacked, Dr. Flexner directed the H. K. Mulford Company to prepare an anti-dysenteric serum from the blood of horses immunized against this bacillus. The treatment of these horses has extended over a period of nearly three years, and from them a curative serum has been procured, which Dr. Flexner's experiments demonstrate to be of the greatest value in saving infant life.

"The patience required in preparing this agent for the saving of child-life may be imagined, when it is said that it requires from one to two years to completely immunize a horse against the dysentery bacillus. The horse is used in the production of serum for these reasons: He is comparatively free from disease; he enjoys a high degree of natural immunity to dysentery, and he yields a fine quality of serum in considerable quantities."

After describing in technical terms the method of procuring the serum, the writer proceeds:

"During the progress of the experiments that led to the adoption of the anti-dysenteric serum as a curative agent, guinea pigs of a certain weight were injected with small and accurately measured quantities of the serum. It was proven that the serum protected the guinea pig against the dose of bacillus culture previously injected. Stronger doses of serum were found to show distinct protective and curative properties against stronger doses of the bacillus culture. Repeated experiments prove that perfect protection is afforded by subcutaneous injections of the serum of a horse immunized against the bacillus dysenteriae." The writer adds: "It has been found that the earlier the serum is used, the greater the chance for complete immunity against further inroads of the complaint."

"It is reported by Shiga that anti-dysenteric serum is being used in the Japanese army. It is also being prepared for the Russian government to prevent epidemics of dysentery. It is both an immunizing and curative agent."

Let us hope that the new discoveries, which may be ranked with those of Koch and Pasteur in their peculiar fields, may yet prove a boon to humanity, and a means of saving the precious lives of many thousands of children, who would otherwise pass away in infancy.

FUTILE HIDING-PLACES

TEXT — GEN. 3: 8:
"And Adam and his wife hid themselves"

HERE was the Garden of Eden?" is the theme of a never-ending discussion. Some think its site was at the North Pole. The site of the Garden does not, however, concern us so much as the event which took place there. Man was put on his trial in that Garden, and he failed. The consequences of his disobedience have come down to us, for all his descendants have been deprived of the blessings which would have been theirs had he obeyed God. I do not wonder that the sterile region around the North Pole should have seemed to many a fitting scene for the catastrophe. In the course of the ages, it may have been that the glory and fertility of Eden may have been transformed into a region of ice and snow. Many have tried to penetrate it, and have failed.

It seems as if the guardian angel, with her sword, who once stood at the gate of Eden, saying to the first ancestors of the human race, "Thus far shalt thou go and no farther," stands to-day with the same warning message for the children of the twentieth century. Her garments of the white "wings of a dove covered with silver, and her feathers with yellow gold," have been changed for the long flowing robes of spotless snow. She is perhaps the same sentinel, although her wardrobe of springtime has been thickened into the heavy toga of winter. "Thus far shalt thou go and no farther," speaks the forbidding angel to the Franklins, and the Pearys, and the DeLongs, and the Nansens of the present day. The "Dark Continent" of Africa has had its explorers; but so far the "White Continent" of the Arctic has never had its Henry M. Stanley to enter the farthest retreats of the Polar bear and the walrus, and to open up the hermetically-sealed caskets of the mastodons, and the mammalia of the by-gone millenniums.

Where was Eden?

Some think the "Garden of Eden" was fragrant with the flowers of a continent, which once stretched between the Old World and the New. Exploring parties have gone forth, and have claimed that they have located with their sounding-lines the lost Atlantis. They assert that the islands of the New Hebrides are only the highest mountain peaks of that famous continent, which was sunken by tidal wave and engulfed by earthquake. Some claim that the "Garden of Eden" was in Persia; others, that it was watered by the onflowings of the mighty Nile; others, that it was in India; and still others that it was in Central China. But here to-day, in the words of my text, we are not concerned with the site of the "Garden of Eden," but with the conduct of our first parents after they had sinned. No sooner had Adam and his wife eaten of the forbidden fruit, than they hid themselves, as frightened hares hide themselves in the jungles of the forests from the baying hounds. The voice of God calling them to confession of their sin, was a summons to judgment which they would have evaded if they had been able.

Our first parents hid themselves after they had sinned. That is always the impulse of the conscious sinner. He shrinks from meeting the God whom he has offended. A famous writer once declared, "The sins of the Garden of Eden are as old as the dawn of creation; yet, like the rising sun, each day they are ever fresh and have new applications for each changing hour." The theological terms supralapsarianism, and infralapsarianism, and sublapsarianism—whether "God's foreordination started before man, or with the fall of man, or after the fall of man"—may offer exciting themes for doctrinal discussion in a young minister's seminary course. They have not, however, any practical interest for an American audience of the present day. What we first want to do is to find out how Adam and Eve sulked away into the Edenic jungles to hide themselves, after they had eaten of the fruit of the "forbidden tree." Then to ask whether living men and women are not now acting in the same way in trying to conceal themselves in similar hiding-places. I want to show them how vain are such attempts at concealment from the omniscient eye of God, and by the help of the Holy Spirit, to woo them from their retreats and lead them to bend in humble contrition at the foot of the Cross. There, there is pardon and cleansing for the sinner, and there may the vilest and most polluted be sprinkled with the blood which will make them whiter than the driven snow.

Modern application the first: We find Adam and Eve hiding away from God in the "Garden of Eden" when we see men and women shunning the faces of those whom they have wronged. We find the satanic retreat of the first Paradise in the skulking feet and the averted gaze and the conspicuous absence of those who, after they have injured a brother, flee his presence even as the prodigal son when he desired to do wrong, planned to take his goods and leave his father's house and go into the far country where he would not be in the presence of his parents, whose hearts the wayward boy was breaking. It is a peculiar but incontrovertible fact, that sin, no matter whether spasmodic or habitual, produces a sense of humiliation and degradation in the presence of its victims whom it has deceived or injured. Thus Herod, the tetrarch, although he was a great Roman governor, trembled when he thought the be-headed John the Baptist was risen from the dead. Thus Gertrude, Hamlet's mother, fled from the room in which she and her guilty paramour, King Claudius, saw the tragedy enacted of the death of her murdered husband. Thus the erring husband always wants to seek the companionship of any person rather than that of his wronged wife. The dissolute father feels a coward's humiliation when he looks into the clear, honest, blue eye of his son, who may not be at that time over fifteen years of age, and who could in no way injure his parent if he would.

Conscience-Stricken Refugees

Oh, sinner, let me prove to you that you are now like Adam and Eve, hiding in one of the Satanic retreats. Why do you dislike Mrs. So and So? She was the wife of one of the best friends you ever had. Has she wronged you? No. The reason you dislike her and never want to be seen in her companionship, is because that dead friend left you the executor of his estate. You mismanaged it. You criminally mismanaged it. You used her money for your own benefit. If that widow had wanted, she might have put you in jail. Now, you hate her. You never want to meet her. Not because she has wronged you, but because you have wronged her.

Why is that life-time friendship between you and your old school-chum broken up? You were both born in the same country village. You grew up together. You played ball together; flew kites together; went fishing in the old brook together; sat side by side behind the same school desk, and ate your lunches out of each other's baskets. You came to the city on the same train; lived in the same boarding-house, and went to work at the same city store on the same day. Why are you estranged? I will tell you. You both fell in love with the same girl. In order to win that girl's affections, you lied about your old friend. You circulated evil reports about his past life, when you knew that no squarer, truer man ever lived. You said his family was not respectable, when his mother used to be a second mother to you, and helped nurse you when you were sick. You hate your old school friend, not because he has done an injustice to you, but because you have done an injustice to him. By the very reason you shun men and women, who have done you no wrong, I know you have done them a wrong. "Adam and his wife hid themselves," not because God hated them. They hated God, because they had disobeyed God and eaten of the "Forbidden Tree." Beware, oh man, how you flee your innocent victims. You are now shunning them in Satanic hiding-places.

Sin to Cover Sin

But again, I learn that our first ancestors sought other refuges besides leaf and flower and clinging vine and tree trunk. But sin never tries to cover up sin by the curtain of leaf alone. Sin always tries to conceal sin behind the bulwarks of other sins. Thus, when Adam and Eve hid themselves from the presence of God in the Garden, they tried to conceal their sin with the sin of falsity. They pretended they did not hear God when he called. They tried to conceal sin by saying, "The reason we have not answered thee, oh God, is because we were unclothed, and dare not appear before thee naked as thou didst create us." They tried to conceal sin in exactly the same way as thousands and tens of thousands of living men try to conceal sin with sin. Ah, the "poisonous ivy" behind which Adam and Eve concealed themselves was not an arbor of oak, but an arbor of lies and deceptions. If they had spoken the truth, they would have said, "The shame we feel, the shame that forced us to hide ourselves from thy presence is due to our consciousness of wrong doing." But one sin involves committing another to hide it and another to hide that, until the sinner is buried under a mountain range of infamies.

How does man try to conceal his first sin behind a mighty bulwark of many sins? Here is a young man who has been brought up in a country home. He was raised up right. He had his first Gospel lessons instilled into him at the family altar, in the Sunday School, and in the church pew, where, as a little child, he used to be taken to hear the service, and would sleep through the long sermon, clasped in his mother's arms. Away from home, he falls into bad companionship. He gradually gets into the habit of spending evenings in billiard halls, and his Sundays on excursion trains and picnic parties. He drinks a little. He plays cards a little. He dresses a little better than he can afford. He runs a little in debt. One night, while sitting some of his companions gambling, he says to himself: "Why cannot I make a little money that way?" is a collector for the store. He plays and loses. He plays again and loses. He feels again for money in his pocket. Now his cheeks pale and for his fingers have touched the envelope which longs to his employer. He says to himself: "I must win. I will borrow five dollars and pay it back very soon." He plays again and loses. Again, and loses. What is the result? The next day he dare not confess to his doctors his accounts. He keeps on using other people's money, until at last, one night, in order to conceal his past sins, he forges. Then all the infernal goblins clap their hands for joy. At last they have a new victim. The law places its heavy hand upon the young man's shoulder. A striped suit, and a penitentiary cell, and a broken-hearted mother are the result of the sinner trying to conceal his sin behind a bulwark of many sins.

But why invent a parable to illustrate my thought? We can, if we would, find a conspicuous illustration of the history of our own country, by following the downward path of one whose name might have been among the most honored in American history. All intelligent men and women and children in this audience have spoken the name of Benedict Arnold with execration and contempt. Living or dead, the sentence which this emerald exile spoke to the fugitive Charles Maurand Talleyrand, who was asking him for letters of introduction to friends in America, is true. "I am the only man born in America, who fought in the American war for liberty, who has not a friend in all America. I am Benedict Arnold, the traitor."

A Traitor's Fall

But, to-day, I do not see alone Arnold, the traitor. I do not see merely the betrayer of West Point. I see, first, Benedict Arnold, the hero of Ticonderoga. I see Benedict Arnold, the hero and commander of the wonderful expedition against Quebec, which in 1775, in midwinter, marched through the Maine woods. I see Benedict Arnold, wounded before the walls of Fort Mifflin, where Montcalm breathed his last. I see Benedict Arnold of Lake Champlain and the Crowsnest, who fought in the first battle of Saratoga and Benedict Arnold, the Phil Sheridan of the second battle of Saratoga, who turned the ebbing tides of defeat into flood-tides of a victory, that submerged Burgoyne and all his troops. Then I see this wounded hero, Benedict Arnold, wounded the second time at Saratoga, appointed to the command of the City of Philadelphia, to rest there until his wounds healed. Then I see the aristocracy of the American Capitol making a social lion of this hero of heroes. Then I see Benedict Arnold running into debt to pay the expenses of his social triumphs, and not knowing how to extricate himself. Then I see him led on by sin to conceal until at last he had to do something to save himself from financial as well as social disgrace. Then I see him, as a last resort to conceal sin, trying to bar away the citadel of American independence, West Point. Ah, my friends, when Benedict Arnold started on his downward path of extravagance, he never intended to be a traitor. His attempt to betray West Point, was merely the culmination of a long series of attempts to conceal sin. Beware of the first glass, first lie, the first taste of the fruit of the Forbidden Tree. Oh, yes. But more than that, beware of the folly of trying to conceal sin with sin.

Evading Responsibility

But as we push our way through the flower gardens and the hedges of Paradise, and see our guilty ancestors standing before God, I find that they are not vying to leave their hiding-places of sin, even after the embowered roofs and the curtains of leaves have been torn aside, and the guilty pair are compelled to confess that the fruit of the Forbidden Tree has been placed against their lips. Even now, they are both trying to conceal sin with sin. What is the man trying to do? Why, he is trying to throw all the blame of his sin upon his wife. What is the woman trying to do? She is no better. They are both tarred with the same black pitch of meanness. Why, she is trying to throw game of her sin upon the serpent. The man said: "The woman whom thou gavest to be with me, she gave me of the tree and I did eat." The woman said: "The serpent beguiled me, and I did eat." The young Adam of the present day says: "I am not to blame for my sins. I am a fatalist. I believe all my evil desires were inherited from my ancestors, and they are to blame, and not myself." The young Eve of modern times, lifting the glass of wine to her lips just before her doom, says: "I am not to blame. Other people drink. Every one of my friends drink; therefore, they set me an example must follow. They are to blame, not myself." The young drunkard blames the saloon-keeper for selling him the whiskey. The saloon-keeper justifies himself by pleading that the voter approves of his having a license to stand behind the bar. Just as in a great railroad accident, the trackman blames the switchman, and the switchman blames the conductor, and the conductor blames the engineer, and the engineer blames the superintendent. So in our sins, we are trying to conceal sin by passing the responsibility on and on and on and on, until at last we persuade ourselves that we are free from blame, and that the guilt of our sin belongs to some other power or circumstance nearly or remotely connected with us.

A Criminal's Complaint

I believe, in many cases, the responsibility of sin may be placed upon other shoulders than upon the head of the one who has to suffer. That was a terrible dictum Peter Neidermeyer, the Chicago bandit hanged at the gallows, when, in April, 1904, he stood under the shadow of the gallows, and said: "It is all well enough to pray with me now, but it is too late. Who are my two companions and myself, about to die? We belong to the great army of the poor, miserable, social outcasts. We grew up in the slums, half-starved and ways miserable. We work day after day like slaves, and die miserably. If the churches did something more for those who need their aid in the struggle to earn a living, they would do more good than they can by converting men about to be hanged." Ah, yes, there was thunderbolt of terrible truth, hurled in that one saying by a man who was facing eternity. But, though in some cases, the responsibility of sin may be placed upon other shoulders, this was not true of Adam's sin. It was not true of Eve's sin. It is not true of your sin. It is not true of my sin. God is willing to give you and me enough spiritual strength to resist any temptation which confronts us, if we only go to him for help. He was ready to help Adam and Eve. And, my friends, in reference to our own sins, let us have the willingness to acknowledge them. In the courts, even a criminal earns the contempt of his fellows, when, as they say: "He pleads the baby act." The way to forgiveness is by humble confession, and there is no other way. If a man will not take that way, he ought to realize that he is dooming himself to destruction, that excuses are of no avail, and that he himself and no other is responsible. Never charge your doom upon your mother, your wife, your child, your surroundings, when you have no one to blame but your own sinful self. Do not try to conceal sin with cowardly words such as those which Adam uttered, when he said: "Yes, I sinned, but the woman whom thou gavest to be with me, she gave me of the tree and I did eat." Inexpressibly contemptible was this cowardly excuse, and the woman caught the infection. She would not bear the responsibility for her own and her husband's sin, but attempted to fasten the entire blame on the serpent. Ah, no! Excuses and evasions wither in the presence of the Great Judge. Be open, be true, acknowledge your sins, and He is faithful and just to forgive your sins and cleanse you from all unrighteousness. It is he who tries to justify himself by accusing others, who will be condemned.

But why should our first ancestors have concealed themselves in their hiding-places of sin? Why should they have run away after the fruit of the Forbidden Tree was eaten? Why did they incriminate each other and the serpent after they were brought forth from their arboreal retreat? Did God want to destroy them, as so many seem to think? I confess that, in my younger days, I used to picture God as a tyrant, a monster, when he was seeking those two frightened, fleeing sinners. I used to think his voice was harsh and condemnatory; that the call, "Adam, where art thou?" had in it the roar of a wild African lion, starting forth at night to seek his prey. But a few years ago, my mind entirely changed in reference to this, for then I heard a great English preacher say, "This call of God in the Garden of Eden was not the call to death, but to life. God's call, 'Adam, where art thou?' was the pleading call of a sorrowing father seeking a lost and a wayward child." It is the same kind of a call the Pilgrim Fathers used when, as a searching party, they went forth into the dark woods seeking a lost child. It is the same call that you would give if your boy were lost in the jungles of the Indian hills. Then you would call, "My child, oh my child, cannot you hear my voice?" As God was calling to our ancestors to come forth out of their hiding-places of sin and they would be forgiven, God the Father, is calling to you and to me: "Come home, ye wearied and lost sinner, come home. Come home." Will you not hear his voice and heed his call?

Thus we started this sermon with a garden, we are going to end it with a garden. The Apostle Paul sees in the story of our first homestead a wrecked and disorganized animal and vegetable and ichthyological and ornithological and human world. He leads us to see how the whole creation—the birds of the air and the fishes of the sea and the beasts of the forests and the flowers of the fields—were influenced through and had their natures

Changed by the Sins of Man

Once, love reigned everywhere. Now, life is dependent upon the "survival of the fittest." The eagle begins to mount higher and higher and higher, not to come nearer to the heavens to see God, but that on account of the greater altitude, he can have a wider horizon to swoop; that with his keen eye he may see the helpless dove afar off, into which the feathered murderer can plunge that terrible beak and rip and tear and slay. Once the trees as lovers stretched forth their arms of branches, and with rustle and moan talked to each other, until for very love they trembled with delight. Then it was affection, wooing affection, and tenderness, enchanting tenderness. But now the batteries of the storms are unlimbered and the thunderbolts are aimed at their hearts. Now the mighty forest giants, not as lovers, but as dying warriors, groan and totter and fall. Once the lion and the lamb lay down side by side to sleep. But after the sin of man, the caress of the shaggy brute was the prelude to a bite, by which the helpless lamb was gashed and torn, and became a meal for its foe.

But this is not the end. The same inspired writer tells us that the time will come, when creation itself, also, "shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption, into the glorious liberty of the children of God." Then shall the day of universal peace dawn, which the ancient prophet described, when not only will men cease from war, but the animal creation will cease to devour one another; and again, "the wolf shall also dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid; and the cow and the bear shall feed, and their young ones shall lie down together, and the lion shall eat straw with the ox; and the sucking child shall play on the hole of the asp, and the weaned child shall put his hand on the cockatrice's den. They shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy temple, for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the seas."

Oh, my brother, will you not believe that this call of God the Father to his wayward children, may mean a paradisaic, an Edenic, and a redeemed world, glorified with love on the land, in the heavens and under the seas. Will you not heed the Father's call, which is today seeking you, even in your shameful hiding-places.

The Wonderful Growth of Deaconess Work

DEACONESS service had its inception in American Methodism in Chicago, seventeen years ago, when a Deaconess' Home was established, with eight members, and Miss Isabella Thornburn (who also had the distinction of being the first deaconess in the foreign mission field), as its first superintendent. Its history of struggle and experience as interesting as any romance. That noble band of orphanages, three Old People's Homes, and one Home for Incurables, where the helpless are tenderly cared for; several Settlement Homes in our larger cities, and one in Porto Rico, besides one Immigrant Home, and nine different branches of work among the foreign population in as many cities. In Europe there are twenty-one homes, hospitals, and stations, and there are a number of boarding schools, homes, and institutions in China, India, and Africa.

This is only in one branch of the Protestant Church. The Lutheran, Episcopal, Evangelical, and Baptist Churches in America, and the Church of Scotland, Church of England, Wesleyan, and Lutheran in Europe, have established and maintained Deaconess work for years, and all these testify to the devotion and great helpfulness of their Deaconesses. The Congregational is the latest to adopt the movement, and has established this year a training school in Chicago, and a Deaconess Home at Pana, Ill.

What is a deaconess? Bishop Thoburn says, "She is a woman bound by no vows, shut in by no prison walls, and kept from the sunshine by no barred doors; but she enjoys the largest liberty, and engages in a work sanctioned on nearly every page of the New Testament." She is a costumed, unsalaried officer of the church, giving herself and her whole time to the work of the Master, a ministering angel of mercy to the tired, hungry, discouraged, sin-sick, longing soul. Without earthly compensation but filled with the holy "enthusiasm of humanity," she endeavors not only to feed the hungry, clothe the needy, and educate the ignorant, but to bring to the sinning soul a sufficient Saviour.

The New York Deaconess Home and Training School was founded in 1889, since which time nearly $10,000 has been given towards its support. It has sent many workers to foreign fields. It conducts a Working Girl's Home on Seventeenth Street, where girls who earn not more than six dollars a week, can have a good room and board, with the influences of a Christian Home, for not more than three dollars per week. It has also carried on for the past nine years Fresh-Air Work at Long Branch, where a large and commodious cottage, given by Mr. John S. Huyler, five hundred mothers and children are entertained each season. The Training School occupies, with the Deaconess Home, a large five-story building on the corner of Madison Avenue and Eighty-Sixth Street. Its object is to furnish to young women a thorough two years' course of practical and theoretical instruction, preparatory for Deaconess or other Christian work. The course of study in outline is: The Bible and all related subjects, such as Church History, Sociology, Christian Missions, and Evidences of Christianity; Normal work and industrial training; medicine and nursing, music and physical culture. There, under efficient teachers, the best lecturers the city affords, and the advantages of personal study of the social con-women, feeling that "service is the keynote of the heavenly kingdom," struck a chord that has swelled to a mighty chorus of effort, and developed into many vine harmonies of service and succor. From that humble beginning have grown, at home and abroad, nearly 200 institutions managed by Deaconesses, 1,224 in number. In the United States are thirty-eight Deaconess' Homes, and sixteen training schools, twenty-two hospitals, where the sick and dying are ministered to, both physically and spiritually, four ditions of the poor, the student develops into a capable, costumed officer of the church, or becomes a Christian missionary, going out to do God's work among his needy ones.

Many calls come for workers that cannot be answered, and many demands for their work that cannot be supplied. More workers are urgently needed. The fall term opens September 14th. Further information will be gladly given by application to Miss Florence Slusser, Principal, 1175 Madison Avenue, New York City.

Crisis in the War Near at Hand

JAPAN'S NAVY DEPARTMENT, TOKIO

EVENTS in the Far East indicate that the war is rapidly approaching a critical stage. Simultaneously with the tightening of the naval and military cordon around Port Arthur, several of the outer forts of which are now in the hands of the Japanese, the triangular investment of Gen. Kouropatkin's forces in Manchuria by the armies of Gens. Kuroki, Oku and Nodzu, has been pushed home with such vigor that the Czar's troops have been compelled to retreat along the whole line. On July 28 the Russian front extended some thirty miles in a semicircle, from a point near New Chwang northward, with the railroad as a centre. Within three days, by hard fighting, the Japanese drove the Russians back at all points, capturing the important fortified city of Haicheng without a blow, and reducing the Russian semicircle one-half. On August 2, Kouropatkin's forces constituted a compact chain, curving from Liao Yang on the north to Anping, thirteen miles east of Liao Yang. With grim determination, the Russian commander had contested every inch of ground in a series of rear-guard actions, in several of which heavy losses were sustained on both sides.

Though there are no correspondents at the front on either side, as far as known—the news despatches coming almost wholly from St. Petersburg and Tokio—it is believed that the losses in this series of engagements have been heavier than any incurred in a single week since the war began. On the Russian side were 70,000 troops opposing the Mikado's united forces, aggregating 220,000.

Much of the fighting took place in a temperature of 120 degrees, both armies suffering frightfully from the heat, which followed the recent rains. In the battle at Simoucheng, in an altitude of 1,900 feet, the Russian line extended ten miles—the heights being held by two divisions with rapid-fire guns. The Japanese lines extended fifteen miles, and drove in the enemy, after repeated attempts by the latter to outflank the Japanese left. In this fight the Russians lost 400 men and six guns, and the Japanese 100 men. In capturing the Yangtsu and Yushu passes, the Japanese sacrificed six officers killed and sixteen wounded, and 950 men killed and wounded, and the Russians lost still more heavily.

In a despatch to the Emperor on August 2, Gen. Kouropatkin, admitting defeat, said: "Our troops have retired from Haicheng along the road toward Anshanchan. The movement was accomplished in perfect order, and the enemy did not disturb us. The terrible heat has caused many sunstrokes, and measures have been taken to diminish the equipment the troops have hitherto been obliged to carry." The decisive battle of the campaign is regarded as probable, if the Japanese energetically follow up their preliminary successes. The losses have been heavy on both sides. Between 6,000 and 8,000 men is one estimate given of the Russian losses. All the estimates, however, are little better than guesswork.

The Czar has Ominous News

Another despatch of a semi-official character, from St. Petersburg, says: "It is reported here that Emperor Nicholas has just received a telegram at Peterhof, containing alarming news from the seat of war. The Czar is said to be greatly depressed. It is also reported that Viceroy Alexieff, who had gone to Harbin on his way to Vladivostok, returned to Liao Yang to confer with Gen. Kouropatkin regarding the situation. All newspaper specials from the front are suspended. According to a message received from Harbin, Gen. Kouropatkin has ordered the removal from that place of all useless civilians, in order to provide the greatest possible accommodation for the winter quarters of the Russian army."

This would indicate a general Russian retreat northward to Harbin, the military stronghold on the railroad and the point of connection for Vladivostok. On the heels of this news, comes the intelligence that a fresh Japanese force of 20,000 men has landed at Yinkow, the port of New Chwang, and is marching toward Liao Yang to take the retreating Russians on the right flank. Whether Kouropatkin will make a stand at Liao Yang, or even at Moukden, is now a matter of pure conjecture. Up to the present time, the Russians hold the railroad, and it is not unlikely that Gen. Kouropatkin may succeed in withdrawing the greater part, if not all of his forces, to the north, in spite of Kuroki's energetic efforts to cut him off, by interjecting two divisions of Japanese between Liao Yang and Moukden.

It is reported that Gen. Yuen, the Chinese commander in Manchuria, has instructed his officers in charge of the Chinese troops west of the Liao River, to prevent the Russians, in the least offensive manner possible, from violating the neutrality of Chinese territory by crossing the river, in case they should be driven back by the Japanese from their present positions. The latest rumors are that Kuroki has 100,000 men north of the line of Russian retreat, effectually cutting them off, and that a stand may be made by Kouropatkin at Tieling, a strongly entrenched position, forty-five miles northeast of Moukden. This story is not corroborated, however, from any authoritative source.

One of the events of the week was the repulse of a Japanese attack on Port Arthur, belated news of which reached Chefoo through Chinese refugees. It is said that both sides lost heavily, and that a Japanese cruiser, the Kasuga, was sunk. One report, which is doubtless greatly exaggerated, stated that the Japanese lost 20,000 men in two days' fighting. There is no confirmation from any authentic source of the story of the repulse.

Port Arthur Nearing its Fall

A cable despatch from Tokio, dated Aug. 4, says:

CROWDS CHEERING GENERAL OYAMA'S DEPARTURE FOR THE FRONT

"The Japanese noose is gradually tightening around Port Arthur, and their guns are pouring fire into the fortress from a diminishing circle. It is believed that their fire will compel the Russian squadron to leave the harbor, and engage Admiral Togo's fleet.

"It is the current rumor that the Mikado has expressed a desire that the capture of the fortress be effected with the smallest possible sacrifice of life. Hence the care and precision in approaching the defences, and the extensive use of the larger engines of war in clearing the way. Otherwise it is considered that, as the Japanese infantry will go anywhere and refuse to retire, whatever its losses, Port Arthur could have been captured before now, but only with a heavy sacrifice of life. It is said that the Russians have been driven back to their last line of land defences, and that the Japanese have 350 guns in action.

"Twelve Russian destroyers, four torpedo boats, and several gunboats emerged from Port Arthur on Monday night, Aug. 1. The Japanese destroyers on guard before the port gave battle, and there was a brisk engagement for twenty minutes. Then the Russians were driven back to port."

A Chefoo correspondent says that the Japanese positions at Port Arthur are exposed to the fire of the forts, and that the besiegers must either advance or evacuate the positions. On the other hand, a despatch from St. Petersburg says that the Ministry of War in possession of information, that although several thousand Russians have fallen in the recent engagements at Port Arthur, there is no immediate danger to the fall of the fortress. The forts on the northern and northwestern front are almost all held by the Russian who dealt terrible destruction upon the Japanese their recent attacks.

Britain's dispute with Russia over the Red Sea rail is still unsettled. Damages have been paid by the St. Petersburg Government for the detention of one British steamer—the Foxton Hall—but the cases of the Knig Commander and other vessels are still in abeyance. It is believed that the Red Sea raids will be continued and war risks on shipping have reached very high rates in London. The Vladivostok fleet is still raiding intervals. A German steamer and two Japanese vessels are reported to have been sunk recently by Admiral Skrydloff's warships.

One of the most interesting despatches concerning the recent land battles, is that from a correspondent, who claims to have witnessed the second engagement at Motien Pass, when the Russian made a desperate attempt to recapture it from the enemy. He writes:

The Japanese outpost companies were forced from these trenches after bayonet fighting, to the summit of the hills forming the highest ridge of the range where is the entrance to the Pass. Half way between the trenches and the ridges, and about parallel to them, runs the road upon which is located the temple. The fiercest fighting was focused about this temple, which the Russian held for about three hours, in spite of rain of bullets from the opposite ridge. The Russian dead and wounded were thick about the temple.

When the sun dispelled the fog, about 9 o'clock, the Japanese made quick work of the affair. The white coats worn by the Russian officers made them conspicuous targets for the Japanese. The Russian firing was altogether in volleys, while the Japanese fired at will. The Russian troops kept close formation, but the Japanese soldiers deployed in extended order. It was plain that the Japanese soldiers were possessed of much greater initiative and dash than the Russians. The engagement was a fair test of the capacities of the two forces, and the result of it was that one Japanese regiment of three battalions, only two of which were on the firing line, defeated three Russian regiments, in spite of the fact that another Russian regiment was held in reserve. The Russians employed their artillery much more than the Japanese did theirs.

The Russian Baltic fleet of eight warships has left Cronstadt on its way to the Far East. It is surmised that some of the vessels may be detailed to watch and seize vessels carrying contraband. Several steamers from the United States, carrying submarines for the Japanese Navy, are now believed to be on the way, and will be watched for by the Russian cruisers probably in the Mediterranean, or the Red Sea.

Mr. Frederick A. North, an American educator, who THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers will doubtless remember as one whose interesting and instructive letters of travel have occasionally appeared in these columns is now in Japan. He writes from Tokio, to this paper enclosing a photograph of the departure of General Oyama and his staff from the Mikado's capital, for the seat of war, on July 6. Mr. North himself took the photograph from the vantage ground of the station roof and it is probably the only pictorial presentation of the incident secured with the camera. The same correspondent also forwards photographs of the Japanese Navy Department Building and of Admiral Togo's residence. The latter is an inconspicuous house on a quiet street. Mr. North is now on his way to the military front in Manchuria.

Midsummer Days at the World's Fair

INTEREST in the great Fair at St. Louis continues unabated. Judging by the number of travelers who throng the principal railway stations, and the number of tickets sold for the Exposition, it would seem as if travel in that direction would soon reach its maximum. Not only is the traffic on the railroads immensely heavy, but many persons owning automobiles are making the journey westward at their leisure, oblivious of time tables, and of the thousand-and-one annoyances inseparable to a long journey by rail in midsummer.

One of the pleasantest features connected with the Fair is the hospitality dispensed by the various State buildings. Of these buildings that of New York stands second to none. It is built upon an excellent site, on the plateau of States, and it has been said that for beauty of architecture, splendor and appropriateness of appointments, the New York State building surpasses all the others. The building is simple but extremely unified in design, of Italian architecture in colonial treatment, every detail having been carefully carried out. The grounds about the building have also received special attention, and there are many beautiful beds of flowers. These, with lily-ponds and rare shrubbery, make the place very attractive.

The exhibits of New York are many and varied. There are elaborate exhibits from the State Department of Public Instruction, and the University of the State of New York. In the public school exhibits contributions are shown from twenty-four cities and various villages. Every normal school in the State is represented, and many training schools and classes; so there are many interesting features from technical and trade schools. In the art department of the Exposition, statistics show that New York has very nearly one-third of the total domestic exhibit.

New York has a greater number of varieties and simple exhibits in the Agricultural Department, than any other State. It also has the largest exhibit in Horticultural Palace, by several hundred plates, and also more than twice the number of varieties of any other State, and is the only State showing pears and grapes.

Cheap touring rates have made a trip to St. Louis within the reach of many, who, but for these arrangements, would have to forego a visit to the Fair. Many have set their faces Expositionward, and through the months of August and September crowds of excursionists will surge through the great stations and terminals, all en route for St. Louis.

Every day the management plans something of special interest. Children's Day on August 2, was one of these occasions. Thousands of children enjoyed the day's events. The parade, in which children of every nation were represented in their native dress, was a most interesting spectacle. The Grand Marshal of the parade was a little boy, who came into prominence not long ago by stopping President Francis at the Administration Building, and asking him if he were employed there.

President Roosevelt's two sons visited the Fair recently, and young Theodore expressed himself as very much pleased with what he had seen in his sojourn at the Exposition. He said: "We have seen the entire Fair, with the exception of the State buildings, the New York building being the only one we visited. We viewed the Pike from one side to the other, inside and out."

Particular interest centres about the Japanese exhibit, which shows the remarkable progress of this remarkable people. Despite the fact that while they were engaged in a dreadful conflict, which might mean almost death to them as a nation, Japan's exhibit was the very first one to be completed and put in order, in fact, was the only one entirely finished on the day of the opening of the Exposition. The Exposition Travelers' Aid Committee, for the protection of women and girls going unattended to the Fair, has done good work, in preventing many inexperienced women from falling into the hands of unscrupulous persons. The Committee has put in circulation hundreds of thousands of circulars of warning, and directions to young women traveling alone, and is still hard at work, doing all that is possible to guard women and unprotected girls.

Copies of circulars of instruction and directions may be had by sending address to Dr. Anna L. Brown, secretary and treasurer of the Exposition Traveler's Aid Committee, 96 Fifth Avenue, New York City, or to Mrs. M. S. Hopkins, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

LIFE AMONG CHINESE WOMEN

A LETTER FROM MRS. ANNA KRISTENSEN, KUIN-CHEO, CHINA

MY husband and I are living in the very heart of China, laboring under the auspices of the Norwegian Lutheran Mission. I have wondered whether the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, which has cheered us by its weekly visits, and encouraged us in our loneliness, would not like to know something of the scenes that we witness here. I send you three specimen incidents in connection with my work among the women, which will show you how sad the lot of our sex in this heathen land. Perhaps some of our sisters in America will remember these poor creatures in their prayers, and us, too, who are often discouraged.

My husband and myself are the only witnesses for Christ in Kuin-Cheo, a heathen city, with more than 30,000 inhabitants. Through our servant, we became acquainted with a poor Chinese girl, sister to our servant, who had been engaged to be married to a heathen boy not far from her line. The boy was known to be of a terrible temper, but as the girl belonged to a poor family, and the boy to well-to-do parents, her parents thought it very fortunate for their daughter. In China all girls are engaged through their parents or guardians. This girl had not been married to her husband many months before we heard that she was dead. "She had taken opium," was her husband's story, but her people feared there was some other cause for her sudden death, so the mother asked me to go with her and see the dead body, which I did. A more horrible sight I have never seen. Her face and body bore marks of a cruel beating. She had been brutally murdered. But there was no redress. The husband could not be punished.

Another young girl who had been given to her mother-in-law while a child, committed suicide rather than become the wife of the boy to whom her parents had contracted her. For girl, she was not yet sixteen, and had worked hard for years for her mother-in-law. It wanted only one month of the marriage ceremony, but she could not bear to go through it, so she took a knife and cut her throat. The mother-in-law, worried over losing the useful little servant so soon to become her daughter-in-law, sent for me to save her life, but it was too late. She died that night.

A few days ago I was called out to two women, who had taken opium with the intention to kill themselves. The first one I was called to was an old lady between 50 and 60 years of age. After a long while, I succeeded in making her bring the poison up again. She got very angry when she learned she was going to live a little longer; but after some talk with her, she quieted down, and thanked me for coming and saving her life. She has been here several times, and heard about the love of God to the lost world. I pray that God may save her soul.

The other woman was a young mother, about 28 years of age. Her husband, an opium smoker and a real bad man. He was the real cause for her taking opium. But they called me too late. When I got there the woman was quite unconscious, and her face and hands were swollen up; her face and fingers were getting dark, and her breathing was very distressing and difficult, and it was impossible for her to take any antidote. The poor children—a boy of 9 and a girl of 5 years of age—were wept bitterly by the dying mother's side. Poor, poor woman, her marriage was more unhappy than a slave; an untimely death, and no hope for the future. Surely this is the ultimatum of hopelessness. And the poor children left, so to speak, alone in this sinful world, with no one to love or care for them.

O! I do feel that I should like to cry into the ear of every Christian man and woman in the United States this solemn question: "Have you done all you can, by your prayers and means, to help forward the Kingdom of God in this great heathen land?" The above mentioned incidents are but a few of the many thousands of sad facts in this land, of the unhappy lives of our poor sisters, who have no power to speak against the wrongs inflicted on them, and very few who stand up for their rights.

Then comes the sad fact of infant murder; it is terrible to see how common this is in these parts of China. A baby girl, as a rule, is an unwelcome stranger, and in thousands of cases she is killed as soon as she is born, and then her body given to be eaten by the dogs outside; how dreadful! but what else can we expect from a people who have been in darkness for nearly 6,000 years? Nothing on earth but the power of the Gospel of Christ will ever be able to make China and the Chinese any better.

The work in this place is quite new, but the Lord has been pleased to bless the preaching of Christ here. Quite a number have put down their names and are preparing for baptism. We feel sure that the Spirit of God is working on their hearts. At our Sunday services our little chapel is quite crowded, and we are hoping soon to have a larger chapel in which we could hold our Sunday and weekly meetings. It is often sad to see a crowd of men come for miles from the country to be present at our services, and when they get here, often have to stand outside the door because there is no place inside, not even to stand.

Another real need is the want of a small organ, thus making the singing at our meetings easier. The Chinese are glad to hear music, and I feel sure that it would be a means of real blessing to have an organ at our public gatherings and prayer meetings. So, dear brother, I would ask you to be so kind as to mention this to the readers of your good CHRISTIAN HERALD.

The Bishop and the Saloon

THE Rt. Rev. Henry C. Potter, Episcopal Bishop of the Diocese of New York, a prelate whose many excellent and lovable social qualities have won for him the title of the "good bishop," has lately passed through an experience that painfully illustrates the truth that even the best of good men may go wrong. When the "good bishop" consented to grace with his clerical presence the opening of the Subway Tavern—a so-called model saloon, in Mulberry and Bleecker Streets, New York—he made a surrender to the enemies of society which he now doubtless bitterly regrets, as it has aroused a storm of righteous indignation about his ears.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, however, is disposed to regard the aged bishop as the easy victim of the liquor men, who have succeeded in placing him in a false position on a question concerning which there can be no two opinions among all right-thinking people, rather than as one who has boldly defied the proprieties with open eyes and in the full possession of his senses. Bishop Potter is getting old, and is no longer the keen, wide-awake cleric he was in former years. His presence and speech at the "dedication" of the Subway Tavern—which one caustic critic has aptly denominated "an underground road to hell"—made a spectacle so pitiable that it should be deplored rather than denounced. His own Church, through its leaders, has hastened to repudiate his action, and to declare that he has long since ceased to have important standing with the other bishops, or any influence in church legislation. Consequently, while they view his course with shame and humiliation, they regard it as something for which the Church has no responsibility.

But although the good bishop is irresponsible, and has proved a shining mark for the designing saloon men, the evil of his example and the influence of his extraordinary address cannot be overlooked. It was the first time in the history of our country that a clergyman had so openly and publicly lauded and defended the saloon, and spoken the reverent words of blessing over an enterprise which can have but one outcome—the moral and physical degradation of intelligent human beings. A man of God, whose vows impose upon him the duty of winning men from selfish indulgence to purer, nobler, spiritual lives, should have been the very last man in all the world to stand forth in public, flanked by an array of whiskey, gin, and brandy bottles, and to advocate the vile traffic which is to-day the greatest cause of crime, sorrow, suffering, and debasement known to the human race. Back of that saloon audience, had not his eyes been held by the wicked spiritual influences of his surroundings, the aged bishop might have seen another and vaster gathering—the great multitude of victims whose lives have been ruined by the saloon, and who fill our jails, almshouses, and asylums, or populate our cemeteries. No tavern, were its taproom as large as Greater New York City itself, could hold half that grim assemblage.

Bishop Potter knows New York well. He knows the extent of its liquor trade, and the terrible potency of that trade for crime and demoralization. Yet some of the remarks credited to him on that occasion were so extraordinary, that we might well be pardoned the suspicion that the good bishop's mental and spiritual perceptions had grown dull with the advancing years. "I prefer the word 'tavern,'" he said. "It is such a place that I can take my wife, my mother, and my sister to." And almost in the next breath, he asks, "Are you going to make the saloon and what it stands for, so excruciatingly bad, that a man cannot go into it without losing his self-respect?" He trusted that the Subway Tavern would soon have a clientele like that of those European drinking-places where men went with their wives and children to eat and drink according to their means. This, and much more to the same purpose; then, amid the clinking of glasses, the grand old Doxology was sung, and the singular spectacle was at an end.

Bishop Potter's attempt to whitewash the saloon and make it respectable, has excited the laughter of the whiskey men, the indignation of the friends of temperance, and the sorrow of good men and women everywhere. Too far, already, the Church has truckled to the world, and the latest attempt to make the worst vice of the age alluring and attractive and to gloss it over with the sanction of the Church, is outright sacrilege. The saloon and the Church can never go into partnership while the Church has a particle of spirituality left. In ancient times, the cloak of the Greek and Roman priesthood was a cover for Bacchanalian orgies; but we are living in a Christian age, and no attempt to gloss over vice, and accept it as virtue, can ever be tolerated now, in any right-minded community.

The path to social elevation does not lead through the saloon. The man or woman who believes, as Bishop Potter does, that the tavern is a fit place for social relaxation is heading toward the pit that is engulfing hundreds of thousands of victims yearly. Let us hope that his advice may not prove to be the means of bringing to ruin and sorrowful disruption many a home whose members accepted his endorsement of the saloon as "a family resort."

"It is good neither to eat flesh, nor to drink wine nor anything whereby thy brother stumbleth, or is offended or made weak." Excellent advice, and as good to-day as when Paul wrote it to the Church at Rome in the first century. We commend it heartily to Bishop Potter and all advocates of the "moral saloon."

Putting God Out of Mind

MEN try to forget God, to put him out of mind, or to think of him only when by reason of sickness or calamity, or by the approach of death, they are compelled to think of him. How seldom, in our seasons of success, when all goes well with us, do we remember him!

In Shakespeare's Henry V, one of the characters, telling of the death of Falstaff, says, "So he cried out and said, 'God! God! God!' three or four times. Now I, to comfort him, bid him that he should not think of God. I hoped there was no need yet to trouble himself about that." And there, as everywhere, the great poet showed his knowledge of the weakness of men.

When the worst comes to the worst, when they can think of nothing else; when their hold on this earth has been loosened, and they are about to take a journey into some other world of which they have had no experience, and about which they have some apprehension, then men cast themselves on God and cry for his help, and send, perhaps, for a minister to show them how to cross the border line into the world beyond.

Why will men thus try to put God out of mind? Rather let us take him into our lives, and live like immortals, as he desires us to live, in the light of his countenance and his blessing, instead of as the beasts that perish.

Warnings to Workers

ONE of our medical journals, commenting on the recent death of former Governor Pattison, of Pennsylvania, and on the death, in the prime of life, of several other prominent citizens, calls attention to the tendency of professional men in America to overwork. It says that the lawyer, the physician and the statesman, having no regular hours of work, such as the working man secures through his Union, is apt to overtax his energies and to continue the strain too long, without a period of rest. He is especially prone to do so here, more than in other lands, because with us life is more intense, and the calls on him for strenuous effort are more insistent.

The warning is needed, for the men who are falling by the way, leave their work unfinished, and their death is a public loss. They are the men we cannot afford to lose. The latter part of their lives would be more valuable to the people, because they would bring to their service that quality which we need more than energy and activity—the wisdom that comes from ripe experience. The aged man is a better counsellor, a wiser guide, than the young man, who is liable to rash and impetuous. We are gradually discovering that fact; and though young men are still demanded the front ranks of the workers, we are learning that from the wisdom that directs, and the advice that is needed in a crisis, we must look to men past middle age. When, therefore, a man so exhausts his energies in his early manhood that he dies at forty or fifty, he misses an opportunity of service, and his country loses by his death.

Probably a greater enemy to longevity than exhausting work, is the worry and anxiety that in our public life are inevitable. The body will bear a great deal of work without collapse, but when the work is accomplished by worry, the nervous and physical powers rebel. There come periods when the demand for rest and quiet is made, and a man makes a great mistake when he turns a deaf ear to it. It is economy to heed it, because a relaxation of the tension has a recuperative effect. He does more and better work after rest than he would have done in his exhausted condition. The relief from the fret and harass gives the nerves an opportunity to regain their normal condition, and enables them to bear a new strain.

There needs, too, in our public life a stronger faith than is often observed in the overruling power of God. We should not fret and be so apprehensive of coming evil as we are, if we realized that He is at the helm, and that his care is over all his works. The prophet uttered a panacea for all our worries, when he said: "The Lord will keep him in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on Thee, because he trusteth in Thee."

Egypt's Development

TWO aspects of intelligence from Egypt combine to arouse public interest in that country. One of these is the discovery of relics of its ancient civilization, and the other the marvelous development in present order and prosperity. The public works that have recently been inaugurated, some of which have been carried to successful completion, have given employment to the laboring classes of Egypt, who for the first time in the history of that country, have been regularly and adequately paid for their toil. The huge monuments which are found in Egypt were largely the product of forced labor. From the time of the enslavement of Israel and even earlier, the oppressor's whip was the incentive to servile effort. It now the workers have gone willingly to their task, and have enjoyed an era of prosperity that their fathers knew nothing of. The country itself, too, by the economy of administration which the English representative has enforced, and by the equitable system of taxation adopted, is now emerging from the slough of financial embarrassment in which it has groveled for centuries. The prospects of further advancement are exceedingly bright. The dam now built at As-

Egyptians had not at that time discovered the process of embalming, or the bodies had been cast out by a later generation.

The rule of England in Egypt has been productive of a wonderful advantage to the material interests of the country and to a revelation of its past, of which the Egyptians themselves were ignorant. It would be a matter for thankfulness if it brought also a spiritual blessing to the country and led to the fulfilment of the prediction of the prophet:

The Lord shall be known to Egypt, and the Egyptians shall know the Lord (Isa. 19: 21).

A Wireless Inquiry

From the Cunard steamer Campania during its voyage to New York, a wireless message went to London a few days ago. A lady on board discovered that she had lost a number of valuable rings, a watch and other articles of jewelry. She remembered that she had them while staying at a hotel in London and could not remember having seen them afterwards. They had been put, for the convenience of carrying, in a small leather bag. The owner was greatly distressed by the loss and told the captain of the vessel about it. A wireless telegram was at once despatched to the hotel. On the following day the captain was able to tell the lady that accurately involves the exercise of a number of faculties. One must have a retentive memory to seize and retain little peculiarities of form, and if the mind is bright and active a great many clues are picked up from the context, the general style, and the subject matter. Then, again, it requires concentration, which is sadly lacking in the majority of people. All in all, it is a capital gauge of mentality, and I use it frequently, without letting the scholar suspect what I am after." Yet it is remarkable that a similar test in spiritual matters often fails. It is not generally the scholar or the mentally gifted man, who sees the handwriting of God in the works of nature, but rather the man whose heart has been touched by the Holy Spirit.

Because that which may be known of God is manifest in them for God hath shown it unto them (Rom. 1: 19).

An Injured Wife's Plea

A pathetic scene was witnessed in the Court of General Sessions in New York last week. A prisoner was brought up for sentence for beating his wife. At the trial she had refused to make a complaint against him; but there were other witnesses to his brutality, and the man was convicted without her evidence. He had broken her arm, and her face showed the marks of his uan, will cause the waters of the Nile, on which Egypt depends for its fertility, to spread over an enormously increased area, and will cause lands, formerly idle, to yield large crops. Thus Egypt is rapidly rising out of its decadence and her government and people are alike rejoicing in improved conditions.

The Khedive, whose portrait appears on this page, is a young man, capable of appreciating the better times which his country has fallen. He is highly educated, being not only an excellent Arabic scholar, but speaking English, French, and German. As a Mohammedan he is a strict abstainer from intoxicants, and, as still more astonishing in an Oriental, he does not use tobacco in any form. He is the father of four daughters and two sons, and his wife, a woman of rare beauty, is remarkable for her intelligence. The Khedive's mother is also an influential member of his household, and has proved an invaluable aid in straightening out the difficulties which have occasionally arisen between the son and his English advisers.

While the development of modern Egypt has thus progressed, more light is being gained on its ancient story. Professor Naville, of Geneva, has just discovered in an immense rubbish heap at ancient Thebes, a small temple of exquisite beauty, which was built in 2000 B.C., before the time of Abraham. It had evidently been used as a place for the celebration of the funeral rites of the kings and princes. Various tombs were unearthed near it. In one of them was found a cake of unleavened bread, and several implements of the baker's trade. No bodies were found. Either the her jewels were safe. The hotel proprietor reported that the bag had been found among a pile of empty boxes, into which it had apparently fallen while the Americans were packing. The inquiry and the reply which relieved the owner's anxiety had been cast into space, and had found the persons who alone were concerned in the matter. Such an incident would have been incredible a few years ago, but now it is understood and believed. The time is coming when prayer and its answer, at which many now scoff, will be found to be a profound verity.

I am as one mocked of his neighbor, who calleth upon God and he answereth him (Job 12: 4).

Graded by Illegibility

Among the curious methods adopted by the Principals of Public Schools for testing the mental capacity of children is a peculiar one, originating with a Southern teacher. It is that of getting the child to read manuscript written by a bad writer. He thinks the test is almost infallible. He says: "Many systems have been proposed for mental grading, and some ingenious instruments for measuring brain activity have been tried in the North: but I know of nothing better than the handwriting test for all-around capacity. People who have difficulty in reading unfamiliar penmanship are nearly always slow and lazy in every other respect. They may not be lacking in a certain solid intelligence, but their mental machinery runs heavily and ponderously. The power to read poor writing quickly and savage blows. When the judge was about to sentence the cowardly brute, the wife interposed. She admitted that he had beaten her, as she found that denial was useless. "But," she said, "I love him. We have been married eighteen years and he is a good husband to me when he is sober. It is only when he does not know what he is doing that he ill-treats me. Please be merciful to him." The judge was deeply moved by the magnanimity of the woman. He reduced the sentence of the prisoner to one year, and said to him: "You are not deserving of any mercy. Your wife asks me to treat you leniently and I will do so for her sake. But I want you to remember that it is not for you. You owe her all the thanks for what I have done." When the sinner stands at the bar of God to answer for the deeds done in the body, happy will he be if he has confided his case to the Advocate whose merits avail for all who trust in Him.

He is able to save them to the uttermost who come unto God by him, seeing that he ever liveth to make intercession for them (Heb. 7: 25).

THE burning French ships-of-the-line were blazing furiously, sending great columns of smoke and fire into the heavens. The storehouses filled with inflammable material, the docks and other buildings, including the powder magazines, added their quota of flame and smoke to the infernal confusion of the terrible night. The place was bright as noonday. It was like the crater of a volcano. The Republican soldiers under the cover of their batteries, at last mounted the walls. Drunk with passion and enthusiasm they swept through the streets, butchering as they went, driving the helpless populace to join those already congested on the wharves and quays of the water front.

Men women and children were there. A wail of terror compounded from thousands of voices, thrilled and sobbed in the air above the frightened tumult. Those nearest the water's edge stretched out their arms to Macartney in his boat in a vain and piteous appeal; crying to him for help, begging him to take them with him in the boat, offering him anything if he would only rescue them.

"Mr. Hoste," he said to his midshipman, "isn't this awful? I have seen war in many places and in many phases but never like this!"

"The boat would hold two or three more, sir," answered Hoste, the young reefer. "We might take off that many women and children."

"My lad," said Macartney, "to approach any nearer would be instant death. They would overwhelm the boat in a second. We would be swamped. No one would survive. Yet I would give my life to take them all."

As he spoke, a half dozen men, seeing the boat pulling past from the pier-head, sprang into the water, thinking, perhaps, that Macartney would wait for them. The man turned his head away from the struggling wretches.

"You see?" he said to his midshipman.

"Yes, sir. Isn't it awful!"

"Terrible! Put some muscle into your stroke, men!" cried the captain, addressing the oarsmen; "we can't let anyone overtake us."

Even the men, coarse of fibre, rough in character and brutalized, as were the sailors of that day, were profoundly affected by the situation of the people on the quays. The cries of those nearest the water's edge were interrupted by the shrieks and the volleys of musketry, the sound of cannon shots. Above all this could be heard the fierce yells of the Republican soldiery, "Vive la République!"

"We are drawing past the frigate, sir," at last ventured Hoste, touching his captain on the shoulder, as he stared appalled at the ruin of the town.

"Men," said Macartney suddenly, "I know my sweetheart is in that town. I want to land at a little private wharf beyond that row of houses, provided there is no mob there. There is an alley that leads straight to the back garden of her house. I can go there and return in ten minutes. I can't order any man to do a thing like that, but I want volunteers. Will you help me?"

"We will, sir," cried the coxswain of the crew. "Am I right, mates?"

"Ye are, Jack," cried one and another. "We'll help the cap'n git his lady."

"Mr. Hoste," said Macartney, "you will take charge of the boat. If it is possible for me to land at all, I shall do so behind that row of storehouses. There is an old deserted private landing there, and I imagine the mob will have forgotten it if they ever knew about it. So soon as I land pull away a safe distance and lie on your oars. If I am not back in ten minutes make the best of your way to the frigate and tell Mr. Frazier that I am killed, and for him to get under way, and report to Admiral Hood that we burned as many ships as was humanly possible. Explain to him how it was we couldn't burn them all."

"Yes, sir; but hadn't you better take someone with you, sir?"

"It might be a good plan," said Macartney. "Men, I want a volunteer to go ashore with me."

Everybody hastened to offer himself, but the coxswain, a veteran sailor, insisted that it was his place to go, on account of his rank.

"A horseman dashed through the crowd"

"You see, sir," he said, "I'm a sort of first luff on this yere craft, after you and Mr. Hoste, sir, and the first luff allus goes with a cuttin' out expedition."

"You shall come, cox'n," said Macartney, smiling at the quaint logic. "Look well to your cutlass and pistol."

The boat by this time had drawn past the row of storehouses. Back of them was comparative darkness. They screened the place from the light of the burning ships. Into a black, cavernous recess Macartney cautiously steered the cutter. There was a landing-place, an old and disused wharf. A flight of rotting wooden steps led to a small pier opening upon a narrow alley between high, dark buildings on either side.

"Goodbye," said Macartney, clasping the boy's hand. "Remember what I told you. Come, cox'n."

CHAPTER X

CONFRONTING THE MOB

BARING his sword and seizing a pistol in his left hand, in which his example was followed by the old sailor, Macartney sprang up the steps and moved quickly but cautiously up the dark alley. Some distance ahead of the pair a fierce blaze of light shot across the passage-way, showing the first intersecting street. It was filled with a horde of frightened people running toward the wharves. There were soldiers there yet. In the confusion Macartney and the sailor, by a quick dash, succeeded in getting across unnoticed.

They ran another block and came to a broad street. Here a crowd of men barred their way. From their uniforms it was easy to see that they were Republican troops. An adjacent house was burning and the place was as light as day. A swift glance put Macartney in possession of the details of the scene.

At the corner of the street, a little party stood at bay, confronting the mob of soldiery which had abandoned all semblance of order and had thrown discipline to the winds. Macartney's heart leaped in his breast as he recognized the Marquis de Vaudémont. In his hand the vice-admiral held a broken sword. By his side with upraised weapon was the young Comte Honoré. Slightly in advance of the two stood the gigantic Brébœuf. He clasped his musket by the barrel and swung it lightly in the air with a threatening movement. Behind these three, with their backs against the wall, stood Aurore and Louise. In spite of her greater size and strength, Aurore covered against her mistress. The woman she loved stood erect, pistol in hand.

The crowd surrounding the little group was growing with each passing moment. Mingled with the soldiers were numbers of the wretched galleyslaves, scum of society, making good use of their unexpected liberty. The marauders urged the mob to great excesses by their yells and cries.

"Down with the aristocrats!"

"To the lantern with them!"

"Give them a volley men! That'll end it quickly!"

"No, no, the bayonet!"

"Vive la République!"

The bayoneting of unarmed men and helpless women and children was a easy pastime, but there was something menacing in the dauntless bearing of the old marquis, even though he was practically weaponless, for his sword had been broken a few inches from the guard, and the rest of it lay in the breast of a dead man at his feet; and there was something so threatening in the appearance of the gigantic Breto who had already cracked two skulls with the butt of his musket, that this gave the crowd a timely pause. The hesitation would be over in a moment however. Indeed, that slow surge toward the wall which would soon develop into a rapid rush had already begun, when Macartney and the coxswain burst upon the scene.

"These are my people! Into 'em, cox'n!" cried Macartney, firing his pistol pointblank into the mob and then hurling it at the nearest man.

The coxswain was as quick as he with his pistol. The crowd yelled in terror and gave way in mad confusion as the two fell upon them. They were both big and powerful men, coming forward on the run. The ship's cutlass at close quarters is a terrible weapon. These had been ground to a razor's edge. The coxswain literally cut in two the nearest man. In an incredible time they had cleared a space before the marquis and his party.

The vice-admiral, calm and serene as usual, had once perceived the diversion effected by the flank attack of the two Englishmen. And he had not been

le. Hurling his broken weapon into the face of the nearest man he wrested his sword from him, and with surprising quickness ran it through the man's body, springing back on guard before anyone could strike at him. Honoré, too, had thrust valiantly at his nearest opponent, while Brébœuf had laid about him furiously with his empty gun. He stood with his legs far apart, swinging it like a flail. The next moment, Macartney and the coxswain ranged themselves on the side of the marquis and Brébœuf.

"It's Captain Macartney!" suddenly cried the comtesse recognizing him in the firelight.

"You come in the nick of time again, monsieur," said the marquis coolly; "but to little purpose, I fear."

"I can at least die with you," answered Macartney, raising his head as he spoke to let the woman he loved know that his declaration referred particularly and exclusively to her.

"They are coming again!" cried Honoré.

With bayonets fixed, the mob swept down upon the little party. No one thought of firing upon them. Indeed, the muskets had been discharged long since and have re-loaded them would have been to lose time. At this time they came on in some sort of order. Bayonet and cutlass met each other stoutly. Brébœuf got thrust through the left arm, but still swung the barrel of his musket—the stock had been beaten to pieces on human heads—with his right arm. The marquis cut down the first man, but his sword was smashed by blow from the butt of a musket which knocked him to the ground. Macartney instantly sprang in front of him and cut down his assailant. The coxswain and young Honoré did their parts equally well.

After a furious lunge Macartney slipped on the stones of the street and fell forward. He recovered himself by a superhuman effort, but found himself temporarily weaponless. The man in front of him grabbed his musket and attempted to strike him down. A pistol cracked behind him and a man fell. Louise fired, saving his life. Not taking time even to turn his head, Macartney stooped for his sword in the noke, seized it, and went desperately for the next man. But the defenders had been crowded back against the wall now, and nothing remained for them but to die fighting.

In the very extreme of their peril, a horseman dashed through the crowd, recklessly scattering them right and left, and drew rein in front of those at bay. He was followed by several other mounted officers who ranged themselves beside him.

"Well, mes enfants," he cried in a sharp, high-pitched, authoritative voice, which was heard distinct above the noise of the crowd, "what have we here?" "Aristocrats!" cried a burly sergeant, who seemed to be in charge of the mob of soldiers.

"Down with the aristocrats!" cried the little officer stantly.

"Ay, down with them! Down with them!" yelled the crowd.

"They have slain a dozen of our men, citizen captain!"

"Leave them to me, my brave friends," said the captain quickly. "I'll see they are well punished. There is little to be gained from them, and there's a glorious battle further on. En avant!"

"Who is he that interposes between us and our vengeance?" cried a soldier suddenly. "Are you an aristocrat, citizen?"

"God forbid!" said the little officer, lifting his huge cocked hat. "Long live the Republic!"

"This is the officer who commanded the Battery of the Fearless!" cried a young officer near the little captain.

"Comrades, I was there," yelled a soldier from the crowd, striking his breast. " 'Tis the very man."

"It's the little captain of artillery!" cried another.

"Ay, he led the assault on the promontory last night! I was with him!" screamed a third.

"Long live the citizen captain!" roared the mob.

"General, since last night, by permission of the Convention," cried one of the other officers.

The little general looked very small on his huge white horse. He was very pale of face and slender of person. He stared at the crowd from his bright eyes, apparently unaffected by their enthusiasm and approval. There was something in his glance that moved them strangely. The yelling died away as he faced the mob.

"You know me then, my braves?" he asked at last, quietly enough. "No one serves the Republic better than I. Leave me these aristocrats. There is better hunting further on."

"Long live the citizen general!" shouted one.

"Come on!" cried another from the surging crowd as the cheer died away.

In another moment the soldiers and the people began to move along the street. The officer on the white horse turned to the marquis.

"Go," he said, "while you have time! We can't stop this slaughter everywhere."

There was a look of pity, of horror, of contempt, upon his handsome face as he spoke. It was easy to see what his opinion was of the laxity of discipline which permitted such scenes.

"This way," said Macartney, pointing down the narrow alley still dark.

Taking the comtesse by the hand, a service which the coxswain performed for Aurore, with Brébœuf and the boy and the marquis in the lead, Macartney urged the fugitives rapidly down the dark street. The next cross street, the only one between them and the wharf, was filled with a larger crowd than the other. They paused in the darkness on the edge of it.

"We shall never win through!" said the marquis quickly.

"We must!" cried Macartney. "Follow me," he said boldly, after a moment's thought. Before him he saw a red cap, the characteristic bonnet of the Republic, lying in the street. He took off his coat and threw it with his cocked hat back in the darkness of the alley. Then he put on the red liberty cap.

"Don't say a word," he whispered to the coxswain as they entered the street. "If you value your life, silence, and follow me!"

In a moment they were in the middle of the street.

"Who comes here?" cried a party of soldiers stopping their progress.

"Vive la République!" instantly cried Macartney in the excellent French of which he was a master. "Behold, comrades, a party of aristocrats I have captured."

The marquis without hesitation instantly gave color to Macartney's assertion by shouting "Vive le roi!"

"Way there!" cried a sub-officer, who seemed to be in command, "let the brave citizen pass."

The procession through the street which had temporarily slowed up surged toward the quays again, and Macartney, every sense strung to its highest tension, half led, half forced his party across the street. Just as they reached the other side the coxswain stumbled, and called out as he fell. He was heard, and suspected at once. There was something about the whole party that was suspicious.

"They are Englishmen!" roared a man, catching the coxswain by the shoulder.

The sailor balled his fist, and stopped further explanation by a terrific blow upon the jaw of his enemy. The damage had been done, however. The cry alarmed the crowd, which once more halted and faced toward the alley.

A stout, burly man, with his arm in a sling, forced his way to the front. In the light, the marquis recognized the face of Garron, and that worthy instantly discovered the old man.

" 'Tis the ci-devant Marquis de Vaudémont!" roared Garron, "and Englishmen. At them, citizens!"

"We must run for it," cried Macartney.

"From this canaille! Never!" said the marquis; but the Irishman did not wait a second.

Tightening his hold upon the young comtesse, with his other hand he grabbed the smaller man by the arm, although to do so he was forced to drop his sword. Shouting to the others he plunged down the alley in the darkness. It would have been easy for the Republicans to have caught them had they known just what to do. But, instead of pursuing, those nearest the alley leveled their pieces and fired in the direction of the fugitives.

One bullet cut across Macartney's forehead, covering his face with blood in an instant. Another nicked the arm of the comtesse. Brébœuf got a third in the shoulder. A fourth tore the hat from the coxswain. The rest of the party were uninjured.

A faint scream from the woman by his side apprised Macartney that she, whom he loved, was wounded. Instantly the Irishman released the marquis and picked her up in his arms. He did so on the dead run, not checking his pace for a second. The sound of the firing had taken away from the marquis all desire to remain. His dignity was hopelessly shattered by this time in the wild flight, and he valiantly kept up with the rest.

A few steps brought them to the wharf. The alley was now filled with a mass of soldiers running toward them. The boat was not at the landing, but as they reached it she shot out of the darkness, fairly jumping forward under the eager stroke of her oarsmen.

"This way, men!" shouted Macartney. "Marines, out on the wharf! Bear a hand! For your lives!"

"Hold water!" cried Mr. Hoste from the stern-sheets of the cutter. "Stern all! Ship your oars to starboard there! Now, out with you!"

His readiness and skill had brought the boat to the landing without the loss of a moment. Before she was fairly alongside the marines leaped for the stairs.

"Give them a volley!" shouted Macartney as they passed him. "Lively!"

The alley was dark, but the light from the street behind threw the figures of the approaching Frenchmen into relief. The marines were firing from darkness to the light and their range was pointblank. The whole front of the Republicans went down before the well-aimed volley of the sea-soldiers. The discharge was in the nature of a surprise. The advance of the mob was checked, they were thrown into confusion.

Under cover of the volley Macartney had passed the women, the marquis and the young Comte Honoré to the stern-sheets. The coxswain took his accustomed place in the coxswain's box. Then the sailor called the marines into the boat. Brébœuf crowded among them, the officers scrambled aboard, and thrust the cutter violently from the shore. Macartney stood in the bow and called for the men at the oars, who were all armed with heavy pistols, to pass up their weapons. In a moment the six marines, with himself and Brébœuf, found themselves once more armed.

The Republican soldiers recovering from their surprise came running down the alley and swarmed out on the landing-stage. Beneath them, a few feet away was the boat. The men had broken out their oars and were backing lustily toward the frigate. As they drew past the storehouses they came fairly within the zone of light from the burning ships. A cry of rage broke from the soldiery.

"Fire upon them, men! Fire!" ordered Macartney lifting his pistol.

The range was short, and several men fell from the volley which was delivered. The boat had swung around by this time and was fairly jumping through the water, increasing its distance from the wharf at every stroke. The mass of soldiers had previously discharged their pieces. A few, however, ran to the edge and fired at the boat. One of the marines was hit and instantly killed. One of the oars was smashed but otherwise no damage was done. Before another volley could be fired, the cutter was out of range. Macartney called to see if anyone else had been hurt, and being informed in the negative, directed Mr. Hoste to bring the boat alongside the frigate.

CHAPTER XI

THE DASH OF THE "INCONSTANT"

THE Inconstant was the last English ship in the harbor. From where she lay she was comparatively immune from the enemy's fire. As soon as she got under way, however, she would be compelled to run the gauntlet of the French batteries. Triumphantly Macartney gave the orders to get under way.

In a very short time after, the frigate was heading straight through the channel with the wind on her quarter, going furiously.

"Very handsomely done, sir," said the old marquis, who had stood back of the captain noting every manœuvre with the greatest pleasure.

"Thank you, sir."

"You will not get past without a shot, though," continued the vice-admiral, his glance sweeping the shore. "Ay, sir. 'Twill be warm work for the moment. But the ship is a fast goer. We'll soon draw out from the batteries unless they should cripple us by a lucky shot."

"They are poor gunners, these Republicans."

"Yes," said Macartney. "They are learning, however. Perhaps you would be safer below, admiral."

The marquis smiled.

"I never went below on a ship in action in all my life and I do not propose to do so now. But you, Louise—"

"I stay with you, sir," answered the girl.

"Mr. Frazier," said Macartney to his first lieutenant as he handed him his trumpet, "get the men to their quarters. Cast loose and provide both batteries. Double shot the guns. We'll get it from both sides. Let the lieutenants station the new hands among our own crew. We've plenty of men!"

In a moment the grim rattling of the drum beating to quarters started everybody to activity. In a few minutes the first lieutenant reported all was ready. Macartney's glance swept the outer harbor, the entrance to which they were approaching. It would be, perhaps, five or ten minutes before they would be fairly abreast the batteries.

"Hold on as you are, Mr. Frazier," said Macartney turning toward his cabin. "I shall return in a few moments."

"You are wounded!" said Louise putting out a detaining hand as he passed her. "I have watched you—wanted to help you—but you had no time."

" 'Tis a trifle, mademoiselle," answered the happy Macartney, in truth very glad that the bullet had touched him where it did.

"And you were wounded for me," added the girl. "Let me help you."

"Sure an' I wouldn't object if it had taken off an arm if it was in your service, mademoiselle!"

"Your face is covered with blood, monsieur!"

"I must be a nice looking spectacle," said the captain, feeling his cheek, on which the blood had dried.

"Won't you have a doctor?"

"He is busy with the poor fellows who were wounded."

"I have some little skill. Won't you let me—"

"But it is nothing, I tell you."

"I insist! Grandfather, I wish to dress Captain Macartney's wound for him."

Ready to Enter Tibet's Sacred City

REV. A. L. SHELTON AND MRS. SHELTON

JUST now Great Britain has on her hands a "little war." An army has passed through the mountains into Western Tibet, and recently a storming party went out from Gyantse and captured certain outlying forts. The current question is: What are Great Britain's intentions in sending Colonel Younghusband on this mission into the "forbidden land"? It is reported that Lord Curzon, who is now in England, will urge upon the British Government the importance of establishing a permanent Embassy at Lhasa, the sacred capital of the Lamas; it is the only city in the world into which foreigners are forbidden to enter.

An army may open the door in Tibet, but peace and safety can only be secured by the soldiers of the Cross. Three new missionaries are now on their way to the forbidden land. They are somewhere near the borders of inner Tibet, and are under appointment of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society. They will push their way to Lhasa if possible, and in the event of the British opening that city to the world, these may be the first Christian missionaries to preach the Gospel in the "Forbidden City." They have been en route about twelve months, having spent the past winter in China. Early last spring they started on toward Lhasa.

The Rev. A. L. Shelton will do evangelistic work, and Mrs. Dr. A. L. Shelton will assist Mrs. Dr. Susie C. Rijnhart in medical mission work. Dr. Rijnhart (who appears in Tibetan costume, seated upon the ground, eating rice from a bowl with chopsticks), was in Tibet before. Her story is one of the saddest and most distressing in its suffering and bereavement in the annals of modern missions.

In 1894 she was married to Petrus Rijnhart, and with him started to Tibet, in company with William N. Furguson. Readers of this journal already know the history of their wonderful experiences in that strange and inhospitable country, the full record of which has appeared in these pages. While they were still pursuing their journey, amid many difficulties, Mr. Rijnhart disappeared. His fate has ever since remained a mystery.

Mrs. Rijnhart, though she lost her husband in that land of cruelty and death, yet says: "Tibet, like other lands, must have the light. The command is, 'Go, preach the Gospel to every creature.' The work is great—so great that beside its greatness any sacrifice involved in its accomplishment seems small. Mr. Rijnhart frequently gave expression to his one burning ambition to be of service in evangelizing Tibet—whether by his life or his death, he said it did not matter to him . . . Remembering his consecration, I too can be strong and say, God doeth all things well—the sacrifice was not too great."

S. T. WILLIS.

The British Expedition to Tibet is now nearing Lhasa, the capital. A London despatch, dated Aug. 5, says: "The expedition, under command of Gen. Macdonald, crossed the river Brahmaputra to-day, and is, therefore, within less than forty miles of Lhasa, the capital."

"Col. Younghusband, the Civil Commissioner with the expedition, had two interviews with Tibetan peace delegates from Lhasa, who were found to have abandoned their arrogant attitude. They appealed to Col. Younghusband to stop short of Lhasa, saying that if the British should enter the sacred city the Dalai Lama might die of the shock to his religious feelings. Col. Younghusband replied that the proposed treaty must be signed in Lhasa. He promised that none of the British would enter the monasteries if they were not fired upon from them, and that the expedition would leave Lhasa as soon as the treaty was signed."

MRS. RIJNHART IN TIBETAN COSTUME

He is Missed at the Mission

As a mother mourns the loss of a beloved son, so Mrs. Bird weeps for Victor Benke; as for a brother gone from his side, so sorrows John Hallimond, the Superintendent of the Bowery Mission; the circle of workers among whom he had toiled for so many years, look in vain for the cheer of his presence and the magic music that came from the soul within him.

The men who gather nightly within the walls of the old Mission, no longer are moved by the charm of the organ notes, or by the simple sincerity of Benke's spoken words, as he pleaded with those before him, to forsake the rough, stony paths they were stumbling along, and walk in wisdom's ways, where all the paths are peace. The poor wayfarer, shivering in the physical retribution which so surely overtakes those who throw away the birthright of decency for the mess of Bowery pottage, never more will be drawn within the Mission doors, to listen to "just one song." Never more will Victor Benke stand bravely before the listening throng, and tell the story of how he was lost, and how found. His work is done, his earthly song is ended; but he still lives in the hearts and memories of those with whom he toiled so long for the salvation of the poor, the wretched, and the afflicted.

He will never be forgotten by anyone who ever heard him speak in those wonderful meetings that are held down in the Bowery. His speaking voice was wonderfully sweet, earnest and most persuasive; in it there was no tinge of self-righteousness, no hint of cant, but plain and straightforward were the arguments he used to show the men before him that he knew just how they felt, just what the wages of sin were—he had earned them. Then would come an impassioned plea that they forsake their evil ways, and throw themselves on the mercy of the Lord Jesus, which had saved him; they would find it the same as he had. He had come for the cup of coffee, and wanted nothing else, the first time he came to the Mission; but he had found salvation, in spite of his stubborn denial that he neither wanted or needed it.

Dear Mother Bird plead with him, he said, and called him "her boy," and loved him, and told him of the Saviour. Mr. Hallimond showed him the way to his Father's house, and he entered in, penitent and humbled, his stiff-necked, stubborn pride broken, a truly contrite sinner. Then in encouragement he would say, "What did I do, I have no work; I cannot play the organ all the time; I must work; I must show I am in earnest, that I leave the old life behind. I must earn my bread and my coffee; I cannot play dances, that is the old life, so what must I do? know. I scrub the Mission floor, I sleep on the hard benches; by and by I was promoted; I make the bed in the lodging-house, and I earn $2 a week," and then with a quiet humor all his own, he would add, "when the good people of the Mission make up their minds am in earnest, and will not be spoiled by so much prosperity, I find I can earn three and four dollars a week. I was done with the old life; I love the new; I find myself happy in working for the dear Jesus who had saved me." Then after a pause, the speaker would throw in the earnestness of which he was capable into his last argument. "It was so good for me, what is the matter with it for you?"

This was a commonsense, unanswerable argument and when the man who meant all he said knelt with those whom his words had touched, they knew his prayer was no lip service, but that it came straight from his heart, and many were convinced thereby, and turned from their evil ways, and there was joy in the Bowery over the repentant; and no stronger earthly helping hand was there stretched forth in brotherly love than that of our lamented brother, Victor Benke, the "Volunteer Organist."

BISHOP POTTER AND THE SALOON

The Devil's Own Weapons

The Rev. E. Warren, of the Wylie-Chambers Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, says: "The Bishop cannot cure drunkenness with a saloon, even of advanced pattern. He cannot fight intemperance with the devil's own weapons. Bishop Potter views the liquor traffic from the point of view of the aristocrat. Being accustomed to Club life, he has seen liquor dispensed under only the most favorable conditions, and doesn't understand the common thirst for drink. I believe Bishop Potter is seeking notoriety, and he will get enough of it some day."

Discredited by Episcopalians

Bishop I. L. Nicholson, of Milwaukee, said: "I am deeply humiliated over Bishop Potter's action, and, in my opinion, his whole connection with this affair has been disgraceful. For my part, I am ashamed of him. I am more radical in my views on moral questions than many others, and, I believe, that we should always take the highest possible ground on moral issues. I have no regard whatever for the claims made for this particular saloon. It is a bad business all the way through. It is not the first time that Bishop Potter has offended. His latest action is unfortunate, because it necessarily reflects on the Church, although it is his own individual action and the Church is in no way responsible.

"Bishop Potter is not a great man in the Episcopal Church. He is regarded as an influential man by some outside of the Church, but not in it. He has no standing with the other Bishops, and has no influence in church legislation. No action will be taken by the Church in this instance, not even the passing of resolutions of protest. It is not worth it. The only thing we can any of us do is to say that we are humiliated and ashamed."

A Ridiculous Movement

Bishop Potter has brought into ridicule the movement for a religious liquor traffic, and instead of there being a storm in the religious world because of his proceeding, there ought to be rejoicing, that by reducing its theory to an absurdity he has killed a preposterous undertaking.

A. Y. Sun.

"An Underground Way to Hell"

The Rev. J. T. McCrory, pastor of the Third United Presbyterian Church, and head of the Sabbath Observance Association, said: "Bishop Potter did wrong. Because he takes a drink in his club himself, he should not put it in the way of other people. I consider his having the 'Doxology' sung there little less than blasphemy. I suppose that 'Subway Tavern' was called that because it is an underground way to hell."

Christ and Satan as Partners

The Rev. Charles H. Elder, of Trenton, N. J., says: "Bishop Potter's friendly interest in the Subway saloon brings Christ and Satan into disgraceful business partnership. He should take off his ecclesiastical robes and put on a bartender's apron."

Bishop Potter's Blunder

An Episcopal pastor writes to a New York paper: "Many a poor family, ruined by the curse of drink, will raise the cry of piteous despair, when they remember that 'the drinking habit,' which ruined their home, has had the official endorsement of their Bishop. Bishop Potter had been a leading layman, the matter would have assumed a different aspect but he is a Bishop of the Church of Christ who solemnly promised at the time of his consecration, that he would 'show himself in all things an example of good works unto others, that the adversary may be ashamed having nothing to say against him.'"

Drinking is Degradation

Mrs. Ella A. Boole, formerly President of the New York branch of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, said: "We are absolutely opposed to any such institution, and while Bishop Potter was acting in his private right, he is a high dignitary of the Church and it is a matter of regret that he should lend himself to the dedication of a saloon. We object to the new tavern on the very ground upon which its vindication is attempted—that it seeks to make drinking respectable. The principle of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union is that drinking should be kept a thing of degradation." N. Y. Times.

Heroines of North Brother Island

THE TRIO OF HEROINE LIFE SAVERS

1. Mary McCann 2. Pauline Pultz 3. Emma O'Connell

AMID the many heroic incidents connected with the terrible Slocum disaster—when a thousand excursionists perished—not the least noble and self-sacrificing were those that occurred on North Brother Island, where a few brave women performed work of rescue that will long be remembered in New York with admiration and gratitude.

When the blazing boat reached North Brother Island, it was run aground near the sea-wall, and there as then enacted a scene, never-to-be forgotten by any who witnessed it. Flames were roaring and bursting from every part of the doomed boat, and the people leaping from her decks, until the waters became a veritable sea of death. One survivor said, "You could have walked ashore upon the floating bodies." Hundreds of men, women and children were struggling in the water, and others were hurling themselves upon those already exhausted from their efforts to keep afloat. Their struggles were observed by the people on the island, on which are situated the city hospitals for contagious diseases. Every man and woman hastened to the beach, and did most heroic work in saving life and caring for the dead and dying. From the officers in charge, down to the humblest scullery maid, there was but one thought—to succor and help the perishing hundreds.

"We only did our duty, nothing but our plain duty," said Miss Smith, the head nurse, to the writer. "We did not have time to think, it came so quickly, this awful emergency. There is where the Slocum went aground," said she, "and here, on this lawn, and under the trees near the sea-wall, we laid the bodies, leaving aisles between, so that the doctors and nurses could attend to the injured, and the coroner and his assistants could come over and mark the dead."

The lawn is spacious, but was entirely covered with the dead in a short time. The trees and shrubbery were scorched and withered, and, in some instances entirely killed, by the intensity of the heat from the burning steamer.

No fear of fire or flame, however, kept the brave workers of North Brother Island from doing all in human power for the rescue of the burned and drowning unfortunates. The courage of the women and girls connected with the hospitals was something wonderful to witness. Hearing the screams, they rushed down to the water's edge, and several of them flung themselves into the water, wading in and out, each time bringing with them some half-drowned woman or child.

Mary McCann, a young Irish girl of seventeen, thus saved six lives, and only gave up when almost exhausted from struggling with those whom she was assisting, and who, more than once, very nearly dragged her down. In telling the story, Mary spoke of one little boy, who was so frightened that he fought viciously, biting his rescuer's shoulder while she was carrying him ashore. As she was struggling with this boy, another baby floated so near Mary, that she caught him by the arm, and made her way to safety with both children.

"I had to," she said simply; "sure, he would have drowned before I could have got back again."

Three more dashes into the water resulted in the saving of three more boys. The wind drove the flames and smoke on the shore side of the boat, so that the water was hot and the air filled with burning particles which fell to the surface, painfully burning both rescuers and rescued. Half blinded with smoke, the brave girl kept at her work; all around her were people sinking, struggling and dying, their arms stretched out in what was for many a helpless appeal. As Mary was trying to single out one to help, she had swam out until the water was up to her neck, and she found precarious footing upon a slippery rock. Suddenly she felt herself clutched from below. It was a girl of about fifteen who had grasped Mary about the knees. "I tried," said she, "to loosen her hold and save her; but she pulled me down. My feet slipped on the rocks and I nearly went under. Then I screamed for help, and loosening the girl's hold, I started for the shore, bringing the girl along. I could not have reached the shore if some one had not helped me, and fished us both out. I would have gone back again, but they would not let me."

Mary McCann is only a poor Irish immigrant girl, lately landed, and was but a few days out of the hospital, convalescent from an attack of the measles. She has the soul of a true heroine. Her bravery is only equalled by her modesty. When told that she was to receive a gold medal and a purse, she said, "I'm not caring for the money, I did no more than I ought, but I'd be proud to own the medal."

Swimming out to the Slocum, Pauline Pultz, a slender, black-eyed girl, climbed into the paddle-box and brought off a baby girl. After getting ashore with her limp little burden, Pauline discovered that the baby's jaw was dislocated. Tenderly putting it in place, she held it there until the doctor relieved her and bound the jaw in its place. This was a most heroic rescue, as the paddle-box was at a dangerous incline and almost inaccessible to any one but an expert swimmer and climber. Miss Pultz wears a medal for having saved several persons from drowning in the waters around New York. She is a strong swimmer, and was untiring on this disastrous occasion.

Emma O'Connell is the third in this trio of young heroines, and was instrumental in saving a number of lives, going into the water several times.

While all this was going on, the Matron, Mrs. Kate L. White, and Miss Edith V. D. Smith, the head nurse, were working with the doctors among the long rows of the injured, many of whom were saved by timely treatment. Mrs. White went into the water several times, as did Miss Smith also; but in a time of such awful calamity there were many deeds of heroism which are not remembered even by those who performed them. Amid that ghastly, floating sea of forms and faces, there was no time to think, no time to watch, only time to do. It needed no command for every one to do their utmost to help.

Some idea of the stupendousness of the work done may be gained from the fact, that after having used up all the hospital supplies of bed and table linen, three thousand yards of cheese-cloth was brought from down town, and used that same night by the doctors and nurses in attending to the injured, and in covering the dead.

The burning of the Slocum, and the destruction of so many lives was an awful calamity; but it served to show of what metal men and women are composed when called upon to act at such a time. In all the long roster of those who faced death themselves to save others, none shine more brightly than those of the heroines of North Brother Island.

MISS SMITH, HEAD-NURSE, AND HER BRAVE CORPS OF WORKERS

A TALK ON CHARACTER-BUILDING

MAN is the only animal ever created with a character, and he lost that according to the official record; and while many disclaim faith in the doctrine of the "fall of man," they present a worse doctrine of man's origin, making his beginning simultaneous with the characterless creatures of the jungle or bush.

The physical supremacy of man, due to his mental and spiritual nature, is a philosophy as deep as life. The realization of an inglorious birth must be the most depressing and galling burden ever borne by a human being. "Founding," "woodscolt," or "maverick," spoken as a brand of one's beginning, places the social unit upon the unfortunate, until the real character unfolds and commands respect. I sent the diabolical insult that we are a race of educated monkeys, having outgrown the bits of our ancestry by some process of evolution, and that we ride on trains, street cars, etc., read books, newspapers; telephone and telegraph with or without wires, live and die as men, while our ancestors, according to the "scientific" theory, had "chimpanzee" as their only epitaph.

I was out West some time ago on a hunting trip. Our cook was an old pioneer of Southern Oregon, illiterate, but as witty as he was crude. An experience with an evolutionist, which he had some years before, was interesting. He described the incident as follows: "The stranger said, our fore-parents was from jimpanzys." (He added very knowingly), "Now a jimpanzy is a kind of a monkey. 'Well,' says I to him, 'you may be a son of a jimpanzy, but I want you to know that I am not.'"

I am with the old pioneer.

I asked Herr Boccus, of Germany, while abroad last fall, this question: "What do you think about the missing link?" He replied, "It is still missing."

Character-building depends upon the standard of man's mentality. Man's mentality is the battle-ground of his spiritual and physical faculties, where defeats are registered or victories won.

The formation of the brain of man is so infinitely superior to the animal life at his feet, that Agassiz's statement, "There is no possibility of a higher being than man himself," in a physical sense, is demonstrated. Man's brain is poised at right angles with the spinal cord. Perfection is attained. One step forward is impossible; one step backward means a lower order of brain force. Brain proportion to spinal cord, silences the unscientific doctrines of evolution. In fish, the proportion is as two to one; in reptiles two and one-half to one; in birds three to one; in mammals, quadrupeds, and quadrumana, four to one; in man, it is thirty-three to one. The steps of brain proportion to spinal cord are graded in half numbers. Subtract four from thirty-three and you have twenty-nine. Multiply twenty-nine by two, and between man and the highest order of other mammals there are fifty-eight missing links.

Man builds fires, makes clothing, digs gold, silver and precious stones from the earth, counts the stars, cuts diamonds, invents machines and mechanical devices, builds houses and cities with brick and stone. His boats navigate the seas. He reduces the air to liquids and solids, harnesses the lightning, sows seed, reaps grain, paints pictures, markets his masterpieces, and stands out in the animal world intellectually, the unapproachable giant! His endowment of artistic, inventive, mechanical and social genius is not an accident. What matchless design! Man's mind tells of a matchless Creator! This world, with its sunlight and shadows, cold and heat, mountains and plains, thorns and thistles, roses and buttercups, living and dying, warriors and rulers, art, literature, science, invention and discovery, is a university of magical resources for man's mental, moral and spiritual progress, and his character depends upon the usages of all of these means.

Mind culture and physical culture are talked of a great deal. Become a rugged thinker. Do not ask an idea into your head and starve it. Feed your mind upon good blood, made of fresh air, pure water, wholesome food, good rest and good morals; then you can offer some inducements for ideas to board at your house—and they pay well for their entertainment. If they are pure thoughts, they will ennoble your face with lines of purity; but if they are black and evil, they will trace the lines of every crime in the category of crookedness upon your face, and you will be a living Epistle, known and read of all men.

Abraham Lincoln had in his make-up all the sturdiness of the hickory, elm and oak, his boyhood companions in the timber. There are lessons deep and grand to learn from the environs of one's life—the strength, resistance and steadfastness of the forest; the sweetness, evenness and silence of the calm meadow; the rippling humor of the brooklet; the dashing brilliancy of the mountain stream; the stanch, granitic stability of the mountains; the polished surface of the city.

Character is like beautiful scenery—scarce in some places. Begin landscape gardening at home, your neighbors will like it. Character is home grown. What kind of seed are you sowing? FRENCH E. OLIVER.

The Divine Cure of Fear

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON,

BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS*

THE JUNIPER

The Confessions of Elijah

All me! I was a coward that day I fled from Jezebel. I cannot fall back on my great weariness as sufficient excuse. It is true that the encounter with the priests of Baal on Mt. Carmel was a great draught upon my physical endurance, and after that, my twelve-mile run to Jezreel. I, who was not afraid to defy the king of Israel, and the four hundred and fifty priests of Baal and the gathered throng of Israel, I quailed before a woman. It is true she was a bold, bad woman, and sent me word that she would let me live but one day more, because her priests of Baal had been killed by my command. But what was that to me! Why had I any need to fear her, with God and his angel host ever about me? Surely Satan got a grip on me in that hour, and led me to flee. It seems I had strength to flee on a ninety-five mile journey. Better I had used that strength in withstanding Jezebel. I, a weary fugitive under a juniper tree, praying to die, when I might have gone from Carmel conquering and to conquer. To what depths of humiliation a man may be brought when he forgets to trust in God! But even to that juniper tree the merciful kindness of the Lord followed me. He gave me sleep, and then food and water again and again by the hand of his angel, as I lay there under the bush, limp in body and mind. And when I had become strong again, the angel told me that I was to journey in to Mt. Horeb, when God himself would meet me. Ah, then, I, who had dishonored him, was not to be forsaken by him. He still had use for me. The journey was a long one. I was forty days on the way; but there was no weariness in it, for I was again strong in God. My spirit and body was infused with his strength. I was so sustained by him that I did not need food. I went that whole forty days and forty nights of my journey in the strength of the food which the angel had brought to me under the juniper bush. But I cannot forget that the Lord was with me on Mt. Carmel, and but for my wicked cowardice I need not have journeyed to Mt. Horeb to find him again.

Illustration and Application

This story discloses, first, the human causes of fear, and, second, its divine cure.

1. Human Causes of Fear. "Elijah was a man of like passions with us"—there is no longer any doubt about that. On Mount Carmel, in his victory as an "army of one" over the wicked king and false prophets and misled populace, he seemed a demigod, incapable of fear. But under the juniper tree, wishing to die because a sharp-tongued woman had threatened him—"one touch of nature makes the whole world kin." We are glad he got discouraged. Now we know that even such natural cowards as we are may supernaturally become heroes through the vision of God. But why did Elijah lose his courage? Perhaps we may learn how to help God save us from falling from Carmel's heights into such a ditch by studying the why of his fears. There was a physical as well as a moral cause.

A careful reader will see just where Elijah's courage failed him—in the last verse of the last lesson, where it says of his twelve-mile run as a herald before Ahab's chariot, that he "ran to the entrance of Jezreel." Some commentator who thinks himself bound to defend every act of every good man in the Bible, ingeniously suggests that this illustrates how Elijah combined "prudence" with courage. Jezebel was just beyond the gates, and it was "prudent" to avoid an encounter with her in the rage of defeat. The sequel shows it was not prudence but rank cowardice. And one reason was, that Elijah had worked too hard and eaten too little. After a time of spiritual uplift, there naturally comes a reaction. Ocean depths are found to correspond with mountain heights, and so great depression often follows great exaltation in spiritual life. Such reactions should be guarded against by due care of the body. Like many a preacher in revival times, Elijah forgot he was human. As if his mighty appeals to the false prophets, and to the people, and to God, were not exhausting enough, he ran twelve miles before swift horses, through the dust and heat of a famine-cursed land. We are not sure God told him to do that without any stop for refreshments. As he drew near the end of the journey, the excitement that had held him up, slackened, and in physical collapse his stomach and his courage gave way together. A measure of fasting increases one's sense of dependence on God, but extreme hunger and exhaustion makes one feel there is no God or good in the world.

God made man's body as well as his soul, and made them mutually helpful, and we must not neglect either. This lesson affords a good occasion for teaching the young, especially, how not to "put an array of difficulties over against themselves by their appetites, that are more than a match for their prayers." In a temperance lesson soon, we shall have opportunity to consider the worst wrong Appetite does to the body. And sometime in tactful delicacy, very plain teaching ought to be given as to the wrongs "lust" does to our wonderful bodies in their most godlike powers.

But to-day let us consider the small sins against the body, that because they seem small are the more common. In some cases they are like the little thieves that open the doors for the bigger ones. It is a Christian duty to eat enough, but not too much. There are some Christians who give too little thought to food. They develop mind and soul, but neglect the physical organism through which alone the invisible man can make his thoughts effective. To such, Henry Ward Beecher said, "You are too heavy for the animal you ride." Some Christians are paler than they have any business to be. There is a golden mean between the deathly white of the ascetic prophet and the sensual red of the fat priest. But that "golden mean" is not yellow. No preacher with a bad liver can fairly represent the fact that religion makes life worth living. And in every Christian home food may be a help to faith—or a hindrance.

But the causes of Elijah's loss of courage were not wholly physical. Christ, too, was feeling physical exhaustion when he was tempted, and he successfully faced the one being worse than Jezebel, the devil, by drawing out of memory, as a shield of steel, the promises of God. Elijah allowed the threats of Jezebel to get in his soul and displace the Word of God, and so the outcome was that he fled. Strangely, he forgot his own name—that is, he forgot its significance—Elijah, God my strength. A mother and father stood beside the cot of their new baby. "We must give the little one a significant name," said the father, "something that will testify to the world that after all the trials we have passed through, this sweet babe has been sent of God to comfort us. People say, 'What's in a name?' and I always answer, 'a great deal.' We know how God often changed the names of his own the simple reason that the muscles are all the while relaxing under the strain put upon them. It is not sufficient that you once for all lay hold of Christ, but day by day that grip faith must be renewed.

In spite of all the illustrations the Bible gives of the foil and sin of fear, how, like a plague, fears and cares and worries crowd into the lives even of professing Christians greatly to the dishonor of God; and all these bring to the onlooking outside sinners, hungry for rest and peace and joy, a false report of the good land of a real Christian experience, where "perfect love casteth out fear." Even little things, the flies and mosquitoes and rain-drops and microbes prompt us to sinful murmurings.

"Germs cause an enormous amount of sickness, don't they?" said the superficially informed man. "Yes," answered the old-fashioned doctor. "If they don't get into man's system, they are liable to get on his mind and work him half to death."

Stanley tells us that more of his men were killed by jiggers than by elephants. The jigger, you know, is a little microscopic insect which burrows in the flesh and poisons the blood. If the truth were told on tomb-stones, one-half the epitaphs would be, "Died of mosquito bites and jiggers." It is the little worries and bothers of life that irritate and weigh down and destroy us. A young lady said to a worker on telephone lines and ocean cables, "I suppose the sea monster often damage the cables?" "No, their chief peril is from a minute worm that eats through the insulator, exposing the wire to the water, and so breaking connection. And the greatest enemy to telegraph poles in Africa, is not the hurricanes but the ants." So it is not some mighty Jezebel threatening to kill us, that drives me of us to the juniper tree, but some petty worry or fear.

Grant us, O Lord, the grace to bear
The little pricking thorn;
The hasty word that seems unfair;
The twang of truths well worn;
The jest that makes our weakness plain;
The darling plan o'erturned;
The careless touch upon our pain;
The slight we have not earned;
The rasp of care. Dear Lord to-day,
Lest all these fretting things
Make needless grief, O give, we pray,
The heart that trusts and sings.

ELIZABETH LINCOLN GOULD

"AS HE LAY UNDER A JUNIPER TREE, BEHOLD, THEN AN ANGEL TOUCHED HIM"

servants to remind them of some signal mercy. Even I have been helped by my name John, which means the grace, the unmerited mercy, of God. So we will call this child Dorothea, the gift of God. It will be a witness of our own thankfulness and faith, and may be a help to our child when she grows up." Eight years later, Dorothea, who had been taught the meaning of her name, was playing with another girl, who suggested they should do something forbidden. Dorothea said, "I should like to—but—oh, I do wish that father had not given me such a name." Her playmate answered, "What has that to do with it?" "Why, don't you see? I want to be naughty, sometimes. I want to be naughty now, very much indeed. But when I think of my name I really can't be, for how can 'God's gift' be bad?" The mother overheard the talk, and was glad. Many of us have names that wrap up a prayer of our parents that we may be like some noble person we are named after, or perhaps the name itself sets up a noble ideal we should make real. Let each one look in the dictionary for the meaning of his name, or find out the noblest thing his namesake did, and make the name as noble again, if not as famous.

Elijah not only forgot the promises of God, even the one in his own name, he also lost, for the moment, the vision of God, by allowing the vision of Jezebel to get in his heart. John Knox, in like case, rebuked the wicked Mary Queen of Scots without fear, because the face of God was ever before him, making it impossible to fear the face of man, or even woman. It is a well known physiological law that when one grasps firmly a bar, as in manual exercise, he must be all the while tightening his grip upon it, or he will lose his hold, for

2. The Divine Cure of Fear. This is a good time to hunt up the four score "fear nots" of the Bible. Nearly all God's heroes, at times, need encouragement. The apostles, even when Jesus was with them on the sea, feared the waves. How many times he had to say in substance, "Be not afraid; only believe!" God sent an angel to discourage Elijah under the juniper tree who gave him food and drink again and again the lack of which was one cause of his fears.

Perhaps one thing that led Elijah to forget God, was success, leading to pride rather than thanksgiving. Now defeat brings him back in humility to God. As with Peter on the waves of Galilee, so with Elijah in another sense, "sinning times are praying times."

Isn't it a very curious thing that the tendril of a climbing plant will not turn like a leaf to the light, but away from the light to the shadow? Why is this? Because the shadow tells it some wonderful, mysterious way that some solid object round which it can twine is casting the shadow near at hand; whereas, if it is all light around it, that shows that there is no solid object round which it can twine near at hand—intercept the light and cast a shadow; and therefore the tendril has learned by experience to turn always to the shadow for support. And so your trouble will reveal to you the presence of the Mighty One, whose shadow it is, and you can lean all your weakness on his Almighty strength.

Prayer changes the life of Elijah from juniper to palm and cedar. He never got under the juniper again, but cast forth strong roots like Lebanon, and flourished in the fruitful beauty of courage "like the palm tree." The Divine cure had changed terror to trust.

An eight-year-old child, with a cut in her hand, was brought to a physician. It was necessary to take a few stitches with a surgeon's needle. While the physician was making preparations, the little girl swung her foot nervously against the chair, and was gently admonished by her mother. "That will do no harm," said the doctor kindly, "as long as you hold your hand still," adding, with a glance at the strained, anxious face of the child, "you may cry as much as you like." "I would rather sing," replied the child. "A right, that would be better. What can you sing?" "I can sing, 'Give, give, said the little stream.' Do you know that?" "I am not sure," responded the doctor. "How does it begin?"

The little patient proceeded to illustrate. "That's beautiful," said the doctor, "I want to hear the whole of it." And the while the skilled fingers were sewing up the wound, the sweet, childish voice sounded bravely through the room, and the only tears shed on the occasion came from the eyes of her mother. It is a physiological fact that some expression of one's feelings tends to lessen pain. Since weeping and groaning are distressing to one's friends, how would it do for us all to try singing instead? Best of all in any trouble, the song that is also a prayer.

We kneel how weak, we rise how full of power.
Why, therefore, should we do ourselves this wrong,
Or others: that we are not always strong,
That we are ever overcome with care,
That we should ever weak or heartless be,
Anxious or troubled?—when with us is prayer;
And joy and strength and courage are with Thee.

IN THE SHADE OF THE VINE

BY MARGARET E SANGSTER

A Little Jaunt

NOW, mother, here are your tickets, and you are to be quite comfy and not worry a single bit. All you have to do is to sit still in this seat till you get to Jericho, at six o'clock this evening, and there Eleanor will meet you. I wish I could have gone with you, dearest, but you know I can't leave John and the children."

"I'll try not to worry, Eunice; but it's a long way to go, and I've never been on the cars before."

"Well, you've only got to sit right still; your luncheon is in the basket, and you can look out the window and see the places flying by. The day will soon pass. I must run, now. Good-bye. The train will be off in a minute."

The young woman named Eunice kissed her mother and ran out of the car. Then she stood smiling on the platform until the train began to move slowly out of the yard. With a final wave of her hand, she walked away, as it pulled swiftly beyond her sight.

Mother was a dear old lady with "country" written all over her, from the plainly parted white hair under the simple black bonnet to the tips of her neatly shod feet. She was evidently one of those sweet, contented stay-at-home women who do not need change of scene every few weeks, and who are very happy in the trivial round, the common task of home. Eleanor, her youngest daughter, had married and gone far away to live, and now, when Eleanor needed her, mother was going out into the strange world. Her sixty years had never known a more formidable and exciting experience than this little jaunt into the unfamiliar.

The lady opposite watched her, and being impressed with the strength and steadiness of the serene old face, finally ventured to speak to her.

"Pardon me," she said, "but you and I are to be neighbors for a day, and I don't know why we should both sit as if we were dumb, when I'm sure we both enjoy talking."

"Indeed I do love to talk," the old lady answered; "but Eunice gave me so many directions about not asking questions and only speaking to the conductor, that I don't like to begin. You see, I've never been more than a few miles from home before, and always having horses, I've been in my own conveyance when I went to Presbytery with father—he was an elder, you must know—or to weddings or funerals. Father died five years ago, and since then I've staid close by my fireside. Eunice wants me to live with her, and John Joseph wants me to come to him, and now Eleanor thinks I ought never to leave her, once I get there. But I'll stay till the baby comes and she is about and all strong, and then, please God, I'll go home."

"You are wise," said the new friend, "to keep under your roof that you've been used to. It's more independent, and you can do as you choose there."

"Yes, I like my own old-fashioned house-keeping, and my Sally, who's been with me thirty years, knows my ways. Sally doesn't find fault if I scrub floors or wash blankets, but lets me do as I please, without a word. At John Joseph's they'd like me to be dressed up like Sunday every day in the week."

Here the old lady paused. Her friend saw that she was gazing with delight at the fields and woods they were passing, and noted that her face grew very bright when they reached the outskirts of a thriving town.

"So many, many houses," she said, "and oh! so many people. It fills me with awe, doesn't it?"

"You ought to see New York, and Paris, and Vienna, dear lady," said her friend.

"I reckon I can do without seeing them. I've read about them," was the answer. "Seems to me I wouldn't want to live in great big places like the world's big cities. Seems to me heaven itself 'll be rather confusing to a person that's fond of quiet. When I get to thinking of the 'ten thousand times ten thousand,' as I do now and then, my brain reels."

"It doesn't need to reel. Jesus has gone to prepare a place for you, and for me, and in that fair land nobody will ever be homesick or confused. I'm sure of that for Jesus has told me so."

The friend had found a name dear to both. In great comfort they traveled the rest of the day. And at sunset, when they separated, the old lady was greeted with joyful exclamations by her daughter Eleanor, waiting for her at the upland station.

When Infirmities Creep On

Time so very gently lays his hand upon people as they advance in years, that they often pay little heed to his encroachments. Deafness, for example, steals on its victim

TRAVELING DOWN HILL TOGETHER

Well, wife, we've been together upon life's cheerful road,
We've faced all sorts of weather, we've halved each heavy load.
Our eyes are on the mountains, whence cometh peace and strength,
We do not mind the roughness, nor fear the pathway's length,
For you and I together, have known the Lord our friend;
God grant that nigh together, we reach our journey's end.

so quietly that he or she does not notice that hearing is less acute, until one morning, the fact is noted that people do not speak so clearly and plainly as they used to do. "I wish folk would not mumble so," says the elderly lady, or the old gentleman, innocently resentful, while the defect is in the ear, and not in the friends who address them. The eyes do not see so well either, and the steps are slower. Yet with patient acceptance, and a resort to science, these handicaps need not be dreaded. Men and women, too, are much younger now at seventy than they once were, and a woman of eighty, who had made a long journey, not long since wrote to a cousin a little younger, "Make haste and go to Norway before you are old!" Granting health and vigor and an even manner of life, people ought to descend the westerling slopes with braveness and comfort, and then, believing in God, and expecting to recover lost youth on Canaan's happy shore, they should "greet the unseen with a cheer!"

An Outgrown Friend

A WOMAN, who is evidently thoughtful and conscientious, writes to this page, and states a certain problem.

Years ago she went to school with a neighbor's daughter. As children, she and the little neighbor were inseparable, and the companionship did not cease in their early girlhood. But as both grew into womanhood, there came a parting of the ways. One was thrown into refined and cultivated society, and her development was in the highest sense, pure, intellectual and spiritual. She read good books. She associated with highly educated people. She traveled, and learned much about art and music. The other remained at home. Her mental growth was arrested. She mingled with persons of commonplace ideals, and her very speech became uncouth, while her aspirations were easily satisfied.

Meeting after the lapse of some years, the two discover that they have little in common except the fading memories of childish days and plays. But the first of the two is tormented by her sensitive conscience. She recoils from the vulgarities of which the other is wholly unaware. She accuses herself of disloyalty, and she wonders what she can do to lift up her former friend to a higher plane. Meanwhile the one who offends by a thousand little infelicities, goes merrily on her way, cheerfully wounding the fastidious gentlewoman without ever suspecting that she does it.

The probability is that the division of interests will continue, and that the separating gulf will widen and widen, and that it cannot be bridged. Proximity had much to do with the juvenile friendship. As each has now her own sphere, why try to perform the impossible? There may not be a reknitting of the old ties. Kindness there may be, and helpfulness, and if opportunity comes, there may be little acts of sincerest courtesy and neighborly offices of unselfish goodwill. But the effort to lift one who prefers to be stationary seldom is crowned with success. It is much better to accept the situation, wave a farewell to the past, and make new friends in the future.

How the Rift was Made

"Celia Voorhees came home last night."

"Did she?" answered Martha Hix, very coldly, going on with her sewing, not a shadow of interest in her face.

"Yes, Abe Slocum brought her from the Springs in his buggy, as the stage had gone, when the last train came in. She looks made over. Fully ten years younger. It's queer you did not know about it, Martha. Why you and Celia used to be such friends."

"Times change," said Martha shortly.

"What's Celia done to you?"

"That's nobody's affair," replied Martha Hix, shutting her mouth like a steel trap. Ellen Lunnirs said no more. She went on her way, and called at a neighbor's, where she brought up the subject of the strange behavior of Martha when Celia was mentioned. The neighbor smiled.

"Two women don't generally love each other if both love the same man. Martha and Celia were devoted friends till Liph Jewett paid attentions to Martha. They were engaged, probably; at all events people thought so, and wherever Martha went—to choir meeting, or concert, or fair, there Liph went too. Celia was at her aunt Mandy's in town that winter."

She got back last February, when Martha was so ill with the mumps. Liph saw her, fresh as a rose, her eyes shining, her cheeks red and her hands flashing when she talked—you know the pretty, animated way Celia has; and he admired her, as who could help, and she was so gay and full of fun and accommodating, he thought her fine. Then, Martha, poor foolish thing, let him see her with her face all tied up and swollen; and that wasn't the worst, when she got better and was able to go out, she was awfully jealous and mad when he praised up Celia. If Martha had had ordinary common sense, Liph wouldn't have left her, and gone to Celia; not he. She put it in his head: then she nagged and found fault and was disagreeable, so that Liph dreaded being in her company. He'd leave her and meet Celia, always so pleasant and so kind o' flattering, and before he knew it, Liph was courting Celia."

"Then the break won't be bridged over?"

"Not likely. Even if Martha marries another man, as she no doubt will, she'll always feel as if Liph had jilted her, and it was somehow Celia's fault."

"The ways of girls are very queer," commented Ellen. "Yes, they are. And if a girl wants to hold a man's love, she must not be exacting before she's married."

The neighbor stepped out to weed her garden. The gossip turned her face homeward. As she passed Celia's gate, she saw Liph's bay mare tied to the hitching post.

Gospel Work in South America

BY EMILIO OLSSON

A PATAGONIAN

South America represents, with its area of 7,000,000 of square miles, a territory nearly twice the size of Europe. It has the most magnificent rivers in the world, and a coast line 16,500 miles long, with the mighty Andes, a marvelous chain of mountains, extending for about 4,700 miles. My travels in the "Neglected Continent" have extended to about 50,000 miles. During these journeyings I have been enabled, by God's help, to circulate over 20,000 copies of the Holy Scriptures, to forty-two nationalities and tribes, and thus possibly to reach about a million souls with the Gospel. My wanderings have taken me through almost impenetrable forests, where I have been surrounded by savage tribes and wild beasts, and where deadly serpents hung overhead and crawled under foot; away from home, friends and civilization. I should have died in despair, but, He who promised, "Lo, I am with you always," was ever my guide and protector.

Millions of Indians still inhabit the interior of South America, who never yet heard the story of the Cross. There are many tribes in the heart of the Continent, from Brazil to Patagonia, that are very little known to the world, and a pathetic plea comes to us from that dark land, unevangelized after nearly 1900 years of the Gospel.

THE evangelization of the world is the greatest of all enterprises. The great command: "Go ye into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature," must be obeyed by every true Christian who loves his Lord and who looks for the coming of the Kingdom.

In one of my journeys from Buenos Ayres to the Amazon River—a distance of over 4,000 miles—I traveled from the River Paraguay across the Bolivian chaco for 1,000 miles on muleback, and down the river Mamoro in Bolivia, shooting the perilous rapids of the Madeira Falls. Thence down the Madeira to the Amazon, a distance of about 3,000 miles. In that journey I did not meet with a single Protestant missionary, but I met a great number of people untaught and uncared for, in pathetic ignorance. Among the tribe of Chiquitanos, to whom I was preaching through an interpreter, I said "the Bible is the Word of God." Some wanted to kiss the book, and kissed my hand; one old man cried like a little child when I read to him John 3:16, and another said it was "good news for him, for it was the first time he had heard it."

One day, I asked my Indian companion whether he had ever heard of Jesus Christ. He answered, "No. Who is he? Where does he live?" What a privilege to tell to these Indians for the first time the wondrous story of the love of God!

The aborigines of the Amazon live in the impenetrable forest of the upper valley and along its tributaries of the Amazon, where hardly any white man has yet penetrated and they roam about much like wild beasts, unclad and untaught. The Indian chiefs of the Amazon bedeck themselves with wonderful adornments and are fierce warriors.

The wide expanse traversed by the Amazon and its tributaries is truly stupendous in extent. The waterway the Amazon unfolds, represents a surface of twenty or more thousand square miles of water. Far away in the depths of a profound solitude, untrodden by white men, amid the pathless intricacies of the primeval forest, luxuriant in foliage, and gigantic in growth, we find the aborigines of the wondrous Amazon.

The difficulty and danger of attempting to reach these inland tribes, explains the world's ignorance of them. I takes three or four months hard traveling from the coast to reach some of the tribes, and sometimes I waited six months before a letter could reach me from my wife and family.

In northern Chili, thirty souls knelt down at one meeting pleading with God to save them. At another meeting in the Pampas, after preaching to a crowd of men from the nitrate district, I sold thirty-five Bibles. Every man who could read a little bought a copy of God's Book. The Bible is God's best missionary. I never travel without carrying my precious load of Bibles, and it has always been an unspeakable joy to me to be permitted to carry the story of salvation to so many who have never heard it.

I hope to go back shortly to my mission field. Our permanent Mission Station is at Adrogué where God has been pleased to bless our efforts. During my absence, the work has been going on regularly with the help of some friends, and the reports have been encouraging. The possibility of extending our work at Adrogué is great, as we have a large territory waiting to be evangelized. The work could be greatly advanced by native teachers and evangelists trained in the interests of the Master's Kingdom. If South America is ever to be evangelized, it must be with the aid of native workers.

A MISSION STATION IN TIERRA DEL FUEGO

On Board the "Morning Star"

it is none other than the venerable Dr. Hiram Bingham, who left that same port for Micronesia on the first Morning Star, no less than a half century ago, as one of the pioneer missionaries to that region. By a happy coincidence, Dr. Bingham happened to be in Boston, and went on board the little craft to bid it and its company goodspeed. As THE CHRISTIAN HERALD stated, in a recent issue, the Morning Star is the fifth vessel of this name which has been placed in commission through the efforts of the American Board of Commissioners of Foreign Missions. Her destination is literally the other end of the earth, as she will ply among the islands of Micronesia, spreading the Gospel. She is a little craft to cross the Atlantic (as she is now doing at this writing) being only 140 feet long, thirty feet beam and of 400 tons. The Morning Star, however, is strongly constructed, with powerful engines, and has sails to aid her as well. She is commanded by Captain Garland, who is shown standing by the side of Dr. Bingham.

Another Sammy Morris

WHO has not heard of Sammy Morris (Prince Kaboo), who, having found God in the wilds of Africa, worked his way across the sea to learn more about the Holy Spirit, in Christian America? The story of his brief life in America, and in Taylor University, whither friends in New York sent him to be educated, has thrilled hundreds of thousands of readers. He was a most remarkable man, "full of faith and the Holy Ghost" to a degree seldom witnessed. Africa has more men like Sammy Morris. Read the following letters, and see. They were put in the hands of President Winchester for reply. The last is an answer to President Winchester's response. They are given exactly as written. The President has written to him to come on, in these words: "If the Lord gives you money to come, I believe he will give us money to take care of you after you get here."

Taylor University, however, has no funds to use in this way. Who then will help? Will not some who read these words make a gift toward the education of this child of the Dark Continent? One dollar spent in educating in this way, may reproduce itself a hundredfold in the souls whom this native missionary may win to Christ after his return to his native shores. Such gifts should be sent to W. Winchester, Upland, Indiana.

Following are the letters above referred to:

MAGBELY, T. LAND, Sierra Leone.

DEAR FRIENDS—I am ready to come if you only will except me after my arrival. I shall have money enough to pay my fair with. The question is now, are you perfectly willing to receive me to that Taylor University? Before I start, kindly let me know your mind about it. I only have one desire, that is, I wanted to be well educated for that great work of which our dear Heavenly Father has placed before me to perform. I am well acquainted with Jesus, but otherwise I must have knowledge with also. I will come instead of my dearly beloved Samuel Morris. Although he being dead, but yet, he speak, Amen!

I do loved my precious Jesus above anything else on Earth. Greeting to all. Yours in His service. H. B. O'NEIL.

MAGBELY, T. LAND, Sierra Leone.

DEAR FRIEND—Your March the 22, 1904 was just has been received this day of which I will essayed to reply immediately. My dear friend, you state that you wish to know more about me. I shall endeavour to put it in one way for which the holy-spirit shall be able to give you my view fully.

1. I wish to have an education, because the hope of Africa is in itself.

2. I am saved by grace, not only that, but "old man" has been dead long ago.

3. Jesus is my Saviour, keeper, and healer

4. I am a native of this country, born, and raised here. I am mother and fatherless.

Jesus is all and all to me and I believe he is sending me there for the purpose of out-building his father's Kingdom. I am not coming for any other purpose, but merely to be co-worker with Him. Now, I would that you should endeavour to give me the best education for that great work which He has out here for me. In fact He has given me nearly all the means to come with. I have now in hand £16.00 already to start with. Before I shall leave here, I believe all means shall be furnishing up to come with. Oh, blessed be His name forevermore, Amen.

You must do by me, as you would wish some one else to do to you. St. Matt. 7:12: Therefore all things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them: for this is the law and the prophets.

God bless those whos are carry on this wonderful work. I shall ask you pray for me always.

Your faithfully,

H. B. O'NEIL

Answered Prayers

A. W., Kalamazoo, Mich. "I was burdened with a great trouble and I prayed that it might be removed, and it has now gone from me."

L. V. W., Maryland. "The Lord has answered my prayer many, many times. If we will trust him he will always do the best for us, and if we will hold on, we will hold out. May the faith of his children never fail."

Mary H. H., Meriden, Conn. "I was in deep trouble. I earnestly prayed to God, and the prayer was granted. I wish to acknowledge God's goodness to me."

Elizabeth P., Eureka, Ill. "In reading the answered prayers, I have been greatly strengthened and comforted. I was in deep trouble and the Lord had compassion upon me; I believe he will fully deliver me out of my trouble."

G. H. S., Dayton, O. "I had a praying mother, who was so positive that God answered prayer, if it was for the best, that I could not help but take courage. While life lasts, I could not forget it, that the good Lord answers the prayers of his children. Pray and wait; surely, 'shall not the God of all the earth do right?'"

Atlantic City. "I promised the Lord that if he would help me I would make this public acknowledgment of it. I wish to say that he has also answered many other prayers of mine for which I am extremely grateful."

L. S. M., Hagerstown, Md. "I want to acknowledge that the dear Lord does answer prayer. I praise his name. I am now asking for a greater believing heart. May I be remembered in the prayers of others."

Elim Home

"AND they came to Elim. . . and the water encamped there, by the waters."

This quotation from Exodus is graven upon a stone at the entrance to a pretty cottage on Bell Island, South Norwalk, Conn.

The Home is a resting place for Christian workers, whose limited means do not ensure them a vacation at any ordinary summer resort. Elim Home was established by Rev. and Mrs. William James, two warm-hearted generous Christians, who saw the need of such a place of rest for men and women who visit and work among the dwellers in tenements in the slums of the city, and also for returned foreign missionaries. The Home has been in operation seven seasons, and with the financial assistance of friends of Mr. and Mrs. James, it has been the means of great benefit to a large number of Christian workers, who were sadly in need of rest and quiet. Here hearts have been cheered, souls have been strengthened in faith and encouraged to renewed work. Every summer there is a Conference of Christian workers at Bell Island, one having been held this season from July 10th to the 17th. In speaking of these Conferences, Mr. James says:

"Pastors of churches in this and other States, returned foreign missionaries and other Christian workers, have actively participated in these Conferences, and they have returned to their work spiritually, as well as physically, benefited, and greatly refreshed."

Elim Home is pleasantly located by the water, where there is excellent bathing, boating and fishing, and can be reached in a little more than one hour's ride by rail from New York City.

Golden Mile-Stones

The golden wedding of the Rev. Samuel Pollock and wife was recently celebrated at their home in Allegheny, Pa. Mr. Pollock was born near Belfast, Ireland, in 1824. His ancestors, who were Scotch Covenanters, had emigrated from Scotland during the religious wars. When Samuel was a lad, his parents came to America, and located in Pittsburgh, Pa. The young man joined the Methodist Church, and became a local and circuit preacher. On June 27, 1854, Mr. Pollock married Miss Eliza Ann Hamilton, who was a native of Franklin Township, of Allegheny County, Pa. Both Mr. and Mrs. Pollock are in the best of health and are prominent in church work.

Young People's Studies

Heroes of the Mission Field

MEN are apt to associate heroism with the battle-field, or with some thrilling scene on land or sea in which men risk their own lives for a great cause, or to save imperiled lives. But Christianity has its roll of heroic names. The heroism which a man displays who leaves home and friends and native land to go among the heathen in Christ's name, lacks none of the true elements that go to make up the character of the hero. He faces perils of climate, and very often, as recently in China, and Africa, and in New Hebrides, he must encounter the enmity of the very men whom he goes to save. He is liable to be murdered, and is sure, at first, to be hated by the heathen, whose highest good he has sacrificed all he holds dear to promote. Seldom, too, does he gain the reward of witnessing the results of his labors. In every land Christianity has won its triumphs, but it has rarely happened that the hero who was the pioneer in the field has had the joy of seeing them. He has perished, often prematurely, through exhausting labor in an unhealthy climate, before his successors who have entered upon his labors are privileged to reap the harvest. Self-denial, self-sacrifice, arduous toil, poverty, and loneliness, are the elements in his lot, and he is sustained alone by his faith and love.

Our own land has the glory of sending forth many such men and women. It would be invidious to mention names, when the hundreds of pioneers, now multiplied into thousands of devoted laborers, are deserving their share of the glory. There is no church in our land that cannot boast of some mighty soldier of the Cross who has gone out to proclaim the Gospel to the heathen. Baptists, Congregationalists, Episcopalians, Methodists, Presbyterians, Disciples, and other churches, have had a share in this glorious work, and have names on their banners whose glory will never fade.

Church Benevolences

APPEALS for funds are always disagreeable to make, and they do not often fall on grateful ears. Seldom indeed it is that the servants of God, in modern times, have the experience of the ancient leaders of Israel, who had to restrain the people from giving. Yet there ought to be no lack of funds for the Lord's work. While men are giving themselves and their lives to service, those who are not in the field, may surely be expected to contribute their money. The privilege of service is thus shared, and the reward comes to both.

The churches need money. The ministry must be supported, in order that the man who ministers may have his time and strength free for the Master's service. Church buildings must be kept in repair and the various funds for the relief of the poor and the propagation of the Gospel in the home field must be maintained. Besides these, the great missionary enterprise in heathen lands demands support and this it would be shameful to neglect. The men and women who have gone forth to spread the good tidings of the Gospel, should never know the lack of money for the work, nor should the missionary societies ever be compelled to miss an opportunity of entering an open field, by the emptiness of their treasury.

Christian men may reasonably doubt the reality of their conversion if they shrink from giving. There are many instances in which giving is difficult or almost impossible, but the disposition to give ought never to be absent. It should always be a pleasure to contribute to the Lord's service, and where it is so regarded, sacrifices will be made to render the gift possible. Happily, God does not measure the value of the gift by its sum, but by the ability of the giver, and a small gift may in his sight be of more value than a large one. It is the spirit of the giver, and the consecration which impels the gift, that he sees and rewards.

The Gospel Need of Africa

REV. MR. JORDAN, Corresponding Secretary of the Foreign Mission Board of the National Baptist Convention, writing from South Africa, says:

"When one remembers the English flag as hoisted at Capetown, South Africa, in 1820—the very year the Dutch boat carried slaves to Jamestown, Va.—and sees the contrast between the American negro and the negro under the British flag, he is made to feel that there are to be found nowhere in all the world as intelligent, thrifty and prosperous negroes as are found in America. Surely God permitted our enslavement that we might become the source through which their lives may be saved.

"The schools here for Africans are poor indeed. The prejudice against the natives, and indeed against the negro, seems to be at its worst in South Africa. No corner in America is to be compared with it. To begin with, there is the 'native location,' a forlorn-looking den outside of the towns and cities, where the natives are herded indiscriminately. The leading white men consider it a crime to inspire hope in these people by teaching them that 'God hath made of one blood all nations.' I have seen it in print many times ere, in referring to my sermons and addresses, that 'he tells the natives they are made by the same God and of the same material as the white man.' This seems to be the crime of crimes here. When I tell these ignorant, superstitious people that God is able to make of them men and women like the English people around them, they look at me in wonder and almost in open doubt. The Gospel of Inferiority has been preached to them for years, and hope and faith have buried themselves beneath the miasma of doubt and despair.

"Thousands of these people who live in huts have neither bedstead, table nor chair. They wrap themselves in a cotton blanket and lie down on a piece of matting, made by their own hands. We must supplant the hut by the square house, and then the bedstead and chair will come into use. In their present condition, the natives are worth little to commerce. Their wants are few. Thousands of them hate the white man, reject his religion, and only serve him from actual fear. This cannot always be so. Racial harmony and respect from brotherly love must control the actions of white and black. There must be an effort to lift these people—to help them to know that they, too, are God's creatures, and that white and black must love and serve God and be loyal to their country.

"I went from Queenstown to Qora, Idutywa, a distance of eighty miles. En route, I met thousands of red Kaffirs. Their kraals consist of a pen for cattle, made of thorn bushes, much like the mesquite bush of Texas, or of stone and huts, for family use. I counted from five to fifteen huts in many of these kraals. The government taxes the man $5 for each hut in which he has a wife, and collects large sums of money by saying to these poor unfortunate people, 'You can have as many wives as you wish by paying the government $5 per year for each wife.' The fifteen huts need not mean that he has that number of wives, as some of his grown children may live in the kraal. The average man has only one wife, while many have from one to four. The direct encouragement to polygamy cannot be disputed.

"The imperative need of Africa is the Gospel, and the imperative duty of her descendants in America is to give it. The only reason Africa must have the Gospel is that she cannot be saved without it. Like Joseph, who found himself elevated to Pharaoh's throne by the providence of God, to save souls, and, upon finding his brethren, father and relatives alive, but suffering in Canaan for food by reason of the famine, filled their sacks with corn and sent them home in haste to save life; so we in America, standing before the King's filled barns, should hasten to send the Bread of Life to our brethren, who are starving and dying in Africa, by reason of the spiritual famine upon that vast continent."

Few realize that the finest table linen can be made to look like cotton by using soap over-strong in alkali, which cuts the fabric and gives it a "nap." There is no "free" alkali in Ivory Soap. The saving in appearance and wear is very much more than the slight additional cost of "Ivory" over ordinary soap.

Little Davie's Prayer at Mont-Lawn

DAVIE was about five years old, and judging from the pranks he was continually playing, and from the expression of his face, one might be pardoned for thinking, that every day composing those five years had been devoted to the study of some particular kind of mischief.

Davie's hair was black as the traditional raven's wing, and he had great, dark eyes, that, when not sparkling with some particularly new brand of mischief, would look as if they could read one's innermost thoughts.

Davie's friend, mother and mentor, was his patient sister, who never seemed to tire of caring for that delightful, laughing, provoking bit of humanity. No matter what trouble he fell into, from getting a ducking in the shallow brook, where he would wade without the formality of taking off his shoes, to the wasp-stung little fingers, which wounds Davie received when insisting upon making a prisoner of the "big fly," Sara the patient, was always on hand to comfort and console.

Davie's stay at Mont-Lawn was marked by many surprises for him; he was by no means a bad fellow, but he was as full of mischief as a monkey, and he had never been taught to mind. His first lessons in this art were certainly in the nature of a surprise, and when the teacher enforced them, with a gentle but firm hand, Davie's astonishment was unbounded, but he proved an apt pupil. One of his favorite diversions, after a day full of the keenest enjoyment for him, and of the greatest anxiety on the part of his loving little sister and the kind teachers who had him in charge, was to watch his chance, after he was undressed, to secrete himself under a cot, and as he could run as fast on all-fours as on his feet, it was a merry chase he gave the teachers and other children. Truth to tell, however, they did not try as hard as they might have done, and but for the example to the other children, set by this tiny, black-eyed "Puck," they would have prolonged the frolic until he was tired.

He was such a lovable little chap, despite the trouble he caused, that he made a warm place for himself in everyone's heart; he was so sure of the good-will of everybody, from William the "chef," down to the latest arrival from the city, whom he always informed as circumstantially as his limited vocabulary would allow, of the good time he was having, and that if his mamma would come, he would live in the country always; but he would add, "ain't goin' catch no more big flies."

Davie did not like saying his prayers; not that he objected to the prayers, but after they were said then he must go to bed, and he wanted to put that time off indefinitely, for his daily stock of fun and mischief never seemed to perceptibly diminish until his eyelids fairly dropped from sheer sleepiness, as he gradually gave up the struggle in his teacher's arms. One night the teacher was telling the story of the cots, how kind friends had paid money for those nice little beds, so that Davie and the rest could sleep in them, cool, and clean, and quiet. She told how one lady had had two dear little boys, one very much like Davie; their pictures hung over a nearby cot, and that now the good lady did not have any little boys; that their Heavenly Father had taken them to live with him, and so the lady, because she loved her own boys so much, wanted to help other little boys to have a good time in the beautiful country, and had sent the money for—here Davie looked up, very much interested—"For Davie's cot?" he asked. "Yes," replied the teacher, "For Davie's bed."

For once Davie forgot to be mischievous; his little hand ceased to reach up to slyly pull a stray lock of teacher's hair; his fingers no longer searched for pins or buttons, upon which so much of the neatness of teacher's dress depended; but he lay perfectly quiet until the story was finished. "Davie say his prayers to-night," he said, suddenly, and slipping from the comforting arms of teacher, his little bare feet pattered across the dormitory, bringing him to a cot over which hung the frame he had never noticed before. Down on his knees went the night-gowned cherub, and with bowed head and clasped hands, Davie said his prayer.

"God bless the cot-lady! God bless me, and evvybody. Amen."

A scene fit for the pen of a Dickens. Could "Tiny Tim" have uttered a sweeter prayer?

"Down on his knees went the night-gowned cherub"

The Cots at Mont-Lawn

THE following list of donors of cots endowed for the season, shows how deeply interested the friends of the Children's Home are, and how generously they have responded to the "cry of the children."

They are leaning their young heads against their mothers, And that cannot stop their tears.

One hundred and nine cots. Can we not reach one hundred and fifty? It costs but $21.00 to endow a cot for the season; this gives seven children a country holiday of ten days each.

SLUMBER TOWN

WRITTEN FOR "THE CHRISTIAN HERALD"

HOW far is it to Slumber Town?

Forty winks, when the sun goes down.
Can I reach it to-night, do you suppose?
Yes, if you take the first train that goes.
That is the one for children to take,
It gives plenty of time the trip to make.

Old "Mr. Nap," the engineer,
Is a kind old man, full of good cheer.
For the little folks, he runs a special car,
It is crowded with children, from near and far.
"Nod," the conductor, tho' a little slow,
Will treat you right, whene'er you go.

The noisy brakeman, whose name is "Snore,"
Calls out the stations at the door.
Don't eat too much, when you start, my dear,
And "Nightmare" Tunnel, you need not fear.
For this a place, where goblins dwell,
And frightful witches weave their spell.

"Lullaby" is a village sweet,
Where babies are found on every street.
This train runs through the "Valley of Dreams,"
Where the fairies play by crystal streams.

It stops a while at the cave of "Rest,"
And tired ones like this place the best.

Most of the trains to Slumber Town,
Start only after the sun goes down.
For the travelers small, there are a few,
That make the trip in daytime, too.
All aboard! little folks, and shut your eyes tight,
Your train has started, so a pleasant good night.

MRS. N. D. LIPSCOMB.

Heathen Lives Transformed

From Umtali, Rhodesia, South Africa, Rev. R. Wodehouse writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD: "There have been two deaths in the ranks of our native members; both of them died triumphantly. It is beautiful to see the light on these dark faces when they are dying. Our native members live well and die well. We have had some thrilling experiences of converts going back on a visit to their friends at their home, in their heathen kraals. Every effort is made to get them to drink kaffir beer and join again in the heathen dance and evil practices, in a majority of cases without avail. Their friends cannot understand what has happened; but when the converts kneel down and pray the others get frightened, and often are brought under deep conviction merely by hearing testimony and seeing the life. Occasionally they come with their friend to Umtali, so that they may hear the Word and find life."

Rev. Geo. F. Herrick writes: "We are glad some of your readers have responded to the appeal in your June 1st issue, for aid to our Christian Publication Work at Constantinople. Your readers are quick to respond to appeals for help to the suffering. This appeal is for the relief of those of many races who suffer for the want of wholesome reading."

JUST ONE DAY

Free From the Sluggish Brought Fact

"During the time I was a coffee drinker," says an Iowa woman, "I was nervous, had spells with my heart, smothering spells, headache, stomach trouble, liver and kidney trouble. I did not know years what made me have those spells. I would frequently sink away as though my last hour had come."

"For 27 years I suffered thus and used bottles of medicine enough to set up a drug store—capsules and pills and everything I heard of. Spent lots of money but I was sick nearly all the time. Sometimes I was so nervous I could not hold a plate in my hands; and other times I thought I would surely die sitting at the table."

"This went on until about two years ago when one day I did not use any coffee and I noticed I was not so nervous and told my husband about it. He had been telling me that it might be the coffee but I said 'No, I have been drinking coffee all my life and it cannot be.' After this I thought I would try and without it and drink hot water. I did for several days but got tired of the water and went to drinking coffee and soon as I began coffee again I was nervous again. This proved that it was coffee that caused my troubles."

"We had tried Postum but had not made it right and did not like it, but now I decided to give it another trial so I read the directions on the package carefully and made it after these directions and it was simply delicious, so we got coffee for good and the results are wonderful. Before, I could not sleep but now go to bed and sleep sound, am not as nervous now but work hard and can walk miles. Nervous headaches are gone, my heart does not bother me any more like it did and I don't have any of the smothering spells and would you believe it? I am getting fat. We drink Postum now and nothing else and even my husband's headaches have disappeared: we both sleep sound and healthy now that's a blessing." Name given, Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

HOW A TINY MISSION GREW GREAT AND USEFUL

REV. W. B. HAMILTON

HON. W. H. CORBIN

REV. GEO. P. PIERSON

ELIZABETHPORT, N. J., is this month the scene of a very interesting celebration, being the thirtieth anniversary of the opening of Westminster Hope Chapel. Begun in an exceedingly humble way, amid discouraging surroundings, the work then inaugurated has extended in a most remarkable manner. The first meeting of the session, held August 9, 1874, was the first Protestant service in a section of over 400 Catholic families. By strong effort, the Sunday School has grown from thirty members to 300. The little chapel building has contributed, in other than strictly religious ways, to the advancement of the people. Through the week, the Sunday school room supplies the needs of a gymnasium and a night school. There is also a cadet room for drills, social meetings, etc. The success of this work grows unmistakably that can be accomplished by opportunities for technical training, without losing sight of the original issues involved. This mission was originally founded by the several Presbyterian churches of Elizabeth. The original building has been enlarged, and was taken, over by Westminster Presbyterian Church, of North Elizabeth, from which it derives its name, twenty years ago. The first superintendent was the Rev. Dr. George Pierson, now a prominent foreign missionary. W. H. Corbin, Attorney-General, Pennsylvania R. R., formerly a frequent visitor to Elizabeth, was one of its first promoters. The crowning success of Hope Chapel Mission is due to the personal efforts of the Rev. W. B. Hamilton. This weather-beaten missionary, superintendent for many years, has been the inspiration to bring the work out from a struggling infancy, through rugged roads, into fertile pastures, through social and physical entertainments, and by combining industrial and educational with religious training. Last fall a number of prominent women, among whom was Mrs. H. E. Mott, wife of the pastor of the Westminster, opened a class in the Mission for plain sewing and elementary house-work. This department is a feature of the Mission work. Mrs. Mott hopes to bring the matter before the public as a State Institution of Domestic Science, free to all.

WESTMINSTER HOPE CHAPEL

Hours of Gloom

By Mrs. M. Baxter

ONE of the most difficult lessons for our fallen human nature is that of our utter uselessness to God except as he in his grace purchases us to use us. If God, in his deep undescension, is pleased to use one of his children in the awakening of many, and thousands owe their conversion instrumentally to him, it does not follow that God will be pleased always to use him in the same work or in the same measure. It is much easier for us to be greatly used than to be set aside until God is pleased to use us again. How many evangelists have become conscious of their own uselessness, and after God has spoken in mighty power through them, they have been left to wait until the Lord wills to use them, and thus their appeals to the unsaved have become powerless; and where once they trembled, awestruck under the power of the Holy Ghost, who spoke through them, they can now sit unmoved under the same words through the same instrument, but who is not wholly held in the same mighty hand. Pastor Stockmayer, in his little book, God's Disposal, says: "There is one of the most important and necessary lesson which we may learn from the victories and failures in the life of Elijah; it is, to know the special object and purpose of God's messengers and seasons; to come forward only when he calls us to stand against all the powers of darkness." To be out of sight for months and years is the preparation for this. Our school may be at the seashore with Elijah, or in the testings of our own home life, that we may be ready to come forward when He calls, and as ready to disappear as soon as we are given our message and fulfilled our ministry. The more definite our call has been to some prominent work, the greater may be our temptation to miss God's time, and to continue our service longer than he intends us to. Faithfully Elijah had stood for God upon Carmel, but his faithfulness was due to the grace of God, and now he must pass through another school in a most unexpected test. Ahab had "told Jezebel all that Elijah had done, and withal how he had slain all the prophets with the sword" (I. Kings 19:1). It will be remembered that when the prophet had warned Ahab to take to his chariot, that the rain might not stop him, "the hand of the Lord was on Elijah, . . . and he ran before Ahab to the entrance of Jezreel." What did God want of his servant here where Jezebel was all-powerful? Must not Elijah have pictured to himself the wicked woman bowed down with shame and confusion when she heard of the answer from heaven of the Lord God of Israel? What a revulsion of feeling when a messenger from the queen met him with the words, "So let the Gods do to me, and more also, if I make not thy life as the life of one of them (the slain prophets of Baal) by to-morrow about this time." Was it possible? Could Jezebel hold out against the power of God, which had brought the representatives of all Israel upon their faces, with their heart turned back again, and with the loyal cry, "The Lord, He is the God; the Lord, He is the God." It was an unexpected reverse. Miracle after miracle had been in this man's experience. The tremendous tension which was upon him could not stand the shock, and Elijah must know what James tells us, that he was "of like nature with us." The mighty upholding was withdrawn, and Elijah found that he in himself was weak and like any other man.

A LIMIT

One Thing Food Can't Do

Food can't exactly paint a picture, but proper food to restore the daily wear and tear on brain and nerves, as well as body, can help. A successful artist says:

"I had been troubled with dyspepsia for 25 years, and my system was so run down, I was so weak and miserable, life was a burden to me, until I made a great discovery about food."

"I am an artist by profession, and at that time was painting a large marine piece, but being in such poor health, I could not do justice to it, and no matter how often I changed it, there seemed always something wrong. Success lay just out of my reach because I did not have the strength and vigor of brain as well as bodily strength to accomplish what I knew lay within me."

"Looking around me for help, I decided to try a food I had heard so much about, and that was the way I was led to use Grape-Nuts, and it came at the right time. I had hardly given it a fair trial before I began to feel so much better, my dyspepsia disappeared, and I commenced to feel stronger and more vigorous all over, head and all, and it was not long before I was back at my work again, with renewed energy and interest."

"Even more substantial proof of the help I got from this food was when I finished my painting and put it up for exhibition. Critics said it was a masterpiece, and I sold it a short time ago at a very good price. Before closing I want to mention the fact that my mother, in her 85th year, keeps strong and in fine spirits on her Grape-Nuts." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Questions & Answers

M. E. F., Foster's Mill, Ga. Why did Jesus make Judas an apostle if, as we are taught to believe, he knew the character of men?

The question has often been asked but remains a mystery. It has been suggested with some plausibility that Judas was originally a sincere follower of Christ. We cannot conceive of Jesus appointing one who was not. Later, however, avarice and ambition gained control over him. He stole the funds of the little company and hoped to hold high place when, as he expected, Jesus would establish his kingdom. It is suggested that even in betraying Christ, he did not expect that his act would lead to the catastrophe. He thought that Christ would use his miraculous power for his deliverance. His object was to precipitate the founding of the kingdom—to force Christ's hand. When he found that Christ was going to submit, and would be killed, he realized the failure of his ambitious scheme and committed suicide in remorse.

Oscar L., New York. Who is the new governor of Finland, the successor of Bobrikoff?

Prince John Obolensky. His appointment indicates that the repression policy will be continued vigorously, and that the "Russification" of Finland will go on.

Reader, Mounds, Ill. How can one overcome the shrinking from reading, praying and speaking in public?

One of the best ways is in taking a class in the Sunday School. The habit of speaking to ten or a dozen children soon gives confidence. You need to forget yourself in your subject. Get clearly in mind what you wish to say, say it briefly and do not attempt to do more at the outset. Gradually, as you overcome the nervousness of hearing your own voice, you will be at ease. Remember that it does not matter so much what your audience thinks of you and your speech, as whether you can influence them and do them good.

Anxious Follower, Wis. In this age of combination and co-operative effort, it would be unfair to deny to workers the same privilege that is conceded to capitalists, i. e., the right to combine. Union is strength, and only by uniting can any definite results be achieved. As to the abuse of the strength and influence which union gives, much might be said on either side.

J. R., Danbury, Conn. What is the cause of the present trouble between France and the Vatican?

While the whole question of Papal authority is involved, the immediate cause of the trouble is the action of the Papal See with regard to the bishops of Laval and Dijon. These prelates refused to recognize the authority of the See, and failing to respond to a summons to go to Rome, were deprived of all episcopal powers, and when they appealed to the civil powers for support, they were excommunicated. The French government refused to recognize their dismissal by the Papacy, holding them to be State functionaries, who can be dismissed only by the government itself. The present position is a peculiar one, the government continuing the bishops' salaries and upholding them in their dioceses in defiance of their own church.

D. Dekker, Edgeley, N. Dak. 1. What is known of the book of Iddo, the Seer, mentioned in II. Chron. 12:15, and other places? 2. To whom does Ecclesiastes refer in Eccles. 7:28? 3. Why are we told not to be righteous overmuch (Eccles. 7:16)?

1. Iddo is believed to have been the official chronicler or court secretary. It would be his duty to keep the official records. The writer of Chronicles appears to quote him as an authority, much as we should refer to the Congressional Record. Josephus thinks he was the prophet mentioned in I. Kings 13, as having been slain by a lion. 2. To no special person. He is in despair of humanity. When he had tested men, he did not find more than one in a thousand who was upright and worthy to be called a man. 3. Ecclesiastes set out to find the greatest good in life and he relates his experience. You must not take his expressions as a guide, because at different periods of his quest he held different opinions and, as he tells you, discovered his mistake. At this particular stage he thought that happiness might be found in an easy, moderate state of mind. The man who was not particularly good or very bad, was likely to be happy; as we should say, an easy-going man. He may have had in mind men like the Pharisees of our Lord's time, who were so worried about minute questions of the tithe and religious observance, that they neglected the religion of the heart.

L. K., Hydeville, Vt. I notice in a late issue of your paper that Russia is called a "Christian nation." By what right can we call a nation "Christian," whose laws and government permit such diabolical atrocities as are inflicted upon the Jews and Stundists? Or what can we call that "branch of the Christian Church" which requires its members to worship the image pictures, so common in the worship of Russians?

Your comment is justifiable, when we consider the course Russia has followed in the last quarter of a century. Nominally Christian, Russia is still far from the light. The were responsible, but the Jews took the initiative, and were therefore the more guilty. 2. We did not say that Herod died before Jesus was born, but that he died four years before the Christian era. The fact that he died B.C. 4, shows that the Christian era was set later than it should have been. Christ was born B.C. 5.

Reader, Syracuse, N. Y. At what time did the Apostle Paul visit Rome and how long did he stay there?

He went there as a prisoner, probably the year 56 A. D. He had been arrested at Jerusalem and was arraigned before Festus and Festus the Roman governors. They did not decide his case, but kept him in prison. Finally he appealed to the Roman Emperor as his Roman citizenship entitled him to do and he was sent to Rome for trial. When Luke finished writing the Acts of the Apostles, Paul had been kept in confinement two years, but had been allowed to see his friends (See Acts 28:30). Tradition says that he was acquitted at his trial and went on another missionary tour, and that he was afterwards again arrested and sent back to Rome, where he was executed.

same criticism, however, might be applied to other nations, nominally Christian, whose acts have been sadly out of tune with their profession.

R. B., Nashville, Tenn., writes:

Theodore S., Bay City, Wis., asked: How many soldiers took part in the Civil War on both sides? On the Northern side, there were something over 2,600,000. A gentleman, who has the records of the Confederate States during the war, has tabulated the number of men from each State by regiments, battalions, etc., in the infantry, cavalry and artillery, up to 1863, and he gives the number at 960,000, and counting the number that enlisted and were conscripted from 1863 to the end of the war, it would make a total of over 1,000,000.

G. D. T., Elroy. 1. Was 'it' the Jews or the Gentiles who crucified Christ? 2. Are you not wrong in saying that Herod died before Jesus was born?

1. The Gentiles crucified Christ; but they did it to please the Jews. Pilate would have been glad to have avoided crucifying him, but the Jews insisted. He feared to disoblige them, because if he had done so, they might have made trouble for him at Rome, by reporting his other acts of misgovernment. He wanted their good word, and so gave orders that they should have their way in having Christ crucified. Both Jews and Gentiles and independent reason why it cannot be successfully disputed now. Still, the proper course is to see a lawyer and to state the facts to him.

Subscriber, Franktown, Va. What is the difference between the Methodist Protestant and the Methodist Episcopal churches?

They are practically identical in fundamental doctrines, and in many of their usages. The Methodist Protestants, however, have no bishops. The annual conferences elect a President, and an equal number of ministers and laymen as delegates to the General Conference, which meets every four years. This conference has the right to legislate for the Church, to devise means for raising funds, and to regulate the boundaries of the annual conferences.

H. O., Overton, Neb. 1. Was the hair on Esau a freak in nature or were there people in those days with hair on their bodies? 2. What were the Dark Ages? 3. How was the Bible preserved through the Dark Ages?

1. The word "Esau" itself, means "hairy," or "rough," and was applied to the first-born of the twins to distinguish him from his weaker and smooth-skinned brother. It is not probable that this peculiarity was so marked as to be a "freak" in the sense of a monstrosity.

His Church a "Character Factory"

A WESTERN PASTOR'S PLAN FOR KEEPING UP THE SOCIAL SIDE OF CHRISTIAN LIFE AND FIGHTING THE SALOON

A FEW years ago, a young clergyman came to the town of Lawndale, a suburb of Chicago, to become pastor of one of the Presbyterian churches. He soon attracted attention outside of the congregation on account of the character of his sermons, for he vigorously preached the doctrine of helping the poor and unfortunate. During week days he practiced what he preached, devoting all of his time to occupied with church work, studying the condition of the laboring class, of which Lawndale contains a large number. People in the town soon learned that the minister had become so noted as a friend of the poor, here he had formerly worked, that he was given this title in the community referred to. Before coming to Lawndale he had occupied the pulpit of a church at Pullman, one of the largest factory towns in the United States, where the population is composed almost entirely of men employed in building passenger coaches for the railroad lines.

It is worth while to give this brief sketch of the career of Rev. Granville R. Pike, for he has formed a body of church workers which probably has no parallel anywhere. While it is called a church by the townsfolk who are not connected with it, Mr. Pike and his people call it a "factory." It is modeled largely upon the plan of a great industry, such as those with which he has become familiar in his life in industrial towns. This factory, however, is intended to create character; so the edifice which has been erected is not termed a "church" by those interested in it, but a "character factory" of Lawndale. It forms a great centre, not only of religious, but of social activity, and this is the purpose for which it is intended.

In the church building there are many features of interest. There is a gymnasium, as well as a reading-room, and apartments for various meetings of a social character. There is, besides, a large bowling alley, and a series of baths of various kinds. The assembly room will accommodate 400, and is intended for lectures, concerts, receptions and other gatherings for the pleasure of the congregation. Nearly every night in the week it is the scene of some enjoyable event, which not only entertains members, but anyone in town can attend without payment. In fact, it forms the centre of amusement and recreation for the entire community, where those who have nothing else to do, can spend a pleasant hour or pleasant evening. This is Pastor Pike's idea of a workingman's place of recreation—not a saloon nor any body-and-soul destroying place, but a resort of healthful, innocent amusement, which combines many wholesome and attractive features. In connection with it is a large room, provided with apparatus for cooking, and frequently meals are served in connection with the entertainment.

On the floor above is a room devoted to meetings of religious societies of young people. Here the different church organizations can assemble on Sundays or on week-days at any time. This is provided with musical "factory." This will accommodate nearly 1,000 people, as several apartments adjoining can be added to it by opening sliding doors, thus providing for a much larger congregation.

Another portion of the building is devoted to apartments for the mothers of the church. One of these is a room where they can assemble during the week and listen to lectures, as well as enjoy amusements of various kinds provided especially for their benefit. They can also meet and discuss domestic matters, while the little children are provided for in the nursery adjoining, which is in charge of nurses appointed especially for this purpose. Another room in this department is intended for girls and young women. Here they are instructed in house-work, cooking, sewing and other domestic duties, and, it may be added, here they have a society devoted to mutual advancement, which meets regularly.

These arrangements indicate how Mr. Pike has systematized the various phases of social activity in his church work. A place has been provided for the old and young of both sexes. Every one, from the little child to the aged man, can find a section especially for him, and where plans for his advancement are carefully considered. While one can hear the Sunday sermon or join in the singing of the Sabbath hymn in the auditorium, he can also spend the next evening in the gymnasium, or at the entertainment given in the assembly hall. Consequently, the temptation to the workman to spend his leisure time after the day at the bench, in the barroom or some other questionable resort, is counteracted by the "character factory." Here the aptness of its title is made apparent.

As already stated, the building is not intended for merely those who are laborers in the factory, but for all who care to go. All classes meet on a common level. Among those who are interested are the rich as well as the poor, but no distinction is made in their treatment, and this is one of the reasons why the "character factory" has become so popular with the working class, and especially the men and boys. The girls and young women have formed the Ingleside Club, for carrying on church work and for planning outdoor amusements for the young women of the town in general.

Church bodies in Chicago have watched the career of the "character factory" with deep interest, and some of them have already adopted plans like those Mr. Pike has originated. That it appeals especially to those who toil, is shown by the large attendance of factory operatives and their families.

REV. GRANVILLE R. PIKE

MILLARD AVE. PRESBYT. CHURCH

MRS. PIKE

A "CHILDHOOD PARTY"

PROGRESS BY SUFFERING

A Sermon by Rev. George Freeman*

Text: Job 2: 10, "In all this did not Job sin with his lips"

THAT is, Job might have sinned in his heart, but up to this point no word of his lips had transgressed the law of his God, or of his own good name. Some of us have reason to be thankful for moments when the doubtful thoughts which are in each of us remain dumb. What a mercy it is that no man habitually utters all that he thinks, or all that he feels, and we ought to be as thankful for the sins that we are saved from as for the mercy that covers a multitude of transgressions. The sin in the heart we mourn and ought to repent of, but while it does not come to utterance, it remains between God and us, and we are spared the responsibility of injuring others by sinful words.

There is many a Christian who says, "Well, I don't know that I am getting on very fast, or making much progress, or have very much to cheer me." Why, my dear friend, if you only knew what you have been saved from you would cheer up for the rest of your life. We are not only saved to get to heaven by and by, where we may walk the golden pavements with throngs of beautiful angels, but every day brings us blessings, and not the least of these is that we are saved from things that are near to us. Why, we are saved from death every night. Do you know, we are told that if a man or a woman or a child takes a natural and undisturbed and long sleep, such as we take every night if we are in fair health, at the centre of that period we are said to be as near dead as ever we shall get without dying; therefore, every morning is a resurrection. Is that not something to be thankful for? To be thankful for the things that I have been saved from not doing is also a duty, as well as to be thankful for the mercy that has forgiven sins I have committed. Job would surely be thankful that he sinned not with his lips; we may be thankful, too, that when he did speak he had so much to say on a subject that concerns us, and said so much to solve a great problem for us concerning human suffering and pain and distress.

Universal Suffering

One of your greatest preachers, perhaps the greatest one whom you ever produced in this country, once said to students to whom he was lecturing at Yale University, that no man could preach a great sermon unless he started at some point of common agreement. Whatever qualifications of greatness my sermon this morning may lack, it has at least that merit, because I am going to start with an assertion which no one but a lunatic can dispute, and that is, that there is an awful amount of suffering in this world. Man that is born of a woman is born to trouble as the sparks fly upward.

If you are not a troubled man you are not a man, or at least the logic of that phrase means, to the measure of your trouble you are a man, or, to put it in pulpit phraseology, without discipline we should have no manhood. We are in a great sea of trouble, believers and unbelievers alike; we all get it somewhere, and somehow; we all have to suffer some sort of pain, some kind of distress, something that is disagreeable. That fact is to many a great mystery. If we are given to see a meaning in the mystery through these words of Job, we shall find a glad Gospel to our hearts this morning.

One other word of preface: This problem of suffering touches one of the commonest doubts in the minds of men. No man can think at all without having trouble in this direction. No man can square exactly the infinite love, pity and goodness of God with the overwhelming squalor and misery and sin of the world. Is not that a perplexity? Surely you cannot say it raises no difficulty to your mind. It is a profound mystery. There is God, speaking reverently, almighty in power, all goodness in nature; here is mankind, a mass of corruption, of misery and of woe and of need. How can these two things agree? The offspring of the Creator so utterly destitute, in a condition in such startling contrast to the wealth and glory of the Creator himself.

A Painful Dilemma

Well, we have two things to say of that problem, to begin with. First of all, we must never attempt to offer any apology for God. Never. We shall never have fully in this world a complete answer to that problem, and I say again if you do not call to your aid the beautiful assistance of faith, then, if you struggle with the problem at all, you will either become a Roman Catholic or an infidel. You will have to do either the one or the other. If you have faith, that is a shield that protects you from the impact of the difficulty; but the moment you begin to reason it out, you must go either to the darkness and superstition of Catholicism, or flounder in the wilderness of the mind that is atheistic and unbelieving. You must either say, "I cannot understand it; I cannot realize it; I cannot believe in it," and therefore accept the priest's presumptuous suggestion, who tells you to leave it entirely to him and he will put you right, or you will have to say with the atheist, "A good God would not permit suffering to continue, and, therefore, there can be no good God," or you may be led, as I trust you will be led, by the blessed Spirit of God to say that you do not understand the mystery, but that you trust in God, and are confident that what you know not now you shall know hereafter. Thus, in the quietude of faith, you shall triumph over these two doubts that assail the human mind.

Faith in God's Love

Next, while we do not seek at all to offer any apology for God, I believe we are oftentimes troubled because we try to bear God's burdens, whereas we are not strong enough to bear our own. He is responsible for a great deal more than we generally realize. He is responsible for bringing me into the world; he brought me, and therefore, as he has launched me in this savage world, he will take care of me, and bring me through it somehow or other to answer some great, far-reaching purpose about which I can know nothing, and I must in the meantime leave myself in his hands.

Next, in considering this difficulty, let us always rest where the Scriptures rest. "Shall not the Judge of the whole earth do right?" One thing we must be careful about—we must never claim to understand fully everything there is in the Bible. If I could understand this Bible, to put it plainly, then I should believe that it had a human not a divine origin. It is because I cannot fully understand this Book I know that some one greater than mankind has had to do with it, and therefore I believe it to be the inspired Word of God. As with the problem of suffering, so with the problem of the origin of evil. Now I find myself forced to believe in the existence of the devil. Some men, especially now, in the theological world, won't have a devil. Well, all I ask them to do is to displace the devilishness out of the world and then I will believe there is no devil. So long as men will stab you and rob you of your pocket-book in five minutes and steal your character for no fault of your own, so long as this world is crowded with devilishness, I say, sanity requires a man to believe that there is an evil ingenuity at work that is managing that machine; so that until we lose the existence of the effect we must believe in the awful cause.

REV. GEORGE FREEMAN
Pastor of the Westbourne Grove Chapel, London

Next, and finally before I pass to the application of the subject, don't try to understand the beginning of this mystery. Oh, if we could only get fully away from these side issues! How many have wasted their lives in trying to solve the mystery of the origin of sin! How many have troubled their heads to find out where it came from, what it was, and how and why it was permitted! We shall never understand that. No man can explain to me why God allowed sin. Do not trouble your head as to how sin got into the world. The great thing that we are to concentrate our attention on is how we are to get rid of sin now that it is here.

I know hundreds of people who want to know how sin came, and all the while they are delving in the mystery, sin is getting the ascendancy over them. Here the fact. Sin is here. That is true, and you and have to take part in the conflict with it. So we con upon the mystery of pain. It is a mystery, and I would not belittle it. There are some people who escape it some extent and in some measure. But I am speaking the truth in saying that there are men and women who have hardly known anything else than trouble sin they were borne upon their mothers' bosoms. They have had distress and trial, temptation and trouble morning noon and night, year after year, until they come into church, as they have come again this morning, saying, "I will come yet again. Though he sl me I will trust in him. Ask, oh, my soul, for sor balm. Let me hear the voice of God teaching me the meaning of this, and then I shall pass beyond its mysteries into its joy and into its conflict."

Reasons for Suffering

I have four or five reasons to give you why the must be suffering or pain in this world. The first is. It must be a necessity as far as God is concerned. It may help some suffering one if you are led to see the truth of that. Let me put it in some figure if I can. Men and women must endure suffering if God is to reveal himself to them as their Creator, as their Benefactor, as their Ruler. That is to say, God could not have enabled us to rejoice in this beautiful sunshine today if he had not before given us the darkness of night. We could not have had the one without the other, as if you and I did not have pain, we should be lumps of wood and bits of chalk, instead of men and women. It is a necessity to our very nature, because the law of the whole thing is this—to the measure of a man's power to endure pain, to that measure he can endure joy and happiness. I do not enter into the question of what the physiological law behind that explanation. But there are some people so roughly built that they can scarcely feel pain; but those are not the highest type of humanity. The savage is not so sensitive to pain as the civilized man; the finer your nature the more sensitive to pain. If you writhe and quiver with a too much ache, be thankful you have a system that is sensitive, refined, well born. God must allow us to have pain, we should have no understanding that we were of superior creation to the rest of the great world.

Next, do you know that it is the law of growth, the pain is indispensable to growth? No one here has grown on any other principle than that, and if you had not suffered pain, you would have been stunted; you would have been dwarfed instead of being grown men and women. Let me give you a familiar illustration. Here is a little child that just leaves its mother or nurse's arms. That little child must learn to walk. And how does the child begin to walk? That little child learns to walk by tumbling about. If the little child knocks its poor little head on a chair, it gives it pain, and the little one learns not to knock its head against the chair again. We have had to suffer for our mistakes; we have had to learn by painful experience the consequences of certain conduct; we have had to pay the penalty of breaking certain laws that we cannot defy, and you and I have had to grow. "It was good for me," says one, "that I was afflicted." Another time he said: "Before I was afflicted (or before I was in pain), I went astray."

The Divine Sufferer

Even Christ, the captain of our salvation, was made perfect by suffering; surely we are not to understand by that, that Christ's nature was imperfect, but Christ's nature was developed. Show me the man or woman who has not had pain, and suffering, and distress in this world, and I will show you the individual that has no manliness, no character, no strength. It was the one who has endured, as seeing him who is invisible, that the one who has found character, and strength.

Will you remember, too, that pain and pleasure just alternate, one with the other in making the best combination for discipline that it is possible for anybody to know, and therefore human life, I would almost say, would be robbed of its romance, certainly of its sentiment, if this were not true, and what the world would do if pain and suffering were eliminated from human life, I cannot think. All branches of knowledge have to exist upon this law.

Will you think, too, that the law of compensation always at work where there is suffering, and where there is pain. One writer wrote that when "Ignorance was bliss, it was folly to be wise." Well, there is measure of truth in that; but, on the other hand, it is true enough to life, that there is a compensation in wisdom that pays for displacing the folly of ignorance. Bliss is not the true end or greatest boon in life. There are higher things than bliss for men to seek. The schoolboy finds his bliss in the playground, but we not let him stay too long there. If we did, he would discover when he grew up that ignorance placed him at a disadvantage, and he would have to suffer pain, harder to bear than that which he must bear now, in toiling over his books.

That is a significant statement in the Gospel of Matthew, following the account of the baptism: "Then the Spirit of God led Christ into the wilderness to be tempted of the devil," to be put to pain. Would it not have been kind to have saved Christ from that awful temptation? It would in our poor way of calculation, but not for the human race. Ask the poor tempted man this morning what he owes to the awful experience that Christ passed through in the wilderness. What comfort it brings to him that he can look to a strong Lord and Saviour, who has been tempted in all points like as he is, yet without sin. Through pain, through conflict, through agony, was Jesus Christ made perfect, and you and I have to endure things if we would develop knowledge, but it is worth the endurance, because we rise to a higher point of pleasure than otherwise we could reach. I know the penalty of it is there as well, but the compensation is not far off. In the school of trouble there is a beautiful compensation always to repay you. If God takes one faculty away from you, he increases the power of the others or gives you strength to bear the loss.

Don't think I am trying to make God out to be a God of cruelty. I preach what I believe him to be, a God of profound mystery; but of all the darkness of the mystery there is the clear shining fact that God is all the while working good, especially to those who love him.

Now I must close, with just one or two more suggestions. I think I may say again that suffering is not to be discountenanced, but to be valued, because it always produces the richest and the noblest characters. In any branch of life we can prove that to a demonstration, but if we take some great achievements of men, we find that there is this consensus of opinion, that sorrow and suffering produce not only the greatest energy of endurance, by which are brought about great and mighty achievements upon the battlefield, but a nobility of character really greater than pugnacity. Was it not Byron who wrote:

The soldier braves death for the fanciful wreath,
In honor's romantic career,
But he raises the foe
When in battle laid low,
And bathes every wound with a tear.

Thank God for Byron's idea, that although the soldier goes forth for his coveted wreath of fame, and rushes up some dangerous hill to fell the foe to violent death, he becomes nobler, more martyrlike, more instinct with manhood when his tear falls on the wounds of the man he has laid low, teaching us this, that there is no service so noble, that there is no effort so angelic, as that which is associated with the alleviation of distress.

If you just apply my little plain talk this morning to your own dealings with men and women, you will find the truth of the poet's words that "One touch of nature makes the whole world kin." Some of us have passed through certain sorrows that we cannot speak about until we can find somebody who has passed through exactly that sorrow. Until you have lost a little child, do not be foolish enough to try to cheer and comfort somebody else who is weeping by the side of a little casket. If you have not lost a husband, you cannot understand what widowhood means. If you have not lost your parents, you do not know how awful it is. But if you have passed through that trial, you have a power of consolation which makes you an angel of consolation to your stricken brother. You have got to go through it in order to know it, and out of every sorrow there comes sympathy.

Let me close, by saying that suffering brings the choicest refinements that human nature or human life can ever know. You go into some house to-day, where they are celebrating some festal season, a wedding or a child's birth, so that the whole house is aglow with merriment and music. Nothing wrong about it. Everything right and pleasant and happy; but suddenly there comes the news that a little child is ill in the house. What happens? Well, you would not dance, would you? You would not play; you would not sing. The house would be lifted up and elevated and refined by the presence of that little sufferer in the other room.

Ah, there is something majestic! I begin to see now why it was that God permitted it. He knew how shallow we were, how un-Christlike, and, therefore, God had to bring forth in the chemistry of his own infinite wisdom this divine, lofty plan for the purifying of men and women, and for developing them, so that now it is so true that we must have pain, that we can say as one writer said long ago:

God had one Son without sin,
But no Son without sorrow.

Can I apply this principle more plainly than this? If you do not have any trouble, you have reason to ask whether you are a child of God. You say, where is the authority for such an awful suggestion? This is it: "Whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth." Courage, then, my brother! Your suffering, which is so bitter to you, is a token of sonship. Read on and you learn that he who is without chastening is no true son. That is God Almighty's word. Comfort then. "Comfort ye my people, say unto them, Behold your God. He giveth power to the faint, and to them that have no might, he increaseth strength. They that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength; they shall mount up with wings as eagles; they shall run and not be weary; they shall walk and not faint."

TIBETAN PRAYER-WHEEL

CABLE advices to the press announce that the British forces under Col. Younghusband have entered Lhasa, the capital of Tibet. No opposition was made after the passage of the Karola. A delegation of commissioners met the expedition and asked that negotiations might be resumed at a distance from the city, as the Dalai Lama might die of shock if the capital was profaned by the feet of the stranger. The British leader replied that as the expedition had already been halted once for negotiations, which had proved futile, and as it had been attacked by Tibetan troops, he felt it incumbent to proceed to Lhasa and have the treaty signed there.

On entering the city, the British troops showed respect for the prejudices of the Tibetans, by encamping in an open space a mile away from the sacred mount of Potala, on which the Lama's palace is built. They were informed that the Lama, with M. Dorjeff, his Russian adviser, had quitted the city, and were at a monastery eighteen miles off. He had, however, left authority with his representatives to conclude an arrangement with the British and had also deposited the royal seals in the palace, so that the treaty might be duly signed and sealed. The Amban, who is the representative of China in Tibet, had remained at Lhasa to take part in the negotiations. As Tibet is nominally tributary to China, the Amban's endorsement of the treaty, if it is signed, will give it binding force.

The city itself corresponds exactly to the plans which have been published. The surroundings are fertile, but the streets are filthy. The palace consists of an imposing mass of buildings on the mountain in the northwest quarter of the city, which commands a view of the great plain surrounded by mountains, on which cluster innumerable temples and monasteries. The rooms are richly decorated in Chinese style. There is no regularity about the streets, which divide the city proper into blocks of many shapes. In this district are the houses, huts, and shops of the common people. It can boast of only one important temple, and that is the Great Cathedral at its southwest corner. The street fronts not taken up by houses are chiefly occupied by shops, bazaars, and markets of all kinds.

Potala, the "Mountain of Buddha," on which the palace of the Dalai Lama stands, has played a most interesting part in the history of Asia. For the past 1,200 years it has been the most hallowed spot in Asia.

The Dalai Lama is twenty-eight years of age. He is the first in a century to attain that age. His predecessors were secretly put to death before they emerged from boyhood, by the Buddhist priests, who found it to their advantage to be regents under the nominal rule of a boy, rather than ministers of a ruler of responsible age. It has been his ambition to become independent of China. He contended that China ought to have gone to war with Great Britain in 1890 to prevent the seizure of Sikhim, which he claimed as Tibetan territory, and as China did not interfere, he practically renounced his allegiance. He accepted the tutelage of Russia, in the hope that Russia would protect him from the vengeance of China, and it was probably that fact which really stirred up British jealousy.

Signs of the theocratic character of the Tibetan government are found everywhere in the country. The Dalai Lama himself is revered more as the representative of Buddhism and the reincarnation of Buddha than as the ruler of Tibet. Around the city of Lhasa are many monasteries, in some of which there are said to be thousands of inmates. Many of these are not priests or monks, but students preparing for the priesthood. The people themselves are ignorant and superstitious. Their observance of their religious rites, in many instances, consists in little more than the turning of the cylinders which form the prayer-wheels of the country. A turn of the wheel is supposed to bring the prayer contained in it to the notice of the Supreme Being, and to be equivalent to a prayer uttered by the lips of the worshiper. The adherents of the Lama are far less intelligent than the Buddhists of Ceylon, over whom he exercises little if any influence.

In the Forbidden City

It may be hoped that if the British succeed in getting their treaty signed, it will contain provision not only for the entrance of traders into Tibet, but of missionaries also. For long years, Miss Annie Taylor and others have been waiting on the borders of the country, longing for permission to enter. The delay has been turned to account in familiarizing themselves with the Tibetan language, so that there might be no delay in beginning work when the way was open. Bibles also have been sent into Tibet by the waiting missionaries, who have found the traders willing to carry and circulate them. Thus the way has been prepared for the entrance of the missionary, and, by the blessing of God, a harvest of souls may be looked for.

Bishop Potter Fully Answered

BY REV. S. C. SWALLOW, Prohibition Candidate for President

YOU have asked me for a "brief expression of opinion" on Bishop Potter's sacrilegious performance in attempting to celebrate the nuptials between Christ and Belial. You ask "What should be the true attitude of the Church and of Christian people generally, toward the saloon, whether it should be one of tolerance and encouragement, along the line indicated in Bishop Potter's remarks, or of uncompromising hostility?"

In answer to this, I would say that nearly all of the Christian Evangelical denominations in this country have already put themselves on record. Several of them in their law-making bodies have gone so far as not only to demand total abstinence for the individual, and total Prohibition for the State; but have also declared that "no political party should receive the support of Christian men, which does not put itself on record, in an attitude of open hostility to the liquor traffic."

In all these denominations, therefore, every member who votes for the candidates of any political party that endorses the saloon, does that which the Church says no Christian ought to do.

But thus doing what ought not to be done, renders him un-Christian.

In answer to the question being asked by many, "Is not the tavern better than the present saloon?"

I will say yes, in the sense of being more orderly; but worse, in the sense of being more dignified and attractive, by virtue of furnishing meals to the hungry, and thus having an excuse to exist, aside from that of selling poison.

Under cover of getting something to eat, or meeting some engagement with a friend, many a total abstainer or occasional drinker will go to a tavern who would not be seen entering a saloon, and for the same reason might be enticed to take the first drink, or continue the habit already begun, because of the respectability of the surroundings.

The more respectable a drinking place is, the more respectable will be the class of the young men it will start on their journey to dram-drinking, neglect of home, and of Christian citizenship, and possibly to poverty, crime and an untimely death. It is the aristocratic place and not the low dive, that initiates our young men in their downward career.

Others are saying, in the absence of Prohibition: "Is not the Potter tavern a long step toward temperance?"

No, but rather toward drunkenness. Those of us who remember the old-time tavern, with its brood of roistering loafers, and nocturnal fights between drunken men, especially on battalion days, can see no great improvement in the so-called tavern over the saloon. Besides that, the Potter tavern is, according to all the descriptions, simply an up-to-date saloon called by a milder name, and consecrated with pious imprecations, mingled with impious libations, plus a free-lunch counter as a bribe to total abstainers to become drunkards.

The Bishop is quoted as saying in his address of desecration: "I belong to a dozen clubs. If I want to go out to dinner or a social evening, I can do so in any one of these clubs. But what of the man who lives in two rooms with five small children? He has no club. To get his glass of beer with his luncheon, he must go to the saloon. This is the greatest social movement New York has ever known. It is a movement everyone of us must take into account if you would save the republic."

Just so. And what of the woman whom that man swore he would support, love, honor and keep only unto, so long as they both should live?

If two small rooms, provided from the scanty amount saved after his liquor bills are paid, are sufficient for her comfort, and the comfort of the five children his whiskey-inflamed lust may have brought into the world, is good enough for her and them during twenty-four hours of every day, can't he stand it for twelve or fourteen hours?

"What meat does this modern Cæsar feed upon?" that he must have so much better fare than his long-suffering companion? How about her "long evenings," and longer vigils? The club is too often the man-trap. It is indeed a club, with which the husband beats out the life of the one whose burdens he has promised to share.

An Insult to Religion

BY JOHN G. WOOLLEY

THE Subway Saloon is probably the worst saloon in America, for the reason that it has been stamped safe, innocent, respectable, and even Christian, by Bishop Potter. It was an insult to religion for him to open it in the character of a priest, and to sing as its dedicatory ode, "Praise God from whom all blessings flow," was blasphemy. The reflex may be good, however. The universal shock experienced by good people is a good sign. So, perhaps, God makes the wrath even of a bishop to praise him.

The Church Should Repudiate his Action

BY BISHOP J. N. FITZGERALD

THE most damaging fact in connection with the part taken by Bishop Potter in the opening of the Subway Tavern, is that because of his official position it will be regarded as a representative act. He may plead that it is not such; but I greatly fear that the country at large will so regard it, and that the Church that has put such honor upon him, by calling him to his high office, will greatly suffer, unless that Church shall repudiate his action.

A Parody on Things Sacred

BY REV. FERDINAND IGLEHART, D.D.

BISHOP POTTER has justly had a long and useful career, has done signal service for the Kingdom of God and for his fellow-men, and has earned the respect and affection of the people generally. But for some time the singular stand he has taken on the drink question; his apology for the liquor traffic, and his reported friendliness to an open saloon on the Sabbath, have led us to fear that advancing years, or bodily infirmity, may have taken the keen edge off his intellect, and weakened his judgment. What minister, whose reason had not slipped a cog or two, would ever think of consecrating the Subway Tavern, which is only a third-rate saloon, to the cause of advancement and religion? He is sincere in his opinion that the institution will do good, but that sincerity will not prevent the untold harm which will result, nor should it shield him from the censure which an outraged public conscience feels.

The Bishop has fallen into two errors. The first is, that the saloon is a necessity to the poor man. This is not true. Many men are poor because they have had too much of the saloon already. We agree with the distinguished prelate that the saloon is the poor man's club—that it skins his scalp and blacks his eye and bruises the face of his wife and the backs of his children. We object to the manufacture of any more such poor men's clubs, even in the name of religion.

Now that the good Bishop has shown us a sober way of drinking, let him continue the argument and reveal a truthful way of lying, an honest method of stealing, a virtuous form of vice, and a good way to be bad, and then call upon the congregation to sing the Doxology, and be dismissed. What a parody on all sacred things is the blackboard in front of the Subway. "Yes, this is the place dedicated by Bishop Potter. Come in. All are welcome." What colossal insolence in an institution which is run in the interest of Satan for the money there is in it, to ask the favor of the public because it has the sanction and sanctification of the Christian Church.

FERDINAND IGLEHART.

Bishop Potter's "Ghastly Blunder"

BY J. G. HALLIMOND

BISHOP POTTER is a good and sincere Christian man, but he has perpetrated a ghastly blunder, and, if he lives two or three years longer, he will be ready to put on sackcloth and ashes, when he realizes the terrible and appalling havoc he has unwittingly wrought to thousands of precious lives.

To the Ocean Grove remonstrant, who telegraphed him on the day of the opening of the Bleeker Street rum shop, the bishop flippantly replied: "This person evidently is ignorant of the conditions of New York City life."

I speak for only one section of Bishop Potter's diocese, but it is one of the most populous, and contains the Pro-Cathedral, with which he has been most intimately associated, and I cannot forbear the remark that of the conditions of life in this neighborhood he most profoundly and culpably ignorant, or he certainly would never have resorted to such an utterly insane method of solving the temperance question as the opening of another house for the sale of intoxicating drinks. Bishop Potter is quite right in his contention that the Church must make further provision for meeting the social instincts of the people. Surely we have all been terribly negligent of the very clear commands of our Lord and Master in this respect. But to do this by selling to them "liquid damnation," is just as sane a method as would be an attempt to convert the Chinese by opening respectable (?) opium joints.

I am a worker amongst the shipwrecks of society. They are flung here, right at Bishop Potter's doors by the tens of thousands annually—and fully ninety-nine per cent. come here through the habit of drinking alcoholic beverages. They all began in the apparently harmless manner, that many a bright young fellow began in the Bleeker Street "Tavern," immediately after the bishop sang the doxology the other day.

The attitude of the Church towards rum-drinking must be one of unceasing and uncompromising hostility.

It will Make Hell to Rejoice

BY S. H. HADLEY

YOU have asked me to give an expression of my opinion about the "Subway Tavern," or "grim mill," which has been started by churchmen and dedicated by Right Rev. Bishop Potter. I have been missionary among the criminal class, mostly in the lower part of the city, for twenty-two years, and I wish to tell the half million of people who will read these words in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, that I have never seen anything so sad, or anything I feel more like weeping over, than this saloon, opened and dedicated by the most prominent prelate of one of the most beloved and powerful Churches in this city, with a prayer and "Praise God from whom all blessings flow." Such a forward step toward rendering the Church of Jesus Christ utterly impotent in her warfare against sin, surely must have caused a holiday in hell.

As soon as the Church begins thus to openly compromise with sin, and to advocate and sell alcohol, she loses her power. The Holy Spirit will be withdrawn from her, and sinners will laugh at her. The saloon

Concerning Weights

YOUNG converts frequently ask the question whether certain things that they have been accustomed to do, are permissible after they have become Christians. Is it right to dance, to attend the theatre, to read novels, to play cards? If it is wrong to indulge in these practices, the demand is generally made for reasons. Why is it wrong? Does the Bible forbid it? Sometimes it is not easy to give a satisfactory answer. Christianity does not lay down hard and fast specific laws. It lays down principles, and leaves the Christian to apply them for himself.

One of the most comprehensive of these principles is that commended by the Apostle to his converts: "Laying aside every weight." The figure is that of the racer. His whole soul is set on reaching the goal and winning the prize. He is prepared to sacrifice everything to that object. In his diet, in his dress, in his associations, he makes everything subservient to his chief aim. If he is fond of some particular food, but finds that eating it reduces his running power, he abstains from it. If his shoes are pretty and becoming, but do not adapt themselves to swift running, he changes them for some that are perhaps less graceful, but are better suited for the race. If certain company or certain places tend to distract his thoughts, and embarrass him in training, he avoids them. The question with him is not one of right or wrong, but whether the thing in doubt helps or retards him in winning the race. Is it a weight? If it is, he lays it aside.

The spiritual race is of the same order. There are some Christians who are content to be stationary. To be just saved is enough for them; but there are others who yearn for spiritual development. They want to reach the heights. Whatsoever blessings and privileges Christianity has to confer, they want to attain. The goal is to become perfect men in Christ Jesus. Having been born again, they want to come to the stature of men. It is for these that the advice of the Apostle is given. Those who desire to make progress and to become such as Christ would have them be, have to adopt this principle of the weights. For the others, who have no such ambition, it is logical to discuss the right and wrong of a practice and to keep everything that is pleasant, so long as it cannot be proved to be wrong.

There is no need to be specific as to the nature of these weights. The Christian finds them out by experience. He soon learns what things affect him. The experience of another is no guide. A habit, an indulgence, a recreation, can be measured by this standard. If he finds that anything retards spiritual growth, if he is less Christlike after it, less inclined for communion with God, if his spirit is excited or perturbed, if his thoughts revert to the past pleasure, if association with a certain acquaintance induces a worldly or debasing effect—in any of these results, he can recognize the weight, which he is called on to lay aside. The question is one of comparison. If his supreme, predominant desire is for spiritual attainment, anything that binds him to the world, that keeps his soul from soaring, is laid aside, no matter how dear and pleasant it may be. This is the condition of success. The choice rests with him; it is for him to say whether the crown, he hopes to gain, is worth the sacrifice he must make to attain it.

Save Africa's Little Children

IN the great work of African evangelization, it is of the highest importance to get hold of the children first. This is the principle upon which the late Bishop William Taylor worked so successfully during the closing years of his African labors. It is, moreover, the principle now beginning to be generally recognized by all who labor in the foreign mission field among the "raw heathen." The children first. Get a child into the mission, train it in the Christian faith and surround it with loving Christian example, and you have a convert who will stand firm and fast, and one, moreover, who will, in turn, become an influential factor in bringing others into the fold.

A great blessing has come to India through the adoption of thousands of her orphan children by God's people in this land. These children, trained in Christian missions, are now themselves going out by the scores and hundreds, as workers in the Gospel harvest field. In this manner, a large number of devoted men and women in America, though unable to go to the mission field and do "personal service," are represented there by proxy. Their faithful substitutes are doing splendid service in their stead.

To those who are not thus represented in the foreign mission field, a new opportunity now presents itself. In the widely-extended diocese of Bishop Hartzell, the successor of Bishop Taylor, there are many African tribes of "raw heathen" who as yet know little of the Gospel. It is proposed to take into the mission stations young children from those tribes, with the consent of their parents, and to train them to lives of practical Christian usefulness. It will cost $15 a year to clothe, feed, and educate a child under this arrangement. These children are of various tribes, and their ages range from one year to nine or ten. Every person desiring to have a share in this work, and to become sponsor and spiritual foster-father or mother to a little raw heathen boy or girl, should write to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, stating preference as to sex and age, and an immediate reply will be forwarded. We have the lists from the field, and would be glad to see these little dusky spiritual wards taken up cordially and promptly. Patrons will be put in communication with the missionaries, and ultimately with the children themselves, and will thus enjoy direct personal contact with the work they create.

Address all letters on the subject of child adoption in Africa to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, New York.

Bishop Potter's Reply

THAT Bishop Potter already regrets his recent "dedication" of an East-Side liquor saloon, and the storm of adverse criticism it has evoked, is apparent in the reply he has just addressed to his critics. At the outset, he makes the statement that he "never dreamed of regarding the present saloon as either a blessing or a necessity. . . . I simply regard it," he says, "as an inevitable and necessary evil, until it is displaced by something better." He then proceeds to arraign the friends of temperance reform in the United States, and especially the advocates of total abstinence and prohibition, as impractical extremists. He pronounces their well-meant zeal misdirected and utterly inhuman, inconsiderate and unreasonable, since it contemplates "a law of indiscriminate repression."

But though Bishop Potter thus vigorously assails the gallant army of Christian men and women who have fought the battles of temperance in America bravely, hopefully and prayerfully these many years, he is quite willing to admit that there is a drink evil, and that it is a very real and substantial evil. He would restrain the traffic—not crush it utterly. The saloon-keeper, he reminds us, has back of him "a great multitude who regard their rights as invaded when he is attacked, and yet not one in five of whom would not own that his business is largely mischievous in its effects and almost universally deteriorating in its tendencies. Is the whole incapable of transformation?" he asks. He then proceeds to commend the problem to the practical consideration of the same American brains and genius that have transformed great industries, and urges the generous use of capital in a movement on the lines of the temperance reform now proceeding in England in connection with what is popularly known there as "The Public House Movement." He roundly denounces the American use of liquor at private tables, at banquets, on social and official occasions, and especially the "treating" custom—that "hideous freemasonry of drink"—in clubs and bar-rooms. He calls upon the "friends of moderation" to see "whether something cannot be done to restrain a traffic whose utterly immoderate and unchastened aggressions threaten the very foundations of the State and the peace and order of society."

It is only justice to the Bishop to say that his arraignment is a strong one; but, taken in conjunction with his recent appearance as an advocate of the tavern, it is simply incomprehensible. How are we to reconcile his public praise of the tavern, as "a place that I can take my wife, my mother, and my sister to with his later denunciation of saloon-keepers as 'the pies who prey upon labor,' and whose gains are a curse and a dishonor to the community? Is it wise to temporize with such palpable wickedness?

Bishop Potter's remedy for this condition of affairs is not a radical one; it is quite gentle and humane, consists of substitution. In place of the saloon, he would give us the tavern, a sort of "reformed" or substituted saloon. He would not attempt to make people sober; he would make them drink less and stop "treating." The saloon-keeper—that "harpy," as he incidentally styles him—he would reform also by some unexplained process which is to be included in the wonderful moderation movement, so that the man may have bowels of compassion for his victims. And when all this has been accomplished, respectable citizens can take their families to these temples of moderation, enjoy their privileges, and sing the Doxology.

For the purpose of enlightening himself concerning Bishop Potter's idea of a reformed saloon, the writer visited the tavern recently dedicated by the Bishop. He found it to be an ordinary, cheap bar-room, of the type common to the lower East-Side; neither more nor less inviting than its fellows; selling the regulative drinks to the average array of loungers one may see in such places. Whatever special moral or elevating influences it may possess, they certainly were not in evidence. It was simply a common rum-shop, where the facilities for degrading both body and soul were ample as the most ardent advocate of such places could desire. It is doing a flourishing business on the strength of the publicity given by Bishop Potter, and will doubtless continue to boom until the nine days' wonder has ceased. To say that it is a place where one would wish to take wife, mother or sister, would be the wildest stretch of the imagination.

Bishop Potter has unwittingly rendered a great service to the cause of temperance. While, by his recent course, he has placed himself in an equivocal position, he has been the means of stirring up the whole temperance question and focussing public attention upon the saloon evil as it has not been focussed in many years. For this signal service, the friends of temperance everywhere ought to be willing to overlook all his faults and tender him their united and grateful acknowledgments.

IN the British Royal Academy, the great canvas by Sigismund Goetze, entitled, "Despised and Rejected of Men," has unquestionably been one of the art sensations of the year. Writing of the painting the critic of The London Graphic, says:

"It is the most attractive painting to the mass visitors to the Royal Academy. The allegory—if it is not too realistic to be called by such a term—makes a popular appeal. Is it nothing to you, all ye that pass by and the manner of its treatment is well fitted to its purpose. While the martyred Christ, the Deus ignotus, the crowd, stands as the living sign below the symbol of the Holy Grail, the people of to-day, with one exception, pass on unconcerned. That exception is the hospital nurse, the heroic soul who turns and remembers but sportsman and scientist, soldier and man and woman about-town, laborer and demagogue, theological disputant and even the high representatives of the Church, are all engrossed by their own affairs, deaf to the appeal of inner religion, and even of charity, which calls out to them from the base of the altar; while betting men and lovers prepare us for the sequel suggested by the man who cries his papers—showing how the vices of the rich corrupt the poor who batten upon them. The picture, in fact, is a painted sermon, able if exaggerated in its argument; the pulpit is for once the Royal Academy. This allegory—which the critic has aptly called 'a painted sermon'—is applicable to conditions in all parts of the civilized world. It is a picture to study deeply and to ponder about, in order that the full force of the lesson it teaches may be understood.

Turkey Menaced

DECISIVE measures have been taken by our Government to compel the Sultan of Turkey to amend his conduct to our citizens in his Empire. Long-standing grievances have frequently been brought to the Sultan's attention without avail. Citizens of the United States traveling in Turkey have been molested, in spite of treaties, the schools established by American missionaries have been arbitrarily closed, and the privileges granted to other nations have been withheld from us. Mr. Leishman, our Minister at Constantinople, has been instructed to make a formal protest to the Sultan covering all the grievances of which our Government has reason to complain. Scant attention was paid to the protest, and Mr. Leishman reported that the audience with the Sultan, at which a reply was to have been given to his complaint, had been postponed from time to time. Our Government became exasperated by the Sultan's evasions, and finally decided to make a display of force. Instructions were sent to Rear Admiral Jewell to proceed to Smyrna with three American warships—the Olympia, the Baltimore, and the Cleveland. The Mediterranean fleet was also instructed to remain within easy sailing distance. The arrival of the three vessels at Smyrna was reported on August 12. On the same day Minister Leishman informed the Secretary of State that he had received an intimation from the Turkish Government that "it was disposed to give immediate attention to the demands of the United States." It does not appear that the Sultan has promised to grant the demands, but it is a promise that could not be extracted from him before, that he would give them "immediate attention." Perhaps news of the arrival of the three vessels them. The birth of this son is, therefore, an event deeply gratifying to the Emperor and the nation. He is to be named Alexis. It is expected that, in gratitude for the event, the Emperor will make some important concessions to the people, either in the remission of taxation, or in some other relief from public burdens. The cable dispatches report the joy of the people as ecstatic, kissing one another in the streets and dancing in their delight. Yet they do not know whether, if the child grows up and comes to the throne, he may be such a ruler as they desire. There was no such joy when One entered the world as a new-born child, of whom God had assured men that the blessing of his reign should be infinite.

Unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given; and the government shall be upon his shoulder; and his name shall be called . . . the Prince of Peace (Isa. 9: 6).

A Father Repudiated

It is not often that a man desires to get rid of a name which has been mentioned honorably in military despatches and has been placed on the honor rolls of the name, and will inherit a considerable fortune. The change is a symbol of mutual affection. It is so that the believer regards it when he takes upon him the name of Christ, rejoicing in the love that has redeemed him, and pledging his own love in return.

Fear not, for I have redeemed thee, I have called thee by thy name; thou art mine (Isa. 43: 1).

A Train Saved

A remarkable escape from disaster on the Hudson River Railroad is reported from Poughkeepsie, N. Y. A woman who lives near the line, three miles north of the city, was looking out of her house a few days ago, at the raging of a severe thunder-storm. She saw the lightning strike a tree, and, in a few minutes, the fierce wind blew down the trunk across the tracks. Realizing that the Troy Express would soon be due, she seized a scarlet table-cover, and ran out in the storm to the entrance of a curve. She knew that coming around the curve the engineer would not see the heavy tree lying across the tracks. She stationed herself at a point from which she could be seen a long way off, and waved her red signal. Soon the rumble of the express was heard, and the woman watched anxiously to see if her signal would be observed. To her delight, she saw the engineer had shut off steam. In another minute, the train was brought to a standstill beside her. She told the officials of the obstruction, and men were sent forward to remove it. The engineer and the passengers crowded around the woman and overwhelmed her with thanks for their preservation. Unhappily, people are not so grateful when warned of their spiritual danger. Men often go on, heedless of their danger, even though in one of his ports may have contributed to produce prompt action on his part. Many men act in their relations to God as the Sultan has acted toward our Government, but there comes a time, as the history of the favored nation shows, when patience is at an end.

They mocked the messengers of God and despised his words, and thus his prophets until the wrath of the Lord arose (II Chronicles 36: 16).

An Heir to the Czar

There is general rejoicing in Russia over the birth of an heir to the throne. The good news was communicated to the people on August 12, by the firing of cannon, the ringing of the church bells, and the public announcement at special services in the cathedrals. The news comes as a relief to public anxiety throughout the empire. It was feared that should the Emperor die, leaving no male issue, there might be intrigues and dispute as to the right of succession between the Emperor's brother and his cousins. Four daughters have been born to the Imperial couple, and the superstitious among the people thought that it was a mark of divine displeasure that no heir had been granted to army, but such an instance is reported in the records of the Supreme Court of New York. The applicant is a young man, who stated that when he was five years old his father deserted him and his mother. The mother toiled to support them for several years, but at last fell ill and died. The boy found a home with neighbors and worked for his board, but he was growing up in ignorance. Some one who saw him, related the facts to the brother of the boy's mother, who sent for him and took him into his home. He has been well educated and has proved intelligent and grateful. His uncle has grown fond of him and has had him taught a trade, at which he is making satisfactory progress. In all these years the boy has never seen his father, though during the Spanish American War, he noticed in the papers that he had distinguished himself in battle, and had been promoted. No help whatsoever had he given to the son whom he had unnaturally deserted, nor had he manifested any interest in his welfare. The young man now asked the Court to sanction his changing his name to that of his uncle, as the latter, who is becoming an old man, had promised to make him his heir if he would do so. The court granted the petition, and in future the young man will be legally known by his uncle's

He that being often reproved hardeneth his neck shall suddenly be destroyed and that without remedy (Prov. 29: 1).

BRIEF NOTES

The oldest minister in active work in the United States is said to be Rev. N. L. Clark, of Newton, Miss., who is in his ninety-third year, and has been sixty-four years in the Baptist ministry.

Booker T. Washington, of Tuskegee, Ala., has been elected a member of the Phi Beta Kappa Society of Harvard, one of the most famous Greek-Letter Societies in the country.

The General Secretary of the Christian Endeavor Society, reports an increase of two thousand in the number of societies during the year, making a net aggregate of 64,758.

A World's Congress of Baptists will be held in London next July. The proposal emanated from churches in America, but the consensus of opinion was that the British metropolis would be the most convenient rendezvous for the majority of the delegates.

Commissioner Booth-Tucker, the head of the Salvation Army in the United States, is bidding this country farewell. He has been summoned to London to hold a more important office at headquarters. While we congratulate him, we regret that he is leaving us. His administration has been singularly successful. It is expected that Miss Eva Booth, the youngest daughter of Gen. Booth, now Commissioner in Canada, will succeed him.

THE DASH OF THE "INCONSTANT"

"By all means," said the marquis, "Do what you can for him, my child. We owe him much."
"We'll return in a moment, sir," said Macartney, now eager to be alone with the woman he loved, if only for a second.

He led the way into the cabin. The cabin of the frigate was a spacious one, a swinging lamp from the ceiling gave plenty of light. By Louise's direction Macartney procured a basin of water, a towel and a pair of scissors from his stateroom opposite. He placed them on a table and sat down beside it. The girl stepped behind him, pressing her fingers to his head and bending it toward the light.

"Why, it's a deep gash," she exclaimed.

"Faith," said Macartney smiling, "your fingers are more deadly than the enemy's bullet, mademoiselle. I did not feel that, but your touch is more than I can stand."

"Is this the time for jesting, monsieur?" interrupted the girl severely.

The next instant she began to cut away the hair from about the wound. The bullet had glanced upward along the cheek and passed over the temple. In a moment she had bared the place, then with deft fingers she washed it, wiped it with the towel, and looked about as if for something softer as a bandage.

"Haven't you anything better than this?" she asked him, lifting the towel, "the linen is so coarse."

"Nothing, I am afraid," smiled Macartney. "That's good enough for a sailor."

There was a sound as of some one stooping, then a sudden long and one short pull.

"It's part of my linen skirt," she said, binding the soft cloth around his head. "'Tis the best I can do."

"An angel could do no better."

"Now, monsieur, how do you feel?"

"Comtesse," said Macartney fervently, "I wish it had taken off my head—the bullet, I mean. Then you would not have finished with me so soon."

He rose to his feet as he spoke, and accidentally brushed against her arm. He noticed that she winced as if in pain.

"What!" he cried in dismay and remorse in his voice. "You were hurt, too, and I forgot it!"

"You did not forget it when you—picked me up and ran with me. Oh, monsieur, how could you?" She blushed painfully at the recollection, and yet it had been rather pleasant after all. She found herself agreeing with him, when he said boldly:

"I'd like a chance to do it again! But your wound, mademoiselle? Let me see it."

"It is nothing," she said softly. "Merely a scratch."

"Yes, That's what you said about mine, and you convinced me that it was very serious indeed. It's my turn now. Where is it?"

"There!" pointing to her left arm.

Whipping out his knife he gently slit the sleeve. There was a little nick about half an inch long in the upper part of her arm. The bullet had just broken the skin. But it was an ugly looking spot in the soft, white flesh of that round, young arm. If she had lost her arm Macartney could not have made more to-do about it. He washed it tenderly. Then in reckless daring he bent and kissed it.

"Your treatment differs from mine, monsieur," said the girl, protesting faintly.

"Faith, yes. I think it's an improvement on yours," said Macartney. "and it isn't too late to try it on me if you like the effect. Now, if I only had something to bind it up with. Here, let me give you this."

He lifted his hand to the bandage about his head.

In another moment she placed a slender piece of linen in his hand.

"How beautifully you tie knots," she said, as she noted his skilful handiwork.

"There is one—one knot I'd like to tie—"

"And that one?" she asked him incautiously.

"Is the one that would bind us together, mademoiselle."

"I am for France, monsieur," she answered shaking her head.

"This for France," he cried, slipping his arm about her waist. He stooped over, and bent to kiss her lips. She did not struggle or shrink away.

"Monsieur!" she cried.

There was such piteous entreaty in her voice, as if he were so strong and she so weak, that he stopped. Such forbearance was a new thing for Macartney. The girl waited a second, and then her head dropped before him. He released her, and as he did so he bent and kissed her golden hair.

"You saved my life," she murmured in self-justification.

"This privilege pays for it already," he answered softly. "Besides that shot when I lost my sword! You saved mine, and it's yours always. Oh, mademoiselle—Louise—" He took both her hands in a warm, passionate clasp—"believe me, I love you with my whole soul!"

There was a noise at the door, and Mr. Hoste entered the cabin.

"Mr. Frazier says we are coming down upon the batteries very fast, sir."

"I am coming, Mr. Hoste. Go below, comtesse," said Macartney. "You will be safer there."

He turned instantly, and stepped out upon the deck. Already the batteries in the forts were firing toward the ship. The water all around her was cut into jets of spray by the glancing shot. Macartney ran up the ladder and stood at the break of the poop, where he could see everything.

"Let no one fire under pain of death until I give the order," he called out to the men in the batteries. "We'll pour a smashing broadside into them on either hand, and so win through in the smoke."

"'Twill be close work, sir," said the marquis, who had joined him.

"Ay, but we shall make it right enough, sir."

The shots from the shore were coming quicker then. One from a heavy gun, better aimed than the rest, crossed the deck and tore a great hole in the mainsail. Another carried away the forward swifter of the starboard foreshrouds. A third struck down a man in the forecabin.

"Another moment and we'll be abreast of them," urged the vice-admiral, his soul kindling at the prospect of action.

"I know it," said Macartney coolly.

The batteries on the shore were blazing furiously now. Shot was hurled upon them in every direction. "Stand by!" shouted the captain.

As he spoke there was a crash above his head. The main topgallant mast had been carried away by shot and hung in a tangled mass of wreckage, thrashing to leeward. The wind was sweeping through the top-hammer with increasing force. She was carrying all she could stand, and a touch meant a lost spar or sail. Well, there was nothing to be done but hold on now. Macartney cast one glance upward, and seeing that the damage was not so serious as it might have been, he lifted the trumpet and shouted:

"Fire!"

The frigate quivered and shivered from truck to keelson with the shock of the two mighty broadsides. Her forty heavy guns hurled a very tempest of iron toward the shore on either hand. The broadsides did much execution. The fire that was returned, as she rushed forward into her own smoke driven ahead by the fierce wind, was sputtering and ineffectual. As they raced past the promontory, Macartney put his helm down, brought the ship by the wind; and, taking a bone in her teeth, she bore up for the open sea.

CHAPTER XII

THE MARQUIS SAYS "NO!"

"MADEMOISELLE!" exclaimed the captain in some surprise, as he descended to the quarter-deck, where Louise and Aurore were standing. "Were you there all the time. It was dangerous; extremely so, you know."

"Yes," answered the girl, "but I couldn't go below. My—my grandfather was in peril. I could not leave him."

"Admiral," said Macartney, "if you will take the comtesse to my cabin I will join you in a moment or two. I must first look to my ship and my men."

"Sir," said the marquis, as soon as this matter had been attended to, "there are several things I wish to say to you."

And one at least, thought Macartney, that I wish to say to you.

"Yes, monsieur," he said to the older man.

"First, I desire to compliment you on the way you handled your ship. It was magnificent. You are such a seaman, young man, as I should have been proud to have met with a ship of my own in my younger days. De Suffren would have appreciated you as I do."

"I thank you, sir."

"And I am under everlasting obligation to you for your gallant rescue of my party this evening."

"If I may make bold to ask, admiral, how came you to be in that situation?"

"I stayed on the walls to the very last moment. The troops with me were cut down as they fled. Not until then, I assure you, did I retreat."

"I can well believe that, sir."

"I was on horseback, and I easily made my way past the few Republicans who had gained the town at that time—although the canaille were swarming over the walls in every direction—to my hôtel. I knew of the alley down which I finally came, and I hoped to escape that way. I had given orders during the afternoon that Comte Honore and the comtesse, with their attendants, should repair on board the ships. Judge of my surprise, Monsieur Macartney, when I found them still there!"

"We could not go and leave you, grandfather," murmured Louise, while young Honore nodded in vigorous assent to her words.

"You should have obeyed my orders, child," said the marquis severely. "For me, you could do nothing with me—"

"I understand exactly how the comtesse felt," said Macartney eagerly, interposing to break the old man's censure. "Of course, she could not abandon you, monsieur; and the rest stayed with her."

The marquis looked at the young man keenly, then went on.

"Well, sir, we had successfully passed the first cross street when the mob overtook us—and you know the rest. How happened you to be there?"

"I was looking for you, sir. I had received order to burn the French ships, and having completed my task, so far as I could—"

"How many did you burn, monsieur?"

"Nine of the line."

"Nine magnificent ships!" exclaimed the marquis. "Alas, my poor France! Proceed, monsieur."

"I knew of the existence of this alley which led to your hotel."

"Captain Macartney, you have proved yourself an officer of address and courage. There is but one feature in your conduct of which I disapprove."

"What is that, my lord?"

"Why did you cheer those rascally Republicans in the last street?"

"Not from any choice, believe me, admiral. It was the only way by which I could win through with them—with yourself, sir."

"At any rate you saved us."

"But I would have failed, sir, had it not been for that young officer who interfered."

"I am loath to owe anything to a Republican," said the marquis gloomily.

"The Republic is bad enough," said Macartney "but there may be some good in individual Republicans. There was something about that man that impressed me profoundly. We shall hear from him again, I feel sure."

"He certainly did us good service. I shall see, continued the old man thoughtfully, "when his majesty is restored to his own, that the young officer is not beheaded. I wish we had learned his name, mused the marquis. "His appearance is unfamiliar to me. Certainly, he does not belong to the haute noblesse. Well, monsieur, perhaps the time may come when I may show gratitude to you in some fitting way."

"You may show it now," said the Irishman, "although I do not urge my request on that plea."

"And how may I show it now?"

"Sir, I love your granddaughter."

"What, Captain Macartney! You! An Englishman, a commoner, a sailor, have dared to love the Comtesse de Vaudémont! Impossible!"

"Sir," said Macartney stanchly, "'tis true that I am a sailor. But so are you. My present rank in the service is but two degrees less than yours. I see no reason why I should not eventually fly an admiral's flag, and that sooner than you think. My family is as old as your own. I have as yet no title, but I can win one. I love the comtesse and would fain make her my wife."

"Sir, you have told me before that you have nothing but your profession. You are absolutely penniless, saving your pay, which I understand is meagre. My granddaughter, together with her young brother here, is heiress to the vast estates of the de Vaudémonts."

THE TWO CAPTAINS

"Let me remind you that those estates are in the hands of the French Republic."

"Temporarily, yes, but that is a matter of but a short time. No, monsieur, I am under many obligations to you which I shall discharge in some suitable way, believe me," continued the old man firmly but kindly, "and there are many reasons why my granddaughter is not for you and cannot be! Put the idea out of your head, sir, 'tis impossible. The demoiselle de Vaudémont will have other suitors of her own rank and her own race."

"I will have no one, Monsieur le Marquis," cried Louise, her eyes shining, her bosom heaving, "As I told Monsieur Macartney, I am for France."

"Be it so," said her grandfather gravely, "we'll not talk of marrying or giving in marriage while our country is in this unhappy state. We will wait until our joy come to his own again."

"But may I not hope then, marquis?" cried Macartney.

"No, my friend," returned the marquis promptly and firmly. "At least not from any word or sanction of mine."

"But, monsieur—"

"We are your guests, captain, and crave your consideration as to the choice of topics for future conversation."

"You say well," said Macartney, "as my guests you may command me. But king or no king, France or no France, I shall never cease to aspire to the hand of the Comtesse de Vaudémont; nor to hope that in the end she may give heed to my passion. We will say no more about it. Now, Monsieur le Marquis, what can I do for you?"

"Whither are you bound?" asked the marquis.

"I rejoin the fleet in Hyères Bay. Where do you wish to go?"

"I am told the Regent is in Westphalia. If we could be taken to the most convenient port and landed there, should like to join him with my family."

"That will be Trieste, sir, I think, since Italy is held by the French. When I report to Lord Hood," said Macartney formally, "I will ask his permission to take you where you desire. Meanwhile, I beg you and your wife to consider this cabin as your own."

"Sir, we thank you for your courtesy. The accommodation is all that we could desire."

Macartney had a chance for another word with Louise which he instantly embraced.

"I am for France," she said softly.

"Nay," said the Irishman, "but for me."

The marquis turned at that instant.

"Good-night, messieurs," said the captain, saluting and stepping toward the door.

By the door stood Brébœuf. He drew up his gigantic frame as the Irishman approached him. He was so tall that his head almost touched the top of the low cabin. He knuckled his forehead like a seaman.

"A man," he said in his deep-toned voice.

It was the first time Macartney had ever heard him speak. He stopped in bewilderment, half comprehending.

"He means," said the girl softly, "that you are a man indeed. 'Tis a great compliment from Brébœuf."

"I thank you, friend," said Macartney smiling, as he passed out on deck.

CHAPTER XIII

THE COMTESSE SAYS AU REVOIR!

MACARTNEY only stopped long enough at Hyères to obtain permission to take the marquis and his party to their destination. The long voyage to Trieste was the most maddening experience that Macartney had ever undergone. He had anticipated many a delightful fête-à-fête with the woman he loved, but the astute old vice-admiral so contrived that never for one moment was the young comtesse alone with him. By no address was Macartney able to get a private word with Louise.

Now no man would have been able to carry out such arrangements if the lady herself had been unwilling to co-operate in the endeavor.

"I am for France," she had said, and that, indeed, was no idle statement. It would be beyond the truth, however, to say that Macartney was indifferent to her. She had stopped him by a timely appeal when he bent to kiss her in the cabin. That he paid such instant attention to her wish, and had refrained when he might have gone on, was a source of joy to her; yet she found herself ablush with the thought that, perhaps, after all, she regretted her interposition.

All that the comtesse lacked was time and association. In the very nature of things Macartney would have won her. While he could not see her alone, and while it was difficult to express his feelings under the very eye and ear of the old vice-admiral, whose experience had made him very keen in affairs of the heart; yet the captain surrounded the woman with such an atmosphere of devotion that she drew it in with every breath she took. Insensibly, she found her interest and her affections more and more engaged by his demeanor.

Ten days after their departure from Hyères, the frigate dropped anchor off Trieste. The vice-admiral determined upon immediately quitting the ship. The preparations for the embarkation were soon completed. Like all the sailors in the English navy, the crew of the Inconstant had been taught to hate a Frenchman; but the vice-admiral was such a fine old seaman and gentleman that those who dwelt in the wardroom and steerage had learned to make an exception, so far as he was concerned, to the general rule.

The officers, therefore, proposed to dispossess the seamen of their places at the thwarts of the cutter, and row the old vice-admiral and his party ashore themselves. Macartney cheerfully gave his permission. The first lieutenant acted as coxswain. As the moment for their departure approached, the men were mustered in the waist, the officers in full fig on the quarter-deck, Macartney at their head. The vice-admiral came from the cabin.

"Captain Macartney, and gentlemen," he said, stopping in front of the little group, with his grandson and granddaughter by his side, "we are about to bid you farewell. You, sir, have rendered to his majesty the king—God bless him—a great service in the harbor of Toulon. You have also rendered me and mine personal services of the highest value. In the unhappy state of my poor country, the rewards which should certainly be yours, must remain in abeyance."

Macartney made a movement as if to protest, but the older man stopped him.

"Nay, monsieur, by your leave, hear me further. Under other circumstances there were no warrant for what I am about to do, but things have changed greatly, and I am sure that my master will be but too happy to approve of my action. Sir, I am a Grand Commander of His Most Christian Majesty's noble Order of St. Louis. As such I take upon myself to name you a Chevalier of that Order, subject, of course, to the proper confirmation, which I shall make it my business at once to see that you receive. And, Monsieur le Chevalier," went on the old man smiling, "if you will permit me to give you that title for the first time, I will honor myself, and I trust I may pleasure you, by asking you to wear my own cross of the Order until such time you may be privileged to receive the insignia from the hand of the king."

As he spoke, the marquis detached from his breast the cross of the Order, and fastened it to that of Macartney.

"Sir," said that young officer, bowing profoundly, hat in hand, before the marquis, "to have been of service to you—" his blue eyes shot one glance at the young girl—"and yours, is of itself reward enough. The honor you have vouchsafed to me overwhelms me. Should I be permitted, as I have no doubt I shall be, to accept this decoration by my king, I shall ever cherish it as a memorial of the happiest incidents and happiest hours of my life. That the cross has been yours makes it the more valuable, Monsieur le Marquis, and I hope when the formal investiture is made, I may be permitted to retain this," touching his breast, "as a remembrance of a brave and gallant ally, once a foeman, who has proven his courage and skill in every battle in which we have tried the temper of his sword. I ask no better fate than to have a chance like that again. Gentlemen, lads, all, three cheers for Vice-Admiral, the Marquis de Vaudémont."

"Gentlemen, I thank you," said the vice-admiral, turning to the officers and men in succession. "I thank you on my own behalf, on behalf of my family, and on behalf of my king. Monsieur Frazier," he added, turning to the first lieutenant and bestowing upon him a purse of gold—and the old man had but little treasure at his command to give away—"will you distribute this trifle among the crew of the L'Inconstant with Chevalier Macartney's permission, and beg them to drink in their English fashion the health of their friends, who, if war should ever come between the two kings, would like nothing better than to meet and dispute with such brave men the supremacy of the sea. Messieurs, farewell."

CAMPING ON MOUNT TABOR

ONE of the most inspiring features of the Annual Camp-meeting at Mount Tabor.

Morris County, N. J., is the series of special Interdenominational Evangelistic services, under the direction of Mrs. FitzGerald. These services began on Tuesday evening, August 23d, continuing for one week.

Mrs. FitzGerald's cottage, where these meetings are held, might aptly be described in the words of the prophet, "This is the law of the house: upon the top of the mountain, the whole nit thereof round about shall be most holy." The cottage stands upon the brow of the consecrated circle of Tabor, looking down into the tabernacle. It is a substantial structure, without architectural pretensions, and serves the double purpose of a summer home for its owner, and a gathering-place where is spread an ample table for souls hungering and thirsting after righteousness.

Mrs. FitzGerald's name and her work have influenced thousands of homes, and multitudes of grateful souls acknowledge her loving-kindness and help in things spiritual. She came of a family historic in American annals. Rev. Samuel Dunlop, her maternal great grandfather, fellow of Oxford, was a Presbyterian minister, who came to this country for the cause of Christ. He planted the first English church west of the Hudson River, and organized the first classical school in Central New York. He paid the martyr's death of his devotion with his blood. On the monument in Cherry Valley to the heroes who fell in the massacre of 1778, his name stands first.

Mrs. FitzGerald's father was a lawyer, a man of fine culture and a representative Presbyterian.

She was converted early in life, and when she married, in 1834, she became the centre of a refined and beautiful home. While exact in the performance of every wifely and motherly duty, she has always found time to be about her Master's work in church and social life.

Three meetings have been held daily during the regular sessions of the camp meeting; and for many years the Women's Holiness Association has held a week of service either before or after the annual meeting, as the trustees have directed. These meetings have always been well attended, and sometimes crowded to excess.

Some of Mrs. FitzGerald's sayings are very bright and much to the point, terse and suggestive. She says: "Our lives should be as pure as snowfields, where our footsteps leave a mark, but not a stain."

"Unless he obeys the Lord, my son, the Bishop, is no more to God than the man who rides the ash-cart past my door."

"I have more trouble with the heads than with the hearts of men. It is next to a miracle if a saved man goes through one of these head-cramming and heart-robbing institutions, and comes out as he went in."

"I believe in laying up my treasure where I am to live, not where I am to die."

"I have made hundreds of prayers that did not go higher than my head. It is one thing to make prayers, and another thing to pray."

A Great Sea Fight off Port Arthur

PORT ARTHUR has again become a centre of vivid interest in the Russo-Japanese war. After a series of hard battles, the Japanese on August 9, had captured all the outlying defenses and had trained their heaviest siege guns on the main defenses. In the inner harbor, the Russian fleet lay at the mercy of the enemy's guns and within easy range.

When this fact became evident, Admiral Witthoef, the Russian Naval Commander, prepared to risk a dash for liberty. Rather than have his ships sunk at their moorings, without an opportunity for defense, he decided to force his way out under the Japanese guns and to cut a passage through the double naval cordon of Admiral Togo's ships.

At 7 o'clock A.M., on Wednesday, Aug. 10, the Russian fleet emerged from Port Arthur. It consisted of six battleships, four cruisers, and a flotilla of torpedo boats and destroyers. Admiral Togo immediately closed in with his warships and a severe battle ensued, lasting all day, and until darkness made further fighting between the big battleships and cruisers impracticable. During the night, however, the Japanese kept up an incessant attack by destroyers and torpedo flotillas.

At daybreak, according to a Tokio despatch, two of the Russian vessels, the battleships Retvizan and Pobieda, were seen steaming back to Port Arthur. The cruisers Askold and Novik both damaged, succeeded in reaching Tsungtao, a port in the German concession of Kiaochow.

A great battle had taken place off Round Island (48 miles east of Port Arthur), resulting in a complete Russian defeat. The battleship Czarevitch was riddled by shells, and Admiral Witthoef and many of his officers and crew killed. The whole Russian squadron was scattered—five of the battleships being seriously damaged. The Czarevitch succeeded in reaching Kiaochow Bay with three Russian destroyers. They will have to leave the neutral ports when the time limit expires, or be dismantled and put out of commission during the remainder of the war. The battleships Retvizan, Poltava, Pobieda and Sebastopol, and the cruiser Diana, all fled back, in a crippled condition, to Port Arthur.

Admiral Matussevitsh, next in command under Admiral Witthoef, who was also on board the flagship Czarevitch, died after the battle, of his wounds.

Following the scattering of the Port Arthur squadron came the news that Admiral Kamimura had met and defeated the Vladivostok squadron near Tsushima, in the Korean Strait, and that the Russian battleship Rurik had been sunk, with great loss of life. The Gromoboi and Rossia fled northward, in a damaged condition.

The dash of the fleet from Port Arthur is interpreted as indicating that the fortress has entered on the final stage of its defense, and that its downfall may soon be expected. All the outworks are said to have been captured, and the Japanese army is now within range of the main defenses. Heavy siege guns are being mounted. Wolf's Hill, Green Hill, Shinishiyung and other outlying works, were captured after fierce fighting.

There are said to be 10,000 sick in Port Arthur. A Tokio cablegram says, "Frequent invitations have been given the Russians in Port Arthur by the Japanese to surrender. On purely humanitarian grounds, the Japanese are desirous of inducing the fortress to yield before being carried by assault, and to prevent an unnecessary sacrifice of human lives." The carnage on both sides, in the recent fighting, has been appalling.

Russia's "Volunteer Fleet" consists of sixteen vessels, all named after Russian cities, viz: the Smolensk, with a displacement of 12,050 tons, and 16,500 indicated horsepower; the Moscow, with a tonnage of 11,660, and 15,500 horsepower; the Kieff, the Kherson, the Vladimir, the Ekaterinoslav, and the Voronej, each of 10,500 tons, but all slow save the Kherson; the Kazan, with 9,755 tons displacement; the St. Petersburg, with a tonnage of 9,282, and horsepower of 10,700; the Varoslav and Tamboff, twin ships of 8,635 tons, but very slow; Saratoff, of 8,556 tons, and the Orel, the Nijni-Novgorod, the Kostroma, with an average of less than 8,000 tons each, and the Khabarovsk, of 2,500 tons.

Only six have sufficient speed to be available as cruisers: the Smolensk, Moscow, Kherson, Orel, St. Petersburg, and Saratoff.

The dispute over the sinking of The Knight Commander, by the Vladivostok fleet, is still acute. The Russian Prize Court in its findings, declares that the ship's own letter-book proved her to be carrying contraband, and that her captain admitted the charge. The English Government takes the opposite view, and will insist upon full reparation.

The Russian Baltic fleet was announced to sail on August 16 for the Far East.

During the first ten days of August, the campaign in Manchuria, though retarded somewhat by extreme heat and consequent sickness in both armies, witnessed the further tightening of the Japanese cordon around the Russian military position. St. Petersburg was alarmed over the reports from Liao-Yang and Moukden. It was represented that a strong Japanese column had appeared in the rear of the Russian line of communications toward Moukden, and that simultaneously the Japanese force recently landed at Yinkow, had marched northward up the Liao Valley for the purpose of flanking Liao-Yang. It was also reported that the Japanese, in violation of neutral provisions, was using the Shantung railway for carrying supplies and for mobilizing troops for an attack on Sing-min-tung, thirty miles west of Moukden. In view of these new developments and of the imminent danger of being completely cut off from his northward communications, Gen. Kourapatkin began a rapid northward movement from Anshanshan. The enemy, according to the despatches received by the Russian General Staff, had not advanced farther than nine miles north of Haicheng, and there was little doubt that Gen. Kourapatkin would again be as successful in extricating his troops from a difficult position.

From the Japanese front in Manchuria, no news has been received since the fighting at Saimatzu and Simou cheng. It is known, however, that there have been daily encounters between the advanced posts of the armies, though no general engagement. Just when the long-expected "decisive battle" will be fought is apparently as doubtful as ever. Field-Marshal Oyama, the head of the Mikado's armies, is now at the front and directing operations in person.

HOW PERDICARIS CAME HOME

THE TANGIER PRISON

THE Rev. Frederick Weiss of Tangier, American missionary in Morocco, sends to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD this picturesque description of the return to the Moorish capital of Mr. Ion Perdicaris and his son-in-law, Mr. Varley, after their release by Raisuli, the bandit. Mr. Weiss writes:

TANGIER, MOROCCO, AFRICA, June 27th.
At last the captives, Ion Perdicaris and his son-in-law, have been released, and are again back in their home, near Tangier.

Mulai Ahmed, of Wazan, and those who accompanied him, left Tangier on Thursday morning, June 23, with the ransom money ($70,000), and about forty prisoners. This was the amount demanded by the bandit Raisuli. Mulai Ahmed was accompanied by a large number of armed tribesmen, horse and foot. On the other hand, Raisuli, with the captives and his own followers, were to start about the same time from their camp, to meet the ransom party half way. The meeting took place at the village of Remla in Beni-msawar, and the exchange was carried out without further difficulty. On Friday night, a runner arrived with the intelligence that the captives and party were on their way to Tangier. A large number of persons went out along the Fez road to witness their arrival. An eye-witness thus describes the scene: "A brilliant moon, a road bordered by rustic Moorish hedges, dotted here and there with villas, and sloping gradually down to the sandy plains of Swani. Beyond the hills and valleys, through which lies the road to Fez, and along which the clearness of the night allowed the eye to extend to the far-distant Atlas range; the barking of the ever watchful farm dogs was heard far and near. Occasionally, the figure of a native or Moorish guard, rising from the lower slope, stood out from the background on the moonlit hills. Suddenly a European rider in advance appeared, announcing the approach of those who had been captives, but now were free. After a while, the cavalcade itself came in sight. The firing of guns by the native retainers, the occasional shouts from onlookers, the flight of rockets; only the blast of a trumpet from the embattlements, was required to make the scene one of mediæval times."

El Minzah, Mr. Perdicaris' suburban residence, was reached at 12.30 A.M. Among those awaiting at the Minzah were Admiral Chadwick, of the United States Navy; the Hon. S. R. Gummere, United States Consul-General, several members of Mr. Perdicaris' family, and many friends. A few hurried handshakings and words of welcome, and the captives were once more enjoying the long-expected quiet and safety of their home.

FRED WEISS.

A press despatch from Tangier says the authority of the Sultan of Morocco is fast ebbing, while that of Monohbi, the former Minister of War and leader of the Liberal element in the kingdom, is increasing daily. The Sultan's appeal to the tribes for support has not been heeded, the whole country being opposed to the Sultan's idea of French occupation for the protection of foreigners. Stirring times are expected.

South Africa's Gospel Sunrise

MISSIONS EXTENDING AND CONVERTS INCREASING EVERYWHERE
THE GREAT WORK OF AFRICAN CHILD REDEMPTION FAIRLY BEGUN

CONSIDERING its size, Johannesburg is one of the wealthiest cities in the world, but unfortunately most of its people are so devoted to money-getting, that the spirit of Christianity is by no means kept pace with its other development, and much of the work which has been accomplished is due to the efforts of envoys from other lands. During the height of the mining season, this city contains nearly 100,000 souls, of whom nearly 250,000 are of the black race. Attracted by the labor in the mines, arduous as it is, they come from all portions of South Africa, many of them from kraals thousands of miles distant, merely to work for a few months, and then return to their native countrysides. The permanent black population, however, is nearly double that of the white. Realizing how the Gospel might be spread in away regions by converting these miners, missionaries have literally done heroic work which has been indeed fruitful. Churches, preaching stations, have been established at a number of the principal mining properties and "compounds," while in the native quarters of Johannesburg are a score of congregations composed almost entirely of the mining class. In connection with the churches, Sunday schools have been established, where instruction is also given during the daytime in the simpler branches pursued at the country schools of the United States. It is interesting to note that the attendance at these schools, as well as at the church services, has been surprisingly large. At Doornfontein, a church which has been organized, has no less than 350 members, nearly all men. Rev. Gardiner Muvumba is the pastor. An offshoot of this congregation has been established at Elandsfontein, which is in a very flourishing condition. These churches are under the supervision of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, and are among the most viable in South Africa. In Johannesburg, one of the largest churches is the Zulu Congregational Church. It has progressed so far that it is now entirely independent of the aid of the missionaries.

From these centres of religious activity, native Christians have gone into nearly every part of the Transvaal, who have greatly aided in spreading the truth among the various tribes to which they belong. The majority of the mine workers are Zulus. Where missionaries have succeeded in reaching them, they have been found ready to receive the good tidings, and so many have expressed a desire to labor among their kind, that in the vicinity of Johannesburg fully fifty preachers are now engaged. It is not unusual for services to be held either in some building or in the open air, which will be attended by from 600 to 700 men and boys, who give earnest attention. The majority of the missionaries have learned the Zulu tongue, and can address the people in their own familiar language.

In Johannesburg, the majority of the white people display but little interest in the moral or spiritual condition of the natives, in spite of the fact that they are absolutely dependent upon them for labor. Race prejudice exists to a great extent, and the situation of the miner is replete with hardship. For scanty wages, the men and boys remain over half of every twenty-four hours in the bowels of the earth, digging the quartz from the reef which contains so much of the precious metal. They separate the gold-bearing pieces of rock from the dross, when it is crushed in the stamping-mill, and perform practically all of the labor in these great plants. During the hours of service they are really prisoners, and are continually watched, lest they secrete a nugget of gold or a diamond. When they leave the of Commissioners for Foreign Missions recently made a careful investigation of the field. The deputation, which consisted of Rev. Dr. E. E. Strong and Rev. Dr. Sydney Strong, traveled considerably in South Africa, and especially in the Transvaal, and reported that the work is of the utmost importance, and has great possibilities of expansion.

The A. B. C. F. M. Mission to the Zulus is one of the historic missions of Africa. It was established in 1834 by six missionaries and their wives. At first, great difficulty was experienced in establishing an inland mission, owing to government opposition. Umlazi, near Port Natal, was the pioneer station. Schools were opened, a printing press set in operation, and a congregation of five hundred gathered, when the war between the Boers and Zulus brought the work to an end. Four years later the work was resumed, but the unsettled state of the country and the hostility of the powerful and treacherous Zulu king, Dingaan, decided the Prudential Committee to abandon the field in 1843. Natal then passed under British control, and the missionaries returned joyfully to their work. In 1844, the first convert, an old woman, was gained. In 1849, nine churches, with 123 members, had been organized. The language was reduced to writing; a Zulu dictionary and grammar were prepared, and the Bible was gradually translated and published. The work prospered, civilization entered, revivals occurred. In 1891 there were 9 stations, 18 out-stations, 4 native pastors, 16 churches, with 1,097 members; 142 unordained preachers, teachers, and other helpers; 1 theological school, with 17 pupils; 1 boys' boarding-school, 66 pupils; the Inanda Seminary and Umzumbe Home for Girls, 109 pupils; 29 common schools, 1,246 pupils; 9 missionaries and 19 female assistants. These have been greatly increased since.

The East Central African Mission was started at Inhambane in 1883. It is under the management of Rev. E. H. Richards, the well-known missionary, and is one of the chain of missions of the Methodist Church, under the general control of Bishop Hartzell. Rev. Mr. Richards writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, acknowledging contributions from the readers of this journal to his child-redemption work, and adding:

"I have intended writing you, but have been hindered by the building of two houses, and now I am at the third. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has helped us out not a little. I have purchased four horses and lost them all, and for three years have been footing it over our stations. The walk is nearly one hundred miles, to complete the trip, and I must go each quarter, and would go twice a quarter if there was any way to ride. Donkeys are now in the land, and while they are slow, still I am inclined to try them. The 'last thing they ever do' is to die, while horses vanish like dew. I have paid out over $600 of my salary for horses and lost them all, and am willing others interested in the work should, if they approve, help us out.

mine at the close of the day's work, every one is subjected to a rigid search for treasure, and if any is found, the negro is liable to be imprisoned for a term of years. Many a toiler, earning the equivalent of fifty cents a day, has found single gems which have been worth hundreds of thousands of dollars to the mine owner.

The importance of missionary work among these natives in the mining compounds, has been especially realized since a deputation from the American Board

DIVINE AND HUMAN VOICES

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON, BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS

Elijah in Retreat

WE can imagine Elijah writing some such account as this of a memorable scene in his life: "I am here in the cleft of the rock, where Moses was, when he prayed to the Lord to show him his glory. Moses' heart was stung that day by the rebellious people, who had chosen to worship a golden calf instead of the true and living God. And my heart is stung because the descendants of those people are worshipping other gods. I came to this sacred spot to be encouraged in God as Moses was. I will read again from the roll of Exodus how the Lord answered Moses' prayer (Exodus 33: 18-23), and I will pray.

"Even while I prayed, I heard the voice of the Lord saying: 'What doest thou here, Elijah?' And then I uttered my complaint, that the children of Israel had forsaken his covenant, thrown down his altars, slain his prophets; that only I was left, and my life was threatened. In the Lord's question, 'What doest thou here, Elijah?' I saw my folly in fleeing from my place of duty. But God was merciful to me. He would show himself to me as he did to Moses. His word came to me to go out and stand upon the mountain.

"On the mountain I stood, and waited for his appearing. While I waited a furious storm of wind burst upon the mountain, and great masses of rocks were hurled down. I did not see God, but I saw his power in the wind. And then followed an earthquake. I recalled the time when 'the whole mount quaked greatly,' as Moses waited for God when he was to receive from him the ten commandments.

"While I waited, lightning flashed about me, and I recalled how in Moses' time Mount Sinai was like a furnace because the Lord descended upon it (Exodus 19: 16-20). After these mighty displays of God's power in nature came a 'still small voice,' which he showed me was more effective in revealing his will to the soul than hurricane, or earthquake, or fire. This was done that I might understand why the fire from heaven at Carmel had not conquered all hearts for God. It was by his word in me, and in other men's hearts and lips that the people were to learn of him most effectually.

"I heard the voice, all gentleness, ask again, 'What doest thou here, Elijah?' Again I uttered my complaint. But the Lord knew I did not need comfort so much as I needed to be sent back to my duty. In unmistakable command came the words 'Return on thy way.' He had given me fresh assurance of his protecting power, by safely keeping me upon the mountain in the midst of earthquake and storm. His next word showed me that I was not to go back as a culprit, but as his chosen messenger still, for he gave me commission to anoint two kings, Hazael of Syria, and Jehu of Israel. And he sent me also to find the young man who should be my successor, when I must lay my burden down. He further answered me by saying that there were seven thousand in Israel who had not bowed the knee to Baal, which was a great surprise to me, for I had supposed the whole nation had gone after strange gods.

"And after the vision, what? I girded myself for the long journey, and departed from Horeb, turning my face stedfastly toward Jezreel and Damascus. On the way I passed a field where I saw twelve men ploughing, among them the young man Elisha, the son of Shaphat, the owner of the field. The Lord revealed to me that he it was who should be my successor. I made my way to his side, and placed my mantle upon him, in token of the responsibility that was coming to him. The Spirit of the Lord made him willing-hearted, and he immediately left his plough and bade farewell to his parents. He took his oxen and offered them as a sacrifice to God, in which he invited his friends and neighbors to participate. He then joined himself to me.

"The anointing of Hazael and Jehu to be kings are my next great duties."

Illustration and Application

1. Mighty in Word. Was that scene at Horeb a rebuke of Elijah for using force in his reforms, instead of depending wholly on the word of persuasion? The writer heard a preacher so argue in support of his own theory that law and Gospel should never be combined in our day in combatting evil. What reasons refute such a theory? One is that Elijah was manifestly led by God, if not in every step of his life, certainly in his main policy, and it is inconceivable God could have allowed him to spend so much of his energy in rebuking bad kings, anointing better ones, and slaying false prophets, if it was wrong to act through and upon government, and by force.

Indeed, God himself, by that very "voice" that in this preacher's view stood for the Gospel message as against governmental methods, ordered Elijah to anoint two kings, through one of whom a government would at once change hands violently. Another reply is that God would hardly have given Elijah the second highest honor ever bestowed on a human being, to accompany Moses as a delegate from the court of heaven at the earthly coronation of Christ (Matt. 17), if his main work, his reform work, had been displeasing to God, and unworthy of imitation.

What, then, was it that God taught Elijah in the mighty drama of wind and earthquake and fire and "still, small voice?" Clearly this: That the divine and human Word is more persuasive than miracles. Elijah had supposed the miraculous fire on Mount Carmel would instantly persuade everybody, even Jezebel, that Jehovah is the true God, and must be obeyed. And when he found her unmoved he was surprised and confounded. He had, perhaps, seen that king and people also were not fully converted by the miracle. So God worked wonders in nature before the discouraged Elijah to show that the Divine message is not so clearly or impressively conveyed in wonders as in the "still, small voice."

It is an Old Testament parable of the truth Christ taught,

ONE OF THE CAVES OF THE MOUNT

"If they believe not Moses and the prophets, neither will they believe though one rose from the dead." It is a new astonishment to every young preacher that funerals, even sudden deaths, so seldom cause friends of the dead to turn from sin to God. What God taught Elijah the Church needs to learn over and over again, that it is not by great spectacles, but by the Word of God, spoken by some human voice, warm from some loving heart, that souls are won to God.

A pastor, who had an eminent lawyer, a sceptic, in his congregation, prepared a sermon especially for him, hoping and praying that it might lead to his conversion. The lawyer heard it and, not a great while after, came to unite with the church. The pastor, delighted, asked him what part of the sermon it was that touched him. "Oh, it was not your sermon at all. I was making a brief while you were preaching. But after church, old black Aunt Chloe had hard work getting down the icy steps. I helped her along for some distance, and when we parted, she said, looking up into my face, 'O massa, I do so wish you loved my dear Jesus.' I could not get that out of my mind. I went to my office and it clung to me there. I threw myself on my knees and gave myself to him. But your sermon had nothing to do with it." Here is another most beautiful and instructive story about the power of a word. Next in power to the Word of God is a Christian's faithful word, and next to that is a human word of kindness and inspiration.

A widow went to a photographer for her picture. She sat before the camera wearing the same stern look that made her an object of fear to the children living in the neighborhood, when the photographer said suddenly, "Just brighten the eyes a little." She tried, but the dull, heavy look still lingered. "See here," the woman retorted sharply, "if you think that an old lady that is dull can look bright, that on who feels cross can become pleasant every time she is told you don't know anything about human nature. It takes something from the outside to brighten the eye and illuminate the face." "Oh, no, it doesn't! It is something to be worked from the inside. Try it again," said the photographer. Something in his manner inspired faith, and she tried again with better success. "That's good! That's fine! You look twenty years younger!" exclaimed the artist.

She went home with a queer feeling in her heart. It was the first compliment she had received since her husband had passed away. When she reached her little cottage, she looked long in the glass, and said: "There may be something in it, but I'll wait and see the picture." When the picture came, it was like a resurrection. The face seemed alive with the fires of youth. She gazed long and earnestly, then in a firm, clear voice: "If I could do it once, I can do it again. Approaching the little mirror above her bureau she said: 'Brighten up, Catherine,' and the old light flashed up once more. 'Look a little brighter!' she commenced, and a calm and radiant smile diffused itself over her face.

Her neighbors soon remarked the change that had come to her. "Why, Mrs. A., you are getting younger! How did you manage it?" "It's almost all done from the inside. You just brighten up inside and feel pleasant."

But let us not fail to hear God's voice in nature also. The lesson does not mean that "God was not in the wind" and the earthquake and the fire but that he was not so plainly revealed in them as in the Word of revelation; but when the revealing Word has come to us then God is clearly heard in all the voices of nature also. Here is prayer to take with us in our summer walks in the fields:

Teach me, Father, how to go softly as the grasses grow Hush my soul to meet the shock of the wild world:
a rock.

But my spirit, propped with power, make as simple as a flower.

Let the dry heart fill its cup, like a poppy looking up Let life lightly wear her crown, like a poppy looking down.

When its heart is filled with dew, and its life begins

Teach me, Father, how to be kind and patient as a tree.
Joyfully the crickets croon under the shady oak at noon.
Beetle, on his mission bent, tarries in that cooling tent.
Let me also cheer a spot, hidden field or garden grot, Place where passing souls can rest on the way and be their best.

—CHARLES EDWIN MARKHAM.

II. Mighty in Deed. God aroused Elijah to the fact that he had fled from the post of duty with the question, "What doest thou here?" The question is a summons to the inactive. Many a Christian loafing away the long summer evenings in "gregarious chattering," should take to heart the Divine challenge, "What doest thou here?" In the Sunday School boys are left with no teacher, and so tempted to run away for Sabbath breaking. To their teacher, fanning herself at home because the weather is a little warm, God cries, "What doest thou here?" Elijah promptly heard the call and started back on the busy path of duty, to anoint Jehu and Hazael, call Elisha to be his associate and successor, and to rebuke Ahab for his crime against Naboth. God gave encouragement to Elijah, by telling him that he had not been alone on God's side, as he had thought, but that there were seven thousand that had not bowed to Baal. Elijah is himself again. One reason God promised him an associate was that the next time he was despondent he might have some one to hold him up.

"Two are better than one. If one fall, his fellow will lift him up. Woe unto him that is alone when he falleth." This is one reason why a Christian needs to be allied with others in fellowship, and cannot safely try to walk alone. It is instructive to note that the duties to which Elijah was sent were not merely the duties of worship. They were largely political duties, a fact worth noting in men's classes at this time when a political campaign is just beginning. And his duty in the case of Naboth is closely related to the wrong of serving the devil in business transactions. This reminds us to perform every duty of life as a duty to God and man. When the carpenter goes forth to work, what Jesus, by his example made "the Divine trade," why should he not hear as plainly as at the sacrament, as he lifts his tools, "This do in remembrance of me"

True worth is in being, not seeming—
In doing each day that goes by
Some little good—not in the dreaming
Of great things to do by-and-by.
For whatever men say in blindness,
And spite of the fancies of youth,
There's nothing so kingly as kindness
And nothing so royal as truth.

We get back our mete as we measure—
We cannot do wrong and feel right.
Nor can we give pain and gain pleasure—
For justice avenges each slight.
The air for the wing of the sparrow,
The bush for the robin and wren,
But always the path that is narrow
And strait for the children of men.

Miss Rose

THE wide street was bordered by rows of beautiful old elms. Quite back from the roadway stood the large and comfortable homes of the village, some of them stately with colonial architecture and many rooms, others smaller, and shining with fresh paint. An air of prosperity pervaded Glenham Heights, and the inhabitants were grateful that up where they lived there was no stir of trade. Down below, by the river and in the valley, the factories clustered, and the cheery hum of machinery went on hour by hour. The operatives lived near the mills in little cottages, one exactly like another; each with its bit of garden, its tiny lawn, and its neat veranda; and they, too, had their look of comfort, which corresponded pleasantly and harmoniously to, and with, the atmosphere of affluence above them.

Miss Rose Latham dwelt by herself in the biggest mansion the Heights could show. It was a picturesque place, with spacious grounds, and acres of flowers and fruit. To keep the place and the home in order, a large force of employees were needful, and among them none was more loyal to Miss Rose than her head gardener, Aaron Webb.

He approached her one summer morning as she sat listlessly on the veranda, and stood there, hat in hand. "What is the matter, Aaron?" Something in the man's manner struck her as unusual.

"Miss Rose," he said, with a deprecating gentleness, "the sweet peas are blooming like mad, the poppies are splendid, the nasturtiums are fairly running to seed, and the geraniums are getting beyond me. And down here," pointing to the valley, "there is a lot of children that are crazy for flowers, and Mrs. Brown's baby died this morning, and Johnny Jenkins has run off to sea."

Miss Rose Latham smiled. She knew old Aaron's way of making suggestions. "You want me to send some of my flowers to the children and the people who are in trouble. Take all you can carry, Aaron, and don't bother me. You know you needn't ask, old friend."

"Miss Rose, dear lady, I don't want you should send the flowers. I was in hopes you'd go with them yourself. Nelly Archer, she's back too, I'm old."

"Nelly! Is she, poor child? Well, well. Aaron, you gather the flowers and fill the pony cart, and I'll do as you advise. I'm a bit lonesome to-day. Maybe it will cheer me up to go and see people. Mother always went."

Yes, mother always went. But for two years mother's busy hands had been folded, and her eyes had been closed. She was not, for God had taken her. And her daughter had not ceased to miss and mourn for the precious one. She did not fully realize that her mother was living in heaven, and loving her more than ever, her heart having tethered itself to the grave in the cemetery. Aaron had not forgotten that Miss Rose was now occupied in recalling every incident of the final illness, and he had set himself to arouse her, and had hit upon the good expedient of getting her to take up some of her mother's ministries.

The pony-cart came to the gate, and it was overflowing with color and perfume. Aaron had cut his flowers with a lavish hand. On the seat, beside Miss Rose, he laid a delicate bunch of late roses, faintly tinted pink petals, and glowing dark ones, and in the centre a single superb specimen, waxen white, and fit for a bride.

"I'll give this rose to Nelly," thought the lady as she took it for a moment in her hand and laid it against her cheek.

At Nelly's door she stopped first. And as Nelly heard her step in the little passage, she called cheerily in a sweet, high voice.

"Come in, dear Miss Rose. You'll find me in the parlor."

Rose entered, a great pity in her face. For Nelly had returned from a fruitless errand, as the whole village knew. Heights and lowlands equally interested. She had been the best scholar in the Academy, the brightest, keenest, cleverest girl for miles around, and she had been stricken with blindness. Her neighbors had joined together to send her to the city to consult the famous oculist whose skill had made sightless eyes see in many a case, and Nelly had gone away, radiant in mind, sure that she would have her vision restored. The disappointment had been terrible. An operation had failed to give back the lost sight. Rose's own eyes were tear-dimmed as she crossed the room.

But Nelly met her with a smile.

"Oh, what an exquisite rose!" she said. "And how good you are to come so soon, Miss Rose, I've been sitting and singing all day. God is so good. The world is so beautiful. There are so many things I can

All was silent in the tiny four-roomed cottage. The baby lay as if fast asleep, its tiny hands clasped. The mother sat by the little crib with such white misery in her face that Rose shrank back, appalled. An instant later, she gathered her courage in a resolute effort of her will, and took poor Mary Brown into her arms.

"They are coming to put my baby in the coffin," said the mother. "Nobody shall touch him!"

"You will lay him in the coffin yourself," said Miss Rose, going to the door. The undertaker was there, with the little white casket. He looked relieved when he saw Rose Latham.

"She is so desolate," said the kind man, "for her husband, you remember, died just before the baby was born."

Rose Latham stayed all the afternoon with Mary Brown. The baby was laid to rest, and covered with sweet peas and geranium leaves. Few words were exchanged between the two women, but Rose did not leave Mrs. Brown until the neighbor who was to watch with her that night had arrived, and hung up her hat in the entry closet.

"My lot is easy, my burdens are light," and compared with those of her friends, they were. Rose Latham's flowers made the village children very happy that day. As she drove onward in the golden twilight, she determined that with God's help, she would carry comfort day by day to those who needed it, just where she was. There were home ministries for her; there was work that she could do; there were flowers for her to scatter broadcast on the daily path. Old Aaron, pottering in the herb-garden, smiled to himself.

"Miss Rose is her mother's daughter," he said.

"Aaron, Aaron!" she just then exclaimed, "I'm ashamed of my carelessness. I never went near the Jenkinses. And Johnny's run off, you heard. I'm too tired, and it's too late to go back; but won't you send your Peter to ask Johnny's mother to come here after supper?"

"I will that," answered Aaron.

Johnny Jenkins was the village ne'er-do-well. His father was over strict with the lad, and his mother foolishly indulgent. The boy was full of daring and mischief, and was always in trouble. Miss Rose was not sure that going to sea would harm him. A touch of stern discipline might in the end help him to manlier conduct, and captains were not always harsh, nor, indeed, were sailors devoid of humanity.

Mrs. Jenkins came, limp and broken, a weak woman who could make no firm stand against disaster. Miss Rose consoled her. She told her that God was on sea as well as on shore, and, kneeling down, she commended the whole family to the watching care of God.

When Miss Rose laid her head on her pillow that night, she was so tired that she fell asleep as sweetly as if she had been a little child.

learn to do! And at night when I am asleep, I have dreams in which I see—see everything lovely in the lovely world."

"What are you meaning to learn, Nelly?" asked Rose, restraining her impulse to be compassionate.

"Type-writing, and raffia-work, and music, and cake-making. Why, I've made cookies this morning with mother's help. Just one thing God won't let me do; I won't bemoan my fate. He'll hold me back from that. Why, Miss Rose! I've soldier's blood in me. My ancestor fought at Bunker Hill, and father took part in the Civil War. A soldier's daughter must be brave!"

Into Miss Rose's mind flashed the lines of Reginald Heber's stormy hymn:

Who best can drink his cup of woe
Triumphant over pain,
Who patient bears his cross below
He follows in His train!

She left the roses in Nelly's lap, and went to Mrs. Brown's house. The baby was dead, Aaron had said.

The Summer Shops

City people have a way of saying that the streets are deserted in summer, but when the country cousin comes to town she does not find them so. To our large cities, whether inland or seaport, crowds of visiting strangers come in August and early September, and, although the trend of travel has recently been in the direction of St. Louis, still New York and Chicago have had their share of the coming and going multitude. The shops in summer are, if possible, more entertaining than at any other season. Their counters heaped with attractive goods, and the eagerness of the buyers, although times are accused of being hard, is obvious and amusing. Mark the delight of human nature in a bargain. Mrs. Thrift will have compunction in spending a whole dollar for an article she really does not need, but if it be only ninety-eight or ninety-nine cents, she plumes herself on her economy. When goods are a trifle shop-worn or a bit out of date, the shrewd merchant marks them down, aware that if he can but advertise them as going below cost, he will not long have them on hand.

SONG OF THE SWING

(Tune arranged at Mont-Lawn)

BY MARY SARGENT HOPKINS

I
Swing,
Swing,
Little maid, swing,
While buttercups nod and bluebirds sing,
Flashing by on indigo wing,
Swing, swing, little maid, swing.

II
Swing, swing, little maid, swing,
Clover-heads sway, and their fragrance fling,
While honey-bees drone with laden wing,
Swing, swing, little maid, swing.

III
Swing, swing, little maid, swing,
Thy winsome smile sweet mem'ries bring,
Of far-away days—life's early spring,
Swing, swing, little maid, swing.

IV
Swing, swing, little maid, swing,
Happier far, than queen or king,
No sweeter joys the years may bring,
Swing,
Swing,
Little maid, swing.

Jamie's Vacation at Mont-Lawn

THREE children had heard this Vacation Home talked of in the dingy street in which they lived. Other children had told of the good times they had had at Mont-Lawn, where "you had lots to eat, and where the teachers didn't make you study as they did in school, but told stories and read them out of books." "Will they take me, too?" asked little crippled Jamie. "I can't run so fast as Bob, but Jennie will take care of me; won't you, Jennie?" and the little fellow looked at his sister with the utmost confidence, that wherever Jennie went he could go.

Their mother was a very busy woman; all day, and far into the night, she worked to support her little brood, and pay the rent of the one room in the big tenement house in which they lived; but such a chance as this must not be neglected. So when the children assured her that it was no "fairy tale" about Mont-Lawn, and that Izzy Goldstein, and Sammy Cohen, and Billy Maher had told them about it, and the story had been corroborated by the varied assortment of sisters of these voracious youngsters, the mother consented to go up to the Bible House and enroll the names of Jennie, Bob, and Jamie, for the next consignment of children to go to Mont-Lawn. "You see," said Jennie, "something is the matter with his back, and he can't grow, and he can't play real hard; but he'll be a good boy, if he can go."

The children were willing to have their pictures taken for the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to see; and Jamie was the proudest of the three, as he tried to straighten his poor little crooked back, clasping his thin hands in front of him. It was the most important occasion of his life, having his picture "took." Never a thought gave Jamie to the fact that he was not dressed up, for didn't he have shoes? What more did he need, except his shirt and overalls? What a wonderful trip that was up the river! The little boy had never even seen a steamer before. He had never been far away from the street in which he was born, and his wonder knew no bounds when he was seated on the upper deck, and found that the "big house" was really moving, and he going with it. When Nyack was reached, the stage and horses were waiting to take the merry, laughing crowd of children to the Home. Jamie had seen horses, great, strong-limbed creatures, that put down their heavy feet with such slow dignity as they pulled their weighty loads. Many a time had he hurried across the street, with the yell of a good-natured driver of truck or beer-wagon sounding like the crack o'doom in his ears, for if he stumbled, what would his mite of a body be beneath those ponderous hoofs and those cruel tires? O yes, Jamie knew what horses were; but to ride behind a span along the beautiful country roads, where wild flowers nodded a welcome from the smiling fields on either side. Indeed, Jamie had never seen anything like this, and when the horses pulled and tugged up the hills, and many of the children alighted and walked to ease the toilers, the little boy was one of the first to scabble out. "Poor horses," he said to himself, "they don't want a crooked back like mine, and if they pull too hard, they might come apart."

The great thick slices of bread and brimming mugs of milk; the sweet, wholesome vegetables from the garden; the long sunny play-hours, made a heaven for the little boy; but when night came, and the tired little body lay down to rest in the white cot, the acme of happiness was reached, as Jamie closed his eyes and floated off to dreamland. And all this beauty and happiness for him, cost but $3. The good accomplished could not be computed by thousands.

The friends of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home, have responded nobly to the call for endowed cots, and it is with much gratitude we acknowledge the following additional names. We hope to have 150, feeling sure that the lovers of children will enable us to reach that number.

A SCENE ON HOREB

By MRS. M. BAXTER

ELIJAH "came to Horeb, the mount of God." It was a place of great memories, a fitting place for Elijah to retire to in his deep dejection, with the cause of God, which, just now, seemed to him to be a failure, so heavy on his heart. May there not have been some thought such as this in his heart: "I alone remain a prophet of the Lord, and he does not stand by me?"

Having reached Horeb, Elijah came thither into a cave, and lodged there. Up to this time he had been very distinctly and very tenderly led of God, but there is no sign that God called him to settle down in this cave, and make his home there, nursing his sorrow.

I and they, self and man, were occupying his heart as he sat alone in his cave; and it seemed to him as though neither God nor man appreciated him, and that he had made such great sacrifices for nothing. Oh, how black everything looks as soon as anything personal limits our view! As soon as we allow ourselves to dwell for a moment upon what we are, what we have done, and what is due to us, darkness comes over our spirit. And as to any merit or claim for reward because of any service we render to God or man, the privilege of doing it in the name and in the power of our Lord is our reward.

"And he said, Go forth and stand upon the mount before the Lord." Go out of thy narrow thoughts, revolving round thyself, into the presence of thy God. But Elijah did not go; he still remained in the cave. Oh how hard it is for one who is occupied with his own ideas to get out of them into God's presence! Elijah was in a cave where no fresh air can go through, where the same air is breathed over and over again. Oh, what a cave self-occupation is! But a new revelation of God can bring us out of our cave. No pity from others can do it, for that is most harmful and savors of the cave.

"And behold, the Lord passed by, and a great and strong wind rent the mountains, and brake in pieces the rocks before the Lord; but the Lord was not in the wind; and after the wind an earthquake; but the Lord was not in the earthquake; and after the earthquake a fire; but the Lord was not in the fire; and after the fire a still small voice, or a sound of gentle stillness."

This was new to the prophet; he was used to the miraculous; storm, earthquake, fire could not bring him out of the cave. But that sound of gentle stillness appealed to him, penetrated, touched the sore place, not with human sympathy, which would have come down to his level, but with divine sympathy, which lifts us up to God's level and into his atmosphere. And Elijah, when he heard it, came and stood in the entering in of the cave. And, behold, there came a voice unto him, and said, "What doest thou here, Elijah?" It was the same answer, but no longer from the depths of the cave; he was willing to see things differently; and he had yet to learn that God accomplishes his great purposes through the failures of men as well as through their victories. Why did not Elijah answer, "Lord, I am here that I may hearken to what thou hast to say to me?" When God speaks to us, do we shut ourselves up with the mortifying memories of our past failures? Are we occupied with our own shortcomings or those of our family, our church, our nation, and have we no eye for what God is doing?

"And the Lord said to him, Go; return on thy way to the wilderness of Damascus; and when thou comest, anoint Hazael to be king over Syria, and Jehu, son of Nimshi, shalt thou anoint to be king over Israel; and Elisha, the son of Shaphat, shalt thou anoint to be prophet in thy room." Thus God showed Elijah a glimpse of his plans, and that he should be still used in their execution. It was through Hazael and Jehu that the house of Ahab and the remnants of Baal worship were to be exterminated. But God was not in a hurry: He let things ripen. He might use Elijah for the first great blow, but he had purposes to carry out which Elijah did not yet know, and he must be willing to serve as an instrument in obedience and faith.

the greatest enemy of honesty and virtue, and everything sweet and pure that exists to-day. The one thing which takes a man or woman into a saloon, is because they want whiskey or beer. It is alcohol they want, in one form or another—it makes little difference which. I deny that the saloon is "the poor man's club." It is not half so much so, as it is the rich man's club. It is the accursed saloon that makes the home so wretched, that this so-called club is necessary.

I was a drunkard—a hopeless drunkard for years, and fairly lived in saloons. Oh, how I tried to stop! What encouragement I got from the papers, when I read that Dr. Crosby not only drank, but advocated it. The victim of drink is a slave, and Christ alone can redeem him. Oh, let us get back to the Cross of Calvary!

Never was the Church more busy and full of activities than now, but let us renew the old-time religion, and saloons will diminish.

The Liquor Saloon's Best Friend

BY REV. LOUIS ALBERT BANKS, D.D.

IN regard to the dedication address of Bishop Potter at the opening of a liquor saloon, I have only to say that, in my judgment, it is a shame and an outrage for a liquor saloon and a Christian Church to live in the same town, and not fight. Bishop Potter's address has given great cheer and encouragement to distillers and brewers and saloon-keepers everywhere. If he had not long since made his toleration of the liquor saloon so apparent, it would spread dismay in the hearts of all true lovers of temperance and sobriety. Bishop Potter is out of place as the friend of the saloon in America. But men will get drunk, and young men and young women will form the habit of taking intoxicating drinks just the same, even if Bishop Potter was to serve as bartender, instead of dedication orator in the Subway Saloon. The words of the Bible still remain true, Bishop Potter notwithstanding: "Look not upon the wine when it is red; when it giveth his color in the cup; when it stirreth itself aright; for at the last it biteth like a serpent and stingeth like an adder."

N. Y. City. LOUIS ALBERT BANKS.

The Ally of a Great Vice

THE "dedication" by Bishop Potter of a saloon for the sale of intoxicating drinks, places himself, and inferentially his denomination, as the ally of the one great vice—destructive alike to morals and religion in both women and men, which the nation is struggling to control, and which in the past has destroyed all nations succumbing to its dominance.

A. E. BALLARD,

Pres't Pitman Camp Meeting Association and Vice-President Ocean Grove, N. J.

Other Opinions on the Saloon

The devil appears in a new role every now and then, horns and hoofs, and the blessing by Bishop Potter does not make the devil any less a devil.—REV. A. B. LEONARD, New York.

When Bishop Potter helped open the Subway Tavern, all the devils in hell clapped their hands with delight.—REV. W. O. Bennett, Stroudsburg, Pa.

The dedication of a saloon by Bishop Potter, indicates an eccentricity of moral judgment, but it will give encouragement to the evil-doer. The Church has neither hymns nor prayers for such services.—BISHOP HENRY SPELLMEYER, Cincinnati, O.

The food of childhood often decides whether one is to grow up well nourished and healthy or weak and sickly from improper food.

It's just as easy to be one as the other provided we get a proper start.

A wise physician like the Denver Doctor who knew about food, can accomplish wonders provided the patient is willing to help and will eat only proper food.

Speaking of this case the Mother said her little four year old boy was suffering from a peculiar derangement of the stomach, liver and kidneys and his feet became so swollen he couldn't take a step. "We called a Doctor who said at once we must be very careful as to his diet as improper food was the only cause of his sickness. Sugar especially, he forbid.

"So the Dr. made up a diet and the principal food he prescribed was Grape-Nuts and the boy, who was very fond of sweet things took the Grape-Nuts readily without adding any sugar. (Dr. explained that the sweet in Grape-Nuts is not at all like cane or beet sugar but is the natural sweet of the grains.)

"We saw big improvement inside a few days and now Grape-Nuts are almost his only food and he is once more a healthy, happy, rosy-cheeked youngster with every prospect to grow up into a strong healthy man." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

The sweet in Grape-Nuts is the Nature-sweet known as Post Sugar, not digested in the liver like ordinary sugar, but predigested. Feed the youngsters a handful of Grape-Nuts when Nature demands sweet and prompts them to call for sugar.

go, we arrived at our old stations, after home visit of over one year. During the absence, growth was regular, and considerable advance was made all round, so that while the total of our baptized Christians was increased on all our stations, in class of beginners also kept pace, and at we have now an average of four pro- tioners for each Christian. There are ree items which point clearly to the ad- vance on the part of ordinary heathen- m toward better things. The first is, the flowing of a hopeful number of outside children into our station schools. The ation scholar is provided with a roof, itable food, and clothing usually enough cover him. It has been exceedingly ffcult in the past fifteen years, to per- ade a single native from a heathen me to come to us. But now, on one of the alphabet will be studied in that hut during the long evenings, when nothing outside is possible. The primer will enter in, and the Bible will surely follow. Per- haps it is fortunate that the native can purchase no book in his native tongue save the Holy Scriptures, which the mis- sionary has prepared for him. He will purchase the Bible, for it is the only thing he can read, if he reads at all. These outrageously inferior lamps are getting all over the country. We welcome them, for they are the first intrusion of civili- zation into that hitherto dark pocket of a hut. The lamp, the chair, the table, Amer- ican tinned foods, are all veritable fore- runners of the schoolroom and of the Testament. There is muscle enough in the arms of the children of Africa to buy all America, and they are just beginning to purchase. This is a right step in the right direction.

"A third item of interest is, that our native preachers have all blossomed out with riding donkeys. It was a surprise, and looked some- what out of order; but after full investiga- tion had, it appears a most rea- sonable thing. They rent a pair of the Arab, keep them a season or two for the increase, and then become the veritable own- ers of a beast to ride upon.

"Horses die upon least provocation here, but the donkey leaves that to the end. Surely it is proper for our native pastor to ride if he can afford it, and he can easily afford to do it in the manner de- scribed.

"A considerable number of the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD are support- ing a scholarship in this field. A schol- arship means seeing a lost native child, boy or girl, all the way from heathenism into clear Christianity. It is the greatest work possible on earth, with the surest rewards. It costs, in clean cash, fifteen dollars a year, and everyone able to take THE CHRISTIAN HERALD can afford it, and the day will surely come when they will wish they had done so. All funds for this field should be sent through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, in New York."

ir stations, we have more than thirty of em, on others, five, ten or fifteen, and all of them some appear. These outle children received nothing whatever om the mission, and, of course, appear ad in Adam's 'fig-leaf.' We are de- lighted to see them, and spare no pains to ake them feel it. It is a hopeful sign of al advance, and pervades the territory the mission.

"A second item is this: The common tive outside the mission stations has egun to purchase poor five-cent brass mps for twenty-five cents, and to buy orer Russian kerosene, and to have ght in his hut at night. This may not pear to some as anything worth men- oning, but that little light is real light, d he will have more of it and better quipment ere long. This means that

A Song of Faith

WITH outstretched arms, and heart so kind,
And eyes to human weakness blind,
O, Saviour, thou dost watch and wait
My coming to the Golden Gate.

I know my feeble footsteps stray,
And oft I stumble in the way;
But by thy grace, so full and free,
I rise and struggle back to thee.

If thou hast lov'd me, I am lov'd;
If thou hast prov'd me, I am prov'd;
If thou hast sav'd me, I am safe,
Although a weak and helpless waif.

If thou hast call'd me, I must come
Most surely to my heavenly home:
In thy good time my soul shall rest
Within the mansions of the blest.

I know that thou shalt surely keep,
And safely shelter all thy sheep;
And not one lamb of all thy fold
Shall fail to reach the Gate of Gold.

When there arraigned, my spirit stands,
I'll plead the wounds that mar thy hands,
And kneeling at thy Mercy Seat,
Will kiss the nail-prints in thy feet.

MINISTER'S TRIAL

Coffee Hit Him Hard Indeed

A minister of the gospel writes about Postum: "I was for years a sufferer from headaches; sometimes they were so violent that groaning in agony I would pace the floor or garden holding my throbbing head for relief.

"I tried all sorts of remedies known to the allopathic and homeopathic schools, sometimes I thought it was caused by the stomach or biliousness, and again I would suspect it was purely nervousness, and treated myself accordingly, but nothing ever gave me permanent relief. Having to appear before the public nearly every night, it was sometimes almost impossible for me to fulfill my engage- ments. Finally I came to suspect that the use of tea and coffee had something to do with my disorder, and abruptly dis- continued the use of both and took on Postum for a trial.

"From that happy hour I commenced to mend; gradually I got better and bet- ter, and now I do not have a headache once in 6 months, and all my other troubles are gone too. I am now using Postum exclusively and want no better beverage.

"I know of others who have been bene- fited by the use of Postum in place of coffee. A friend of mine here in Key West, a hardware merchant, suffered for years with stomach and other troubles while he was using coffee, finally he quit and began using Postum, and got well. He is devoted to Postum, and when worn and weary with business cares takes a cup of it piping hot, and in a short time feels rested and nourished.

"Some I know have become prejudiced against Postum because careless or igno- rant cooks tried to make it as they would coffee, and will not allow it to boil full 15 minutes, but when they try it again, well boiled, it stays, for it is as delicious and snappy as the mild, smooth, high grade Java." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Questions & Answers

Vigilant, Rockaway, L. I. What is the average attendance at the St. Louis Fair up to date?
It would be difficult, in the absence of official figures, to make any trustworthy estimate. One correspondent, who made full investigation, writes that during the first 100 days, 6,000,000 people passed through the gates, but about one-third was attendants, workmen and officials. Of the 4,000,000 remaining, probably one-sixth would represent the actual number of patrons, allowing each six visits, which is a low average. Up to August 18, over 7,000,000 visitors had passed through.

Old Subscriber, Philadelphia. 1. Is there any bureau or house through which an amateur writer may promptly place a magazine article of merit? 2. When was the two-cent letter postal rate introduced? 3. When was the Postal Card introduced?

1. There are several literary bureaus, but the best and most direct way is to send an article to the magazine for which it seems suited. 2, 3. Write to the P. O. Dep't, Washington, D. C.

C. R. T., Easton, Pa. Was there more than one dynasty in the kingdom of Judah and in the kingdom of Israel?

In the kingdom of Judah the house of David continued to the end. Saul was the first king, and after his death David became king over Judah, while Ishbosheth, Saul's son, reigned over the northern provinces for two years. (See II. Samuel 2: 10). In Israel there were seven dynasties, the first kings of which were respectively Jeroboam, Baasha, Omri, Jehu, Menahem, Pekah and Hoshea.

B. W. L., Bridgeport, Conn. About how much liquor (including beer, wine, and cider), was consumed as a beverage by the people of this country in one year, say twenty years ago, and what was the population at that time, and ten years ago. Also at the last census, and about how much for each man, woman, and child?

The population in 1880 was 50,155,783, in 1890 63,069,756, in 1900, 76,303,387. At present about 80,000,000, estimated.

M. H. Sydenham, Kearney, Neb., writes:
What delightful reading was the description of our Children's Home at Mont-Lawn by E. M. Mason, in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of August 3, 1904! How deeply the good woman's heart was touched by what she saw on her visit to that place, which is attracting so much interest from one end of the Republic to the other, or wherever THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is read. God bless Dr. Klopsch for what he has done to make such conditions possible, and a veritable, actual reality. And may he bless all the good readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and others who have contributed in any way to the delightful work, which is true missionary work indeed. And may it soon be doubly, yea ever so many times increased in its usefulness to the honor and glory of our Heavenly Father and his beloved Son.

E. H. C. Who were the most prominent missionary heroes of the past century?

Mungo Park, David Livingstone, William Taylor, Robert Moffat and Bishop Hannington, Africa; J. W. M. B., Humboldt, Kans., writes:

I was much interested in your story last week of the London charities. Born close to St. Bartholomew's, in the days of Old Bartelmey's Fair, and within the sound of Bow Bells, I am a regular Cockney, and though I have been a loyal American citizen for fifty-two years, voted for Abraham Lincoln and stuck to the party all these years, yet I still love Old England, and especially the little village in which I was born, which at that time had a population of a million, second only to Peking, China. I was particularly pleased to find that the King and Queen and so many noted and distinguished persons, took so conspicuous a part in the various charities and institutions for the improvement of the condition of the poor. I have frequently read of the interest taken by the Duchess of Sutherland in all charitable work, and find her in your paper spoken of as the "angel of the hospitals," a beautiful title, of which she may well be prouder than that of Duchess. At the age of sixteen, I was assistant master in Lady Byron's industrial school at Ealing near London. The next two years I attended the Battersea Normal College, and at nineteen was selected by Harriet, Duchess of Sutherland, mistress of the robes to Queen Victoria, to take charge of a school on their Shropshire estate, where I continued ten years, coming to America in 1852. This is why I feel interested in the Sutherland family. I have some letters of the old Duchess and the wedding cards of the late Duke of Argyle, then Marquis of Lorne, who married Lady Elizabeth Gower, eldest daughter of the Duke of Sutherland, who were of the same age respectively as myself and wife, and who spent their honeymoon in our neighborhood.

J. L., Newberg, Pa. Why do ministers of the Gospel display their D.D. and LL.D. and Rev.? Is this as the Master would have done when he enjoined them to call no man Rabbi?

place of public assemblage, as wearing them greatly obstructs the view of those who sit behind. As to going hatless through the streets, that is quite another matter. Except in some country village, or at a summer resort, it is never done.

Ralph R. Bird, Oakland, Calif., writes:

Anent the interesting incident in your question department, from Miss S. B., Canton, O. (paper of July 6), is an experience of mine. Thirty years ago in the frontier of Canada (Ontario Province). I was conducting a religious service in a schoolhouse, on a Sabbath, near a piece of woods. I was addressing a houseful of mostly young people. The day was warm, and the outside and hall doors were both open. About the middle of my address, there came in a red squirrel, came on the platform to me, ran up my right side, and perched itself on my right shoulder, and, sitting on its lower extremities, faced about and looked at the audience, for probably fifteen seconds; then deliberately retraced its steps, and went out to the woods again. I was well acquainted with the neighborhood, and no one knew of a tame squirrel in the place. Of course I its wickedness, it is a fair inference that the "Golden Age" had long since given way to the age of violence, even among the lower orders of nature, and consequently that the huge collection of animals in the Ark were not peacefully disposed by nature, although their perilous and novel experience may have made them temporarily docile. 2. She was born in Bamborough, England, 1815, and died 1842. She won fame through rowing with her father (a lighthouse keeper at the Faroe Isles), to the wreck of the Forfarshire and saving the crew.

Old Subscriber, Urbana, Ills. 1. Don't know. 2. Missionary work in the Philippines is practically just begun. There are several denominations represented. The M. E. Church is doing a good work, with a resident American Elder in charge at Manila, and a number of American workers and native helpers distributed throughout the provinces.

Anxious, No. 2, Cedar Rapids, Ia. When a person has contracted debts through a long illness, and finds that his income is insufficient to pay them, ought he, when receiving his monthly salary, to lay aside the Lord's tenth, or postpone it indefinitely until his debts are paid?

Probably the person has made some arrangement with his creditors for payment by installments, or has persuaded them to wait until he is to able pay them. They would not expect him to devote the whole of his income to the payment of their claims. Some portion of it they would expect him to reserve for board, lodging, clothes, etc. That portion is his own, and it is that which he should regard as his income. The balance, over and beyond that is not his, but belongs to his creditors. He should tithe the sum reserved for himself, and if it is so small as to be barely sufficient for his living expenses, he should practice some self-denial in order to pay the Lord's tenth, if his conscience approves of the tithing system.

M. L. B., White Sulphur Springs, N. Y. If I purchase a farm with pension money, and pay no taxes on same, except school and road taxes, can he make a will that will be legal at his death, or will it then go back to the State?

His will transfers his title at the date of death. He may lose the property by failing to pay taxes. The State can only take the property for unpaid taxes.

A Bargain as long as the Copies last
A Great Book on Prophecy

Statesmen and political observers agree that the next twenty-five years will be critical period in the World's History. Momentous events are impending, involving the fate of nations and races. The Christian, turning to the Bible for light on the future, is often perplexed by the figures and images employed by the ancient prophets and the Seer of Patmos to prefigure the coming crisis. These are explained, and the converging lines of history traced, in a finely illustrated work by Rev. M. Baxter, of which 110,000 copies have been sold. It contains also a resume of the opinions of other expositors of prophecy, thus forming a text-book of the subject, invaluable to every student of the Scriptures. Its title is, "FORT FUTURE WONDERS," and may be obtained (price fifty cents, including postage), from the office of this journal, Bible House, New York City.

PORTO RICAN SCHOOL-TEACHERS ON THE U. S. TRANSPORT "KILPATRICK"

DURING the present summer five hundred school-teachers from our island possession of Porto Rico, have been visiting the United States as guests of this Government. They have made an educational tour of the Eastern States, and are now returning home after a short course of English at Harvard University. They made a flying visit to Washington, where they were received by President Roosevelt. They spent several days in New York, seeing the sights, before sailing for Porto Rico on the Kilpatrick. All the members of the party were delighted with their vacation visit.

It was not intended as a condemnation of every title by which church rulers were to be known, otherwise it would have equally applied to all distinctions—elder, deacon, teacher, pastor, etc., included—all of which were recognized by the early church. It was a rebuke to the "itch for ecclesiastical superiority," and a reminder that "he that humbleth himself shall be exalted."

Limited local suffrage for women prevails in New York, Indiana, Kansas, Arizona, Connecticut, Delaware, Illinois, Iowa, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, Oregon, South Dakota, Texas, Virginia, Washington, Wisconsin, Montana, Nebraska, New Hampshire, New Jersey, North Dakota, Ohio and Oklahoma. Full suffrage prevails in Colorado, Idaho, Utah and Wyoming.

Ought the pastor and officers of the church to take any interest in him? 2. Do the words in the prophecy of Nahum 2: 4, have any reference to the electric cars, automobiles, etc., of the present day?

The prophecy was written at a time when Nineveh was threatened by foreign foes. The Little City of Coral Streets

FROM A SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT

WHILE all the world, figuratively speaking, has been bending its steps, or at least turning its eyes, in the direction of the great Exposition at St. Louis, Curacao, the lonely little island which lies close to the coast of South America, has been holding an Exposition of its own. It is the first agricultural and industrial Exposition the island has ever attempted, and it certainly speaks eloquently for its courage, enterprise and material progress.

Curacao, as the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD well know, is the most important of Holland's island possessions in the West Indies. Its importance rests entirely in the quaint little capital, Willemstad, which owes its existence to its harbor, a magnificent body of water, completely landlocked and large enough to accommodate the shipping of New York and Liverpool. For this beautiful harbor, Venezuela would willingly barter an entire province; and to banish the Dutch flag from her coasts, she would be glad to make almost any sacrifice; for Curacao has long been a refuge for defeated revolutionists, and a "hatching-place," the Venezuelans assert, for endless conspiracies.

Under a wise, though conservative colonial government, Curacao has prospered exceedingly. It has built up a flourishing trade with the neighboring ports, has taught its negro population to be orderly, and has established schools and churches and introduced many of the modern conveniences of a northern city.

Curacao is, of course, thoroughly Dutch, and has been so for more than two centuries, though the island was conquered and held, for short intervals, by different nations. The streets are winding and picturesque, and the buildings quite as quaint as were the old Dutch homes of New Amsterdam. Even the harbor entrance, lined with busy quays and thronged with the boats of the negro ferrymen, seems more like a canal in Holland, than an inlet of the Caribbean. Yet the town, as its own characteristics as well, and has been perceptibly influenced by its colony of Portuguese and Spanish Jews, descendants of refugees from the Peninsula, who emigrated by way of Holland to the New World. Furthermore, its people are proficient linguists, and speak English and Spanish, as well as Dutch, which has modified their character not a little.

Besides these languages, however, Curacao can boast of another, peculiar to itself and the two neighboring islands of Aruba and Bonaire. This is Papiamento, a jargon originated by the negroes, but now in general use by all classes. It is a strange but logical compound of Spanish and Portuguese, which the Jewish immigrants taught them; English, picked up from the English and American trading ships, and Dutch, the language of their masters. To this mixture, they added a streets and crooked lanes are all carefully paved or covered with crushed coral, and every nook and corner is swept and cleaned as if the town were on exhibition. We pride ourselves upon our work in Havana; but Holland long ago accomplished similar results almost in sight of the fever-stricken coasts of Venezuela, with which there has always been constant communication. The one thing lacking upon the island is water. The land in many parts is rich, and capable of producing abundantly if rains were more frequent. Long droughts, however, are apt to occur, and only the irrigated lands can withstand their severity. But even irrigation is limited, by the scarcity of wells and the saline condition of much of the water. To offset these disadvantages, however, Curacao has extensive salt and phosphate of lime deposits, and the island of Aruba possesses a rich gold field.

The Curacao natives are almost all adherents of the Roman Catholic Church, though they lack the devotion of the natives of South America. The Jews have retained their ancient faith, and support two fine synagogues. The majority of the Dutch people, however, are Protestant; but, strange to say, the Dutch Church has been for some time without a pastor, so that services are held only at long intervals. There is one American missionary on the island, Mr. V. Van Howe, who represents an interdenominational society, and acts as agent for the American Bible Society. He and his devoted wife are making a careful study of Papiamento, with a view to translating evangelical literature into that language. This is the first attempt that has been made to reach the colored people of the Dutch West Indies, and should Mr. and Mrs. Howe succeed in establishing a little printing office, as they plan, they are prepared to settle down to permanent work in this field.

One of the most interesting sights to the American tourist is the weather bureau our Government has established on the island. This is the most southern observation station in the service, and as Curacao lies on the edge of the hurricane belt, the post is an important one.

number of their native African words, and out of it all have produced a wonderfully fluent but simple idiom.

The natives of Curacao are, on the whole, intelligent, hard-working people, and are by no means to be classed with the average West India type described by so many travelers. Rum-drinking is the most prevalent vice on the island; yet seldom is an intoxicated person seen on the streets; in this respect, the city is as orderly as an New England town.

Next to its quaint architecture, the stranger in Curacao is impressed with its scrupulous cleanliness. The

A Tour of the "Big Smokies"

CATALOOCHEE is a mountain district of "The Smokies," which has, for many years, been cut off from the rest of the world, and to a considerable degree, left to itself. It is only within a very recent period that public attention has been called to it, and, even now, there is not much accurate knowledge of the region itself, or of the people occupying it. We are located in Haywood County, North Carolina, on the border of Tennessee. The clear rapid stream of Big Creek passes our Cataloochee mission to join the Pigeon River, three miles below. The mountains around us form a sheltered nook. They are generally heavily timbered, and many varieties of hard wood are found, such as poplar, chestnut, oak, hemlock and the beautiful balsam trees peculiar to the Southern Appalachians. But all of this is owned by a large timber company. The mountaineers have to cultivate the steep side-hills for a living, and barely make enough to supply their families with food and clothes.

In regard to this region, I quote the following from Senate Document eighty-four, Fifty-seventh Congress, First Session: "The agricultural resources of the region must remain limited, because of its ruggedness and the low percentage of arable land. Some of the slopes that are cultivated are very steep—from thirty to forty degrees—some of them too steep even for the mountain steer and bull-tongue plough, and must be cultivated entirely by hand."

It is evident that a poor country makes a poor people, and such is the case with Cataloochee. Want of means has deprived these brave, generous-hearted people of the blessings of education and religion. Hundreds of them have neither, and no opportunity to get them. The children are very bright, and learn fast when they have the opportunity. Most of them begin work in the fields before they are eight years old, and are kept there regularly, to hoe corn during the summer. They know nothing of plays and games like other children in the more favored sections of our country. As a rule, they show much timidity. They have strong voices, and with a little training make good singers.

The mountain parents are always appreciative of any interest shown in the welfare of their children. They give you a cordial welcome to their homes, and are ready to listen to the truths of the Gospel. Years of isolation, and lack of opportunity to see the good and noble traits embodied in professors of Christianity, have naturally brought about wrong ideas among these simple people. Many who say they are members of a church, have only a faint idea of what it takes to make a Christian.

Miss Annie W. Armstrong, Corresponding Secretary of The Woman's Missionary Union, Baltimore, writes: "Recently I have been in the mountain section in North Carolina and Tennessee, so I appreciate in some measure the great need that exists in these sections for missionary work. I sincerely trust that wisdom will be convenient points. These schools we superintend regularly, and come in contact with a large number of children and young people, who soon become tidy in appearance, and give respectful attention to the teaching of Bible truths. Evangelistic services are held at various places, and for want of church buildings we use the little district schoolhouse. A day school has been taught in Cataloochee when we could spare the time. In this region, like many others, "The harvest is great, and the laborers are few."

The citizens now tell us that Cataloochee is better in every way than a few years ago. There is no fighting and killing going on as formerly. The Settlement lives a more peaceable life, and both old and young have the privileges of our union Sabbath schools. The children are giving their copper to send to Dr. Guerrant to help in the Soul-Winners League's good work. It is a real sacrifice for them to give anything at all, but they give of their little means cheerfully. Last month the offerings amounted to two dollars. These children—in fact, all of the people—walk to services for want of a better way. There isn't a buggy in all of the Settlement, and horses are few.

The Presbyterian and Methodist Sunday Schools of Newport, in union, made an excursion trip to Cataloochee this summer and spread dinner on the bank of Big Creek. We were glad to have them, and it was the first picnic in the history of the Smokies. Rev. Dr. Edward C. Guerrant, President of the Society of Soul-Winners, visited this mission last year. At that time we were without a church or school building, and were laboring under many disadvantages. Dr. Guerrant stood on a chair in the commissary building, and preached to a crowd of lumbermen, who were off duty on account of rain. We now have a building for school and church purposes, for which we are very grateful.

We missionaries are exceedingly grateful to our kind CHRISTIAN HERALD friends for their help in our work. The work is evangelical and undenominational, and is supported by free-will offerings, and no collections are ever taken in churches for the support of the work. Nothing but faith in God would undertake such work without means provided. But that is sufficient. Pray for us.

given to those who are laboring among the mountain people, so that no mistakes may be made, and that that part of our country may become one of God's strongholds."

When we came here two years ago, there were no Sabbath schools in the Settlement, and preaching was sadly neglected. The region had a reputation for quarrels and fights. A sheriff had just been shot and killed by unknown parties. "Moonshine liquor" was being made and sold. Hundreds were perishing for the "Bread of Life." Seeing the great need of the infusion of Gospel knowledge among the people, especially the young, we organized two Bible schools at

The Gospel to Little Children

MORE than three hundred children gathered at the Union Gospel Tent, opposite the Clarendon Street Church, Boston, on a recent Saturday afternoon. A happy crowd of boys and girls, from four to fourteen years of age, responded to the invitation cards which had been distributed in advance. They were well behaved, but bubbling over with delight, in anticipation of the treat which was to follow the opening exercises. Lemonade and flowers were not every-day happenings to most of these little ones. All united in singing "America," after which a simple prayer preceded a ten-minute Gospel talk. Some children from the Little Wanderer's Home then sang very sweetly, the singing being greatly enjoyed by the little ones. Another brief prayer ended this part of the exercises.

The Women's Christian Temperance Union donated several baskets of flowers, and each child was given a small bunch. There was plenty of sweet biscuit, and an inexhaustible supply of iced lemonade. At the close, one pretty little maid came to the platform, and said: "Oh, thank you, so much. It was very kind of you to give us this treat; we have had such a good time." She no doubt represented the mind of the others in the matter.

The tent in which these services were held was erected by the Ruggles Street Church, of which Dr. A.

C. Dixon is pastor. Nightly meetings were held during July, on the corner of Clarendon Street and Warrar Avenue, and then the tent was removed to Ruggles Street near Washington, for the month of August.

Messrs. Call and Campbell, of the Union Rescue Mission, were in charge during July. An attractive programme of speakers included Rev. E. E. Davidson and Lawrence Greenwood, Evangelists; Pastors Stockdale, Clevenger and McElwain, the Gideons, an organization of Christian commercial travelers, and Rev. Wm. Needham, the artist evangelist. Mr. Needham's sketches were very serviceable in making plain the Gospel message, the silent carbon conveying to hearts, through the eyes, what words failed to say to the ears.

The attendance was very good, and between four and five hundred were present many nights. A great many unchurched persons were reached, the tent being placed in the heart of a densely-populated section. Many prodigals were rescued, and confessed Christ in the after-meetings, and hardly a service closed without some hands being lifted by those saying "Pray for me."

The NEW PANAMA CANAL PLANS

The French Method Abandoned and the Lock System Adopted-15,000 Southern Negroes to Finish the Work in Eight Years --- Opportunities for Evangelism

ADMIRAL WALKER, CHAIRMAN

DIAGRAM SHOWING LOCK SYSTEM OF CANAL FROM THE COMMISSION'S RELIEF MAP

D. I. MURPHY, SECRETARY

From a Special Correspondent of "The Christian Herald"

AFTER fully considering the great Panama Canal problem in all its aspects, the United States Government has now completed its plans for beginning work in earnest, on a project which universally conceded to be the greatest engineering and industrial undertaking of the age.

The failures of France in constructing this great engineering project, have not been without definite importance to us; for our Commission has decided to conduct its programme according to a very different method than that employed by Count de Lesseps, the great French Engineer.

Investigations by the Commission have shown that the original plans of the old Company, in constructing the sea-level canal, would require probably more than twice the time that would be needed to build a canal with locks. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is now privileged to announce that, as a result of these investigations, the plan of a canal with locks is been definitely adopted, and the sea-level plan of DeLesseps abandoned. The sea-level canal would have to be built of capacity to carry the maximum floods down its channel without damage. The quantity of excavation necessary for such a system has been crudely estimated to be about 266,228,000 cubic yards. The cost of such a canal, comprising a dam at Alhajuela, and a tide-lock at Miraflores, is computed at about $240,000,000, and a period covering at least twenty-years would be required for its completion.

The line of the new route of the canal does not differ from the line adopted for the sea-level canal; nor do the plans of the Panama Canal Company, providing the summit level with water, differ materially from the present plans of the Isthmian Commission. The initial proposition is to convert Lake Bohio into a great artificial lake, extending through the Culebra cut, by damming the Chagres River, so as to yield a water supply of 10,000,000 tons. When needed, an additional volume of water, four times that now provided for daily consumption, can be made available by means of the Alhajuela reservoir. This provisional storage of water is made in consideration of the dry season, and because the quantity used in the operation of the canal will vary, according to the amount of traffic.

The decision to adopt the lock system was not reached until the Commission had made most exhaustive inquiry, including an examination of the Kiel canal in Germany, the North Sea canal in Holland, and the Manchester canal and Liverpool docks in England. At the present visit to Central and South America, to inspect the work already done, was also necessary before reaching a final decision.

To the writer was granted the privilege of examining the unpublished report of the Isthmian Canal Commission. In that report, the proposed line of Canal from Colon to Panama is shown to be forty-nine miles in length. For more than half this distance it follows the valley of the Chagres. This river is about 145 miles long, and has a drainage area above Bohio of nearly 875 square miles. Its discharge at Bohio varies from a minimum of about 350 cubic feet to a maximum of 36,000 cubic feet per second. The total discharge required to operate the canal for a traffic of 10,000,000 tons per annum would be 1,070 cubic feet per second. The average annual discharge of the Chagres is about 3,200 cubic feet per second. Providing for the deficiency of the dry months—February, March and April—enough water must be stored for use in such emergencies. The Chagres is a river well adapted to the service of the proposed lock canal, and is the only feeder to the summit level.

The plan recommended by the Commission is to form a great artificial lake by the Bohio dam across the Chagres, and it is to be known as Lake Bohio. This lake has an area of 38.5 square miles at 85 feet above mean tide, and above the locks where the canal enters the lake it is for the first seven miles a broad, deep body of water with room for anchorage and navigation. Beyond this, some light excavations are necessary to provide for a flood discharge of the Chagres. The length of the canal in Lake Bohio is 12.68 miles from the locks to the point where the channel leaves the river. The section extends .93 of a mile farther, to the point where it enters the cut through the divide. The estimated cost of this section is $2,952,154, in-old Panama Company. Here it changes direction to the right, upon a curve of 3,280 feet radius and is built upon a straight line for 2,000 feet to a point 2.39 miles from deep water in the bay. This wide channel is inside the shore line for about a mile, and forms a well protected harbor. The estimated cost of this entrance and harbor is $8,057,707, of which $1,936,991 is for work outside the jetty. The annual cost of maintenance is $30,000. The bottom width of the Canal from the inner end of the harbor is 150 feet. The length of this level from the harbor is 14.42 miles. Its estimated cost is $11,099,839, including $151,347 for levees and $299,000 for the lower approach, 1,200 feet long, to the lock. There will be a double flight of locks at Bohio, having a lift varying from 82 feet at the minimum level of the lake, to 90 feet at the maximum; 41 to 45 to each lock, the normal lift being 85 feet.

These locks are to be on the location adopted by the French Company. The estimated cost of this flight of double locks, four lock chambers in all, is $11,567,275, including excavation. Above the locks the artificial lake holds the channel for 12.68 miles, or until it enters Culebra cut. A pair of gates 100 feet wide will be placed near the entrance to the summit cut, so that the level of Lake Bohio will not be affected, if it becomes necessary to draw off the water from the summit cut. These gates will be at the site of a lock near Obispo, with a hard rock foundation. The estimated cost of these gates, including masonry and excavation, is $295,434. The summit cut is 7.91 miles long from the Obispo gates to the Pedro Miguel locks. The highest point is about five miles from the Obispo gates, where the bottom of the Canal at the axis is 206 feet below the natural surface of the ground. This is the famous Culebra cut; but the name is more frequently applied to the mile of heaviest work. This cut has been estimated on the basis of a bottom width of 150 feet, and the entire cut will be lined with masonry walls, finishing two feet above high water. Benches of masonry 38 feet wide will line both sides of the Canal, on one of which the Panama Railroad will be laid and a service track upon the other. The estimated cost of the 6.02 miles of heavy work is $41,940,480, and of the entire 7.91 miles between the Obispo gates and the Pedro Miguel locks, $44,414,460, including the upper approach to these locks. The amount of excavation in this section is 43,237,200 cubic yards; and it is thought that it would take eight years to excavate this section of the Canal alone. Rear-Admiral Walker, however, confidently believes that the entire canal will be finished in eight years.

The work on the Culebra cut, concentrated in such a small place, is without a parallel, and engineers who are acquainted with the Isthmian project, predict that several of the devices found so effective in building the drainage canal at Chicago, will be used at Panama. Modern machinery and practical application of handling material will do much to quicken the construction. The cost for excavation has been computed at eighty cents per cubic yard. The Pedro Miguel locks will be similar to the Bohio locks, and will cost $9,081,321. A level, 1.33 miles long, extends from the Pedro Miguel locks to Miraflores, the last lock. The estimated cost of this section is $1,192,286. At the end of this level will be located the Miraflores lock, with a lift varying from 18 feet high tide to 38 feet low tide. This lock and cluding $434,400 for the upper approach to the Bohio locks. The dam at Bohio is only three miles from the head of the river Gigante, which is an excellent site for a spillway, for the overflow of Lake Bohio will discharge through this spillway into Pena Blanca swamp, through natural and artificial channels below Gatun into the Chagres, and from there to the sea, being guided away from the canal by levees. At Alhajuela, about eleven miles above Gamboa, it is proposed to build a high masonry dam across the Chagres, to assist in the storage of floods, and to furnish motive power for operating the locks and lighting the canal at night from the Pacific to the Atlantic.

The total length of the Canal, from its beginning in the Bay Limon to its ending in the Bay of Panama, is seventy kilometers, and to give a sufficient permanent depth even at low tide, five kilometers must be added for the channel to be hollowed out in the Bay of Panama.

The proposed route begins at the six fathom line in Limon Bay, and is a channel 500 feet wide at the bottom, with side slopes, one on three, and curves to the left until it reaches a point inside the jetty built by the

The Beautiful

TEXT — ECCLES. 3: 11:

"He hath made every thing beautiful in his time"

THE Solomonic writings are often epigrammatic in style. Like priceless jewels cut and polished by the lapidaries, and collected in caskets, irrespective of size or color, his verses, as verbal gems, are clustered into chapters, with but little attempt at consecutive arrangement. Indeed, King Solomon, for the most part, seems to me to be like a writer of note books. In the king's judgment hall, or on the street, or out upon the hillside under the blue dome of the sky, when a great thought is divinely inspired within his brain, he jots that thought down in memorandum. Then at the end of the day, or the week, or the month, or the year, he collects these different thoughts, irrespective of their logical sequence, into a chapter, or a book, and has the court stenographer write them out again in full. In other words, King Solomon's verses, for the most part, are like freight cars, that can be side-tracked, or uncoupled from one car and attached to other cars. Each verse stands out as a distinct entity. An average verse is as appropriate in the sixth chapter of Proverbs as in the twentieth chapter. The verse is the car. The chapter is the freight train. They are often as unconnected as the definitions of Webster's Dictionary.

The modern critics tell us that King Solomon did not write the book of Ecclesiastes; that its style and diction belong to a later date. It appears to me, however, that its tone and its depressing refrain are characteristic of a man who led such a life of ease and self-indulgence as Solomon led, and that at the end of it, satiated with pleasure and study as he must have been, it was precisely the kind of book that would come from his pen, and the conclusions uttered in that book, just such as would be likely to be reached by a man who, having strayed from God, was disappointed and dissatisfied with his life. In the absence, therefore, of definite knowledge, I shall assume that the first verse of the book indicates him as the author, "The son of David, king in Jerusalem."

Harmony in Sequence

But though King Solomon was not, as a rule, a connected writer, yet in the book of Ecclesiastes he makes an exception to his usual custom. In this third chapter, for example, there is clear sequence. No man can interpret my text aright, unless he uses the words, "He hath made every thing beautiful in his time," as a glorious climax to the ten verses which precede them. Solomon is here enunciating the mighty law of sequence. He is marshaling the events of a human life as an army. Each event must have its right position. In the language of the chapter he says: "There is a time to be born, and a time to die." There is a time for a cradle, and a time when the wood of that cradle should be changed into a coffin lid. "There is a time to plant, and a time to reap that which is planted." The plough and the sickle can not have the rust rubbed off their faces at the same time. "There is a time to weep and a time to laugh." That means that a joke or a cachinnation at a funeral is a discord. A tear and a sob at a coronation are also out of place. A wedding march is never played in a minor key, neither is the "Battle Hymn of the Republic" sung to the accompaniment of a "Dead March from Saul," nor is a "Christmas Carol" imprisoned behind the musical bars of a Mozart's Requiem. "There is a time to love and a time to hate." There is a time when the "Angel of Mercy" should extend the open palm of forgiveness, as well as a time when the clenched fist of Justice must defend the weak, and fight a mortal combat over the prostrate forms of Innocence and Rectitude. Then, after the author of my text has sung the changes of the "Gospel Harmonies of Sequence," he generalizes all his statements in one great conclusion. He practically says, "All the different heart-beats of joy and sorrow, life and death, peace and conflict, hope and despair, have their purpose to serve, if they only come to man in the right way and at their appointed seasons. For God 'hath made every thing beautiful in his time.' This is the key-note of Christianity. Man in his sinful state is a monster of ugliness, a blemish on creation, a discord; but man redeemed, is haloed with divine beauty, and as Ralph Waldo Trine has said, 'He is in tune with the Infinite.'" He becomes part of the universal harmony, and his thoughts are in spiritual symmetry with the thoughts of God.

We find an analogy for man's spiritual beauty in the painter's brush and the artist's easel. According to Samuel Coleridge, the English poet and literary critic, the true definition of "beauty," is "multitude in unity." When standing before a great picture, like that of Leonardo da Vinci's "Last Supper," or Murillo's "Miracle of the Loaves and Fishes," or Raphael's greatest picture, his "Sistine Madonna," we find that there the many lights and the shadows, the gold and the silver, and the green and the yellow, and the blue and the saffron, and the violet and the purple, all blend in one common purpose. Thousands, perhaps tens of thousands of times, Michael Angelo with his brush, may have touched the wall in the Vatican, where to-day is seen his "Last Judgment." But not one of all of those thousands of times when he laid on the paint, did he do so without having one great idea in his mind. "Perfection is composed of many trifles," wrote he, "but perfection in art is not a trifle." A great picture is always "multitudes of different colors in blending unity." That unity is the cause of beauty, when seen upon the canvas of the masters of old and the masters of the present day.

Beauty in Blended Color

An artist's beauty is a "multitude in unity." We know that Samuel Coleridge's definition in reference to the painter's easel is true. We see a "multitude of colors in unity," when Turner, the most brilliant artistic colorist England ever produced, makes the sea a creature of life. Now it is a beautiful boulevard of gold, paving its way to the throne of a setting sun; now a perfect pandemonium of furies; now it is a burial scene, when Sir David Wilkie finds a sepulchre in the mighty deep, whose waves beat themselves into pieces on the Gibraltar crags. We see an artist's "multitude in unity" in the portraits of a Sir Anthony Van Dyck and in the mighty mountain peaks of a Bierstadt and in the pastoral dreams of a Millet. But though there may be many different tints blending in the colors of a rainbow, or in the hectic flush of a rose, did you ever stop to realize that all colors come from but three primal colors? Just the same as all nature; all the animal and vegetable and mineral kingdoms have but sixty-six different basic elements, of which they are all composed; so in the artistic world, we find that all colors originally come from but three primary colors—the red, the yellow and the blue. Now if God can form the artistic beauty of the sky, the sea, the land, out of the simple red, the simple yellow and the simple violet, is it absurd to suppose that God can spiritually make us artistically beautiful, no matter how crude and sinful we may be, if we only allow our thoughts and lives to be combined in symmetry with his thoughts and with Christ's life. Oh, the beauty of blending colors! From the brilliant pictorials of an autumnal leaf, let us learn the spiritual lesson for man that God hath made, and can make every thing beautiful in its time.

But the musician's oratorio and symmetry of sounds have also their analogies, by which we can find man; in his spiritual beauty, "In Tune with the Infinite." In the Epistle to the Romans, Paul writes, "How beautiful are the feet of them that preach the Gospel of peace and glad tidings of good things." Ay, beautiful are the feet of the Gospel messengers, but beautiful are the voices also. For to-day we find the symbol of man's thoughts in beautiful symmetry with God's thoughts, in the sweet throat of a singing thrush, in the sighing of the winds among the leaves and in the harvest-fields, in the moanings of the seas, as well as in the colors of its waters, and in all the strange, yet harmonious whether they be the calls of the lark or the cuckoo, which musicians declare sound the third note in music, or the shrill whistle of the bob-white, which, like the voice of the fife, is heard above every other instrument of the band, or the croonings of the wood-dove, which the California Indians used to call "majella," whose song by day and by twilight, both to mate and young, was one continuous whispering of "Here love! Love here! Here love! Love here!" Oh, the beautiful voices of blending harmonies, heard in the choruses of the woods! Who can ever listen to them, and not find a symbol of man's spiritual beauty. "In Tune with the Infinite."

But what, according to the law of sound, do we mean by being "In Tune with the Infinite?" I went hunting some time ago. As I lay in a dugout by a water-hole, hidden by the leaves, waiting for the birds to come down to drink, I asked myself this question, What is music? Why is it that all these voices of the woods have such a wonderful influence over me? Why does not the harsh call of the fishmonger hawking his food at my city door, or the deep voice of the fog-horn on ship-board off the banks of Newfoundland, or the rasp of a saw, or the whining cry of a spoilt child, enchant me as now do the voice-signalings of the pheasants, which I can now see way off under yonder trees, or the chirp of the swallows flying over my head, or the beautiful sounds that come to my ear, as the harpists of the winds finger the long, slender vines, as though they were harpstrings? I know that some of the repellent cries I have heard from the fishmonger, Richard Wagner has reproduced in his matchless operas. I know the deep voice of the fog-horn rolls and thunders and swells and dies away in the choruses of many a great musical master. I know the rasp of a saw can become part of a lullaby or of a martial march. Then why are not these different sounds at all times pleasing to my ear, instead of sometimes making me grit my teeth by setting my nerves on edge?

In order to answer this question, I made a study of the laws of musical sound. Dudley Buck, the great American composer, taught me that "Sweet music was merely a succession of combinations of sound, arranged with such connection and mutual relations as to express to the ear some distinct form or train of thought, and awaken certain corresponding emotions." He told me that music is thought expressed in sound, even as a great painting is thought expressed in color. A jumble of colors is a daub, not a picture. A riot of sounds promiscuously pushing and jostling each other, even as the stronger limbed members of a stampeding mob knock down and trample upon the weaker, is merely a collection of discords. It is only when "multitudes of sounds" are marshaled together in that we have music. So when I began to know what true music meant, then I said to myself, "Yes, yes, I now know what Ralph Waldo Trine means when he speaks of man being 'In Tune with the Infinite.'" Man in himself, may be so distracted by sin as to be like a discord in music. His voice in nature may be so discordant by reason of his corrupt condition, as to rend the ear as does the shrill cry of the vendor on the street. But when his nature is redeemed, his voice falls into its right place in the song of creation and of Moses and the Lamb, and becomes harmonious and melodious. By the sweet voices of the woods blending in perpetual harmonies, can you not catch the meaning of my text, when King Solomon declares God hath made, and will continue to make, according to the laws of music, every thing "beautiful in its time."

The symmetries of straight lines and curves in sculpture and architecture also form analogies for man's spiritual beauty. Wandering among the famous buildings of Europe, I find that, architecturally, a great building has a symmetrical unity, just as a perfect statue is chiseled after the physical formations of a perfect man. Many years ago, there was exhumed from the buried ruins of old Rome a marble leg, broken from off one of the statues of old. That broken fragment is still preserved in the Vatican. Michael Angelo, as a sculptor, used to study that leg by the day, the week, the month, and the year, "because," said the great Italian master, "I consider that piece of stone the most perfect formation of physical anatomy ever carved by the chisel of man." So symmetrically perfect may the lines and the curves of a great group of statuary be that when you look at some of the best examples of sculpture in the Louvre, the Vatican, or the British Museum, the figures almost seem as though their lungs are breathing and their lips are ready to speak.

Now, the symmetrical laws observed in true sculpture, are also found to exist in true architecture. A great builder like Christopher Wren, did not start in to erect St. Paul's Cathedral at haphazard. Every part of the walls, the dome, and the capstone were carefully and harmoniously designed and properly proportioned before one spadeful of dirt was dug out of the heart of mother earth to excavate the cellars of London's architectural pride. And the strange part of the of Italy, Greece, and other parts of Europe, is how deceptive they are as to their size when first seen by the human eye. When one sees the dome of St. Peter's at Rome, lifting itself toward the skies, or the spires of the Cologne Cathedral, like the uplifted forefinger of an orator pointing heavenward, or the roof of the Milan Cathedral, peopled with myriads of saints and apostles carved in stone, the lengths and the breadths and the heights of those structures rarely impress the tourist at first. Why? Because all are in perfect symmetrical proportion. A truly great building is "multitudes of stones arranged in unity." It is thought expressed in stone, as a painting is thought expressed in colors, or as music is thought expressed in sound.

Let us loiter for a little while in the "Poets' Corner" of Westminster Abbey. As we listen, the sweet bards of the English language seem to lift their heads from their pillows of dust and begin to sing, and we find man's spiritual beauty in the analogies of poetry, as

Japanese Closing in on Port Arthur

JAPANESE ENTERING A FORT OUTSIDE OF PORT ARTHUR, AFTER BOMBARDMENT

RUSSIA'S tribulations, which have been steadily increasing ever since the beginning of the present war, seemed to have reached the culminating point on Aug. 17. Following the double defeat of her Port Arthur and Vladivostok squadrons, the death of Admiral Witthoeft, the loss of the Rurik and several smaller warships, and the disabling of a number of others, came the news that all hopes for Port Arthur holding out longer were virtually abandoned, and that its surrender seemed to be inevitable. It was admitted that the Japanese held all the positions that dominated the fortress. They had begun to bombard the entire front of the main defenses, from Wolf Hill to Taku Mountain. Fort Hanlungtien, only a mile from the main fortress, was in their hands. The Taku and Syadzu hills bristled with Japanese cannon. In four days' fighting, the Russians had lost nearly 2,000 men in killed, wounded and missing.

Japan's dispositions of her fleet and armies had been such as to forbid all hope of their reaching the fortress. Pigeon Bay (which commands the main sea-entrance), and Ali-Chwang were the last to be occupied. Now, the flight of the Japanese shells from Pigeon Bay could be followed by the eye as they circled like shooting stars and fell in great flashes of fire in the doomed city. Night and day the death-dealing rain of projectiles continued, the Russians seldom replying. Bursting shells ignited coal barges in the docks, resulting in a great conflagration. Many of the larger buildings were demolished by the shells or by fire, and the hospitals were reported as over-crowded with the injured. Many civilians with their families had already left, but the number of non-combatants in the city was still considerable. Hundreds of civilians had joined the ranks and were assisting in the defence.

On August 16, the Japanese commander sent Major Yamoka, under a truce flag, to the Russians, with an offer from the Mikado guaranteeing the safe removal of non-combatants, and also demanding the surrender of the fort. It stipulated that the Russian garrison should march out with the honors of war and join Gen. Kouropatkin, and that the seven Russian warships in the harbor, with the destroyers and gunboats, should surrender to the Japanese. Gen. Stoessel, when he received this ultimatum, is said to have flown into a furious passion, and strode around an hour before he became calm enough to discuss it. The communication required an answer at 10 A.M. the following day. Before the hour appointed, Gen. Stoessel dispatched his reply, refusing either to surrender or to send out the non-combatants. When the reply had been sent, the Russian batteries resumed firing. At this time, when the defenders were still displaying the utmost courage, matters were really in a deplorable condition within the fort itself. Food was scarce and ammunition far from plentiful. The battered Russian warships which had escaped Togo and returned to the harbor, made another sally, to escape the plunging fire of the Japanese land batteries, but soon returned, Togo's ships being on guard outside.

A correspondent estimates the Japanese losses in the recent land fights at Port Arthur, at from 10,000 to 20,000, but Japanese accounts do not admit such heavy losses. The dead are burned in quicklime and their bones sent to Japan. The land mines have caused great slaughter among the Japanese. A large part of the population in Port Arthur are now living in bomb-proof shelters underground.

Tokio dispatches say that the Port Arthur campaign "now enters on its final stage." This is interpreted to mean, that after further bombardment an effort will be made to capture the fortress by assault. When this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD reaches our readers, the fortress may have been stormed and taken, though at a terrible loss of life.

WAR NOTES

Russia will make a draft of 30,000 men from the population, principally factory and mill hands, to go to the war.

The Japanese rescued 623 of the crew of the Russian warship Rurik. All the principal officers perished.

The Czarevitch, and other Russian warships which took refuge in Kiao-chow, the German port in China, have been dismantled.

The Russian battleships Rossia and Gromoboi, which fled north after the fight with Kamimura's squadron, have reached Vladivostok in safety. The Diana, Pallada, and Novik of the Port Arthur squadron, are also believed to be en route to the same port.

as in painting and music and sculpture and architecture. For as painting is rhythm in color, and music rhythm in sound, and sculpture and architecture are rhythm in stone, so poetry is rhythm in words. Aye, poetry is more than mere rhythm. An English writer once well said, "Poetry in the flower-garden of human language is the blossom and the fragrance of all human knowledge, human thoughts, human passions and emotions." It is man's most transcendent hopes and noblest ambitions, with the highest peak of the Mount of Assension for a footstool: or it is man's wail of eternal despair when, as the results of his sins, he is heading towards a Dante's Inferno, or he is compelled to join the moans of a Milton's Paradise Lost.

But though poetry is rhythm in words, yet words themselves, as individuals, are not poetry. Many years ago, in the old village of Ayr, high unto the banks of the "Bonnie Doon," I heard an old Scotchman recite John Anderson My Jo, John, and other poems of the great lyric poet, until the tears rained down his cheeks, and I thought those poems were the sweetest words ever composed by man. But the words Burns used in his poems, and William Shakespeare used in his poems, and Longfellow used in his poems, and Whittier and Holmes and Lowell and Bayard Taylor used in their poems were, for the most part, only the simple words we use in every-day life by our own firesides. The beauty of these poets' words are entirely due to their juxtaposition with their surrounding words. The words which express our thoughts, our passions, our emotions, may not be beautiful in themselves; but if they are brought into rhythm with God's words, they not only become poetry, but they become beautiful. For then our thoughts as words are in symmetry with God's thoughts.

But, perhaps, we have lingered already too long among the artists and the musicians and the sculptors and the architects and the poets, to find man's spiritual beauty by being in symmetry with God's thoughts. Perhaps, after all, we can clinch the truth of our text best, by a short running comment upon a few of the verses which precede the words, "He hath made every thing beautiful in its time." God says that man is beautiful when he is born. Oh, yes. That means when man is born for Christ. But is man beautiful when he is born for sin?

There is a "time to die," which is beautiful. Death, if it comes in God's way, is beautiful, for then a dying saint knows death is not annihilation, but coronation, irradiation, and eternal triumph. Like old Senator Foote, when dying he can look at the rapturous glories ahead and cry, "Beautiful! Beautiful! Beautiful!" But was the death of Nero beautiful? Was the death of Cleopatra beautiful? Was the death of Thomas Paine beautiful—one moment in prayer, the next moment blaspheming God, until his relations, in horror, placed their fingers in their ears and ran from his howling blasphemous agonies? Oh, Christian! beautiful are man's tears, and smiles, and joys, and sorrows, only as they are in symmetrical harmony with God's great hopes, and sorrows, and desires.

Are you and I ready to become part of God's beautiful creation? Are we ready to become beautiful in ourselves by becoming beautiful in Him? Even the lowest and vilest, saved by His grace and redeemed by His blood, can become a true part of Christ's beautiful life. Many years ago, when the yellow fever plague was raging in Memphis, Tennessee, a rough-looking man applied to the City Relief Committee, and said: "I want to nurse." It was at a time when most people who could, were fleeing from the stricken and desolated homes. The death carts seemed to be going everywhere. At first the physician declined the rough man's services; but as he could get no one else to do the work, this man was sent to one of the most filthy and dangerous wards of the city. Wherever he went he was a messenger of love. He would not tell his name; he said simply, "Call me John." Time passed on, and after awhile "John," whose name was now famous through the city, sickened and died. While his body was being prepared for an unmarked grave, suddenly upon his arm was found a livid mark, which proved that "John" was an ex-convict. "John" had been one of the most dangerous criminals of all the South. Once he was a murderer, but now, through the blood of Jesus, he became a ministering angel. Once he was horrible in his depraved malformation. Now he was made beautiful by bringing his life in symmetrical touch with Jesus' life.

My friends, will you not let Christ fill you with his spiritual beauty? Will you, not only in the future, be spiritually beautiful, but beautiful now, in your present life? Will you not become transformed as was John, the redeemed nurse, laboring for his Master in plague-stricken Memphis?

The Sultan's Back-down

MISSIONARIES and lovers of Christian work all over the world, have a personal interest in the peaceful triumph of our State Department in the negotiations with Turkey concerning the status of American missionaries in the Sultan's dominions. There are, at the present time, some three hundred schools, colleges, training institutions, charities and missionary homes in Turkey, and for many years a large and steadily increasing educational and religious work has been conducted by Americans there. During all that time the workers have labored under a serious handicap. Although repeatedly urged to do so, the Porte has always refused to extend to the American institutions the same favor and protection it has freely granted to Catholic, Greek, and other non-Mohammedan workers, and this discrimination has been a serious disadvantage to the Americans. Knowing that their Government held our missionaries so lightly, the Mohammedan population have frequently displayed a spirit of open antagonism amounting to active hostility. Graduates from the American institutions were objects of suspicion and disfavor, and were persecuted upon the slightest pretext or upon none at all. Our missionaries were molested and harassed by petty officials, and remonstrance and appeal alike proved vain. American travelers in Turkey were subjected to annoyances from which travelers of other nationalities were exempt. Minister Leishman, when appealed to, was powerless to improve a situation which was fast becoming intolerable. The very name of "American" was to the Moslems like a red rag to a bull, and the excitable nature of the Sultan's subjects, made it highly probable that at some time this hostile feeling might find expression in open violence.

All this has now been changed, and the Sultan has been brought to his senses by the firm attitude of our Government, in demanding equal rights with other foreigners for Americans in Turkey. It is understood that not only has the Porte consented to place Americans on a plane of equality with the "most favored nation" (as France, Germany, and England are referred to in Turkish diplomatic phraseology), but that the long-pending claims against the Sultan for losses sustained by our Missions during the time of the Armenian massacres, and since, will now be paid in full.

Americans by adoption and naturalization, but who may have been born subjects of the Sultan, will also be beneficiaries under this new understanding. Many Armenians who, after residing in the United States and becoming citizens, have visited their native land, have been arbitrarily arrested, imprisoned and punished for no other offense than that of American citizenship.

It is high time that these and the various other matters involved in the new understanding with the Porte should be definitely settled, and that the rights of Americans, native or naturalized, should be established there on as firm and permanent a basis as in other lands. Abdul Hamid, however, is a slippery customer, and an adept in the art of diplomatic evasion, and if there is a loop-hole through which he can yet escape from the fulfilment of his pledge he will doubtless endeavor to make use of it.

The Czarina's Son

SELDOM have mothers the world over sympathized with any one as they have with the wife of the Russian Emperor in her hour of gladness on the birth of her son. Four little girls preceded this longed-for boy, and each was a disappointment. Undoubtedly the little princesses have been beloved children, prized by their father and mother; but the nation at large wanted an heir to be born to the throne, and until the male child came the Empress of the Russias was considered derelict in her duty. Why on earth the blame is ever laid on a mother when the sex of her new-born child is unsatisfactory, is one of those never-solved problems that baffle woman wisdom. In lofty and lowly homes alike there seems to be an eager wish that the line shall be carried on, and the name not perish from the land. And this is probably the reason why families are incomplete until sons are born.

The Czar has had such a run of ill-fortune in the Far East, and the hopes of the world have been so centred on the success of his plucky island foes, that it must be an unspeakable bliss to him, poor man, to gaze on the face of his tiny son. We all rejoice with him, but most we felicitate the mother, in whose pictured countenance we have read so deep a sadness. The superstitious and ignorant among the Russians have latterly been calling her accursed, and heaping on her the odium of causing their losses on sea and shore. As the church bells have rung and the cannon thundered at the birth of the new baby, very likely the fickle crowds have changed their minds, and the wife of the Czar will again take her place as a person favored by Jehovah.

Crime and its Remedy

CRIME apparently has its seasons of alternate activity and quiescence. We are reminded of this by the startling acts of lawlessness that have lately shocked communities in different parts of the country—acts which, occurring almost simultaneously, revive the problem so much discussed by sociologists and criminologists: whether crime in its usual development is sporadic or epidemic, or both. In one section, murders and lynchings, with law set wholly at defiance; in another, the riotous spirit has apparently sprung out of the sharp conflict between labor and capital. In New York, the hideous crime of kidnapping and holding children for ransom, has again terrorized thousands of families with the fear that a similar fate may befall their own dear ones. These, though sufficient to seriously disturb the tranquillity of communities, are unquestionably sporadic, and are capable of being dealt with successfully by the firm hand of the law, supported by the peace-loving and law-abiding part of the population.

But law, though it may repress, can never cure crime. Neither education, nor all the arts of the highest civilization, can eradicate the evil instincts that lead man to do violence to his fellows.

To effect a change in this condition of affairs, some influence must be applied that will go down to the very root of the trouble. It is not enough to shut the gates against the "criminal offscourings of Europe," or to deal still more sternly in our courts with the lawless element, or to enact rigidly repressive legislation. No community was ever made moral by statute. We might conduct a crusade on these lines for a generation, only to find confronting us then, as now, bloody crimes of violence and disorder, a widespread disregard of law, and a bold, cunning and unscrupulous section of society living in predatory fashion off the rest, whom they regard as legitimate victims.

The true philosophy of reform is that indicated by our Lord, who said, "From within, out of the heart of men, proceed evil thoughts," and all those crimes which shock society. The Government does its duty when it punishes the law-breaker, but he needs something more than punishment. He needs that his heart be cleansed of his criminal propensities. When that is done, and not till then, shall we have deliverance from these periodical outbreaks. For this task the Government has no aptitude. It is here that the Church of Christ finds its proper work. It knows what is the true remedy for sin. If the Church—laymen as well as pastors—would take up the work of applying that remedy in earnest, there would be hope for the world. Long enough has it built its fine edifices and held its decorous services; more should be done.

The servants of Christ should go out into the highways and hedges to seek those who are spiritually blind and maimed, to compel them to come in. Not yet has the Church awakened to a sense of its duty to the heathen at home, as it did, a century ago, to the claims of the heathen abroad. There needs to be a united and systematic effort to reach the outsiders; to get at the children and enlighten them; to relieve the pressure on the poor, which prompts them to crime; to take the criminal by the hand when he comes out of prison, and help him to an honest life. This is a gigantic task, but it is what the Church is here for. It is to be a light to the world. It has done enough for the righteous man sitting comfortably in his pew, absorbing doctrinal and ethical teaching Sunday by Sunday.

Now let it, like its Master, who declared that he came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance, go among the sinners and try to win them in the name of Christ. They are miserable, they are being hunted and imprisoned; they would listen to men who love them, and honestly and intelligently tried to help them. There is the true secret of social reform—when the Church energetically, vigorously and thoughtfully takes it up, that day will have dawned for which we pray: "Thy kingdom come, thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven."

Queen Victoria's Tomb

EXQUISITELY beautiful is the effigy of Queen Victoria, now placed beside that of her husband on the royal tomb in the Mausoleum at Frogmore, England. It is the work of Baron Marochetti, who was the Queen's favorite sculptor, and the designer of all the statues executed by her orders. It is remarkable, as are his other works, for its simplicity and fidelity to nature. It represents Her Majesty in her earlier years, and was modeled before the death of the Prince Consort. The figure shows her in her royal robes, wearing a jeweled crown, and with the sceptre in her left hand. The expression of the face is that of peaceful sleep, the features lulled in calm repose. The place for it has been empty until now, since the effigy of Prince Albert was put there. The erection of the mausoleum was begun soon after his death, in 1861, and his body was deposited here as soon as the building was completed. The sarcophagus occupies the entire width of the marble floor, and after the Queen's death, in 1901, her casket was laid in it beside his, as she had desired. It is covered by the massive marble slab on which the effigies now lie side by side. For nearly forty years the white figure of the Prince had been there, waiting its companion. It is now completed by the addition of her own effigy, according to the Queen's wish. On the walls of the building is the touching inscription placed there by her orders: "Farewell, beloved. Here at last I will rest with thee. With thee, in Christ, will I rise again." Her pathetic resolve is now fulfilled. The effigies of the illustrious couple, so ardently attached to one another in life, lie side by side, as do their bodies under the slab, and though a long interval elapsed between their deaths, it may now be said of them, as of the ancient king and his son:

Lovely and pleasant in their lives, and in their death they were not divided (II. Samuel 1: 23).

The Cost of a Theft

An incident related recently by a wealthy proprietor of a department store, contains an impressive lesson on the cost, even in this life, of wrong-doing. The proprietor and his partner had both been poor boys, and had risen by hard work and careful attention, to the head of the business. They determined to find, from among their employees, a boy whom they could advance in the same way, and eventually take into partnership. They had several conversations on the subject, and ultimately selected one who was very bright, active and industrious. Both partners liked his appearance and habits, and greed between themselves to watch him closely. If he proved to be the right kind of boy, his promotion was to be rapid. The head of the department was instructed to watch him also, and report. He did so from time to time, and his report was always favorable. After a few weeks the partners consulted, and agreed to give the boy six months' trial, and if at the end of that time he had still a good record, his promotion would begin. Of course no intimation of his good fortune was given to the boy, and the scrutiny was continued. The last week of the six months' probation arrived, when one morning the superintendent saw the boy slip something slyly into his pocket. He insisted on knowing what it was, and ultimately the boy confessed that he had stolen a quarter of a dollar. He was of course dismissed, and never learned how near he had been to the highway of fortune. He had sold the fine position that was in store for him, and his magnificent fortune, for a quarter of a dollar. Every one will agree as to the folly, as well as the wickedness of his act; but how few realize that to sacrifice the eternal future for the sake of some worldly advantage, is just as foolish.

For what shall it profit a man if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul? (Mark 8: 36).

Robbing the Wires

A traveler in the Argentine Republic reports a singular nuisance, which is crippling the telegraph service in that country. He says that the wires in use are either imperfectly insulated, or that the climate has rotted away the insulating material. The telegraph operators have recently been annoyed by the decrease in the operating power, and have discovered that the defect results from the work of spiders. The spiders spin their webs across the telegraph lines, and as soon as dew falls or a shower comes up, every microscopic thread with which the wires munication, but small causes often lead to disastrous results. Many a Christian has learned by sad experience, that some sin that he regards as trivial, interrupts both his communion with God and his usefulness among men.

Take us the foxes, the little foxes, that spoil the vines; for our vines have tender grapes (Solomon's Song 2: 15).

Comm'r Booth-Tucker's Farewell

As announced in these columns last week, orders have come from Gen. Booth, the venerable chief of the Salvation Army, for the removal of his son-in-law, Commissioner Booth-Tucker, from the command of the Army in the United States. The order carries with it a promotion, for the Commissioner will now take office in the international organization, which will give him higher rank. He is exceedingly well fitted for his new duties by his experience in India and later in this country. He doubtless, however, feels no little regret at parting with his associates in the work here, with whom his relations have been extremely cordial throughout, and with his many friends among the clergy and laity of America, whose hearty esteem he has won by his kindly and courteous manners. They, on their side, are sorry to lose a fellow-worker so devoted and earnest in the cause of Christ. While congratulating him on his promotion, they deplore the exigency that removes him to his Transatlantic service, and wish him most sincerely even greater success than he has had here. His successor has not precedent in marriage engagements. He says that he once celebrated a marriage, the parties to which had been pledged to one another over forty years before. They were then boy and girl in a town in Maine and were schoolmates. The boy was fifteen and the girl only thirteen when their troth was plighted. The parents of course were not to be taken into confidence until there was some definite prospect of the boy's being able to support a wife, but the girl gave her promise to wait as long as might be necessary. The boy decided to become a lawyer, and in course of time he was called to the bar and went to a Western city to begin practice. Being without influence and having no faculty for making friends, he had no cases, and after a long struggle he abandoned the profession. He became successively a school-teacher, a store-clerk, and a farm-hand, but made no money at anything. At last he entered the employ of a railroad company, and there found his true sphere. He succeeded so well that after years of hard work he gained a high position. But nearly forty years had passed since he left New England and in his trials and troubles he had allowed his correspondence with his early love to lapse. Still he thought he would like to see her. He found her unmarried and with a lively recollection of him. The minister who tells the story had the pleasure of marrying them. If Christians had the patience of that woman and were as faithful in their love of Christ, they would not be so often found saying as do scoffers:

Where is the promise of his coming (II. Peter 3: 4).

The government telegraph department, especially in Buenos Ayres, has been put to much inconvenience. A number of expedients have been tried, but to no purpose. On the important line between Buenos Ayres and Rosario, the effect of the webs is to cut down the speed of working from three or four hundred messages an hour, to thirty. It is believed that the only effectual remedy is to put all the wires underground, which, of course, will involve a heavy expense. It is significant that so small and despised a creature, should be able to cause such an interruption to public com-

THE COMTESSE SAYS AU REVOIR!

"GENTLEMEN," cried the first lieutenant, turning to the officers behind him, "will you be good enough to man the first cutter?"

"This is a further honor," said the marquis, as he followed them to the gangway.

Hat in hand and sad at heart, Macartney escorted them. On leaving the ship, the senior in rank always goes last. After the officers had taken their stations in the thwarts, Brébœuf saluted Macartney, for whom he had a great admiration, and, followed by Aurore, who dropped the young officers a courtesy, walked down the accommodation ladder. The vice-admiral motioned to his grandson and then turned to Louise.

The girl was very pale. She stood with her hands clasped in front of her. She was deeply agitated. Scarcely a year before she had been at school in the quiet of a convent. She had not reached womanhood, a glance revealed that; but the experiences crowded into the last year of her life had been so stupendous, that they had developed her more rapidly than five years of ordinary existence.

Macartney had come into her life. His love had enveloped her like the sunshine a flower. Was she for France after all? Things looked differently to her in the hour of parting. Did she love the man who loved her? Why was the thought of separation so bitter to her?

The vice-admiral was keen-eyed. He read men and women as he read a book. Something of what was passing in the girl's breast he could understand. He looked from her to Macartney. The man was scarcely less pale and nervous than the woman.

The vice-admiral had not changed his views at all. He had not the slightest intention of recognizing this sailor, Chevalier of St. Louis though he had made him, as a suitor for his granddaughter, the Comtesse de Vaudémont. But if the vice-admiral knew the signs, that young man loved the young woman with a genuine passion. He was about to sever them. There was no probability that they would ever meet again. He could afford to be kind. He deliberately turned and walked very slowly aft a little space. The tacit permission was patent.

"Mademoiselle!" said Macartney, stepping nearer.

"Not now," said the girl. "I—I cannot bear it."

"Will you think of me—will you not give me one word? Can I not hope?"

"I am f—" her voice faltered. The word died away in her throat. She bit her lip. "For France," she said bravely.

"Don't!" said Macartney, pleadingly. "Don't leave me without a word! Only one!"

The vice-admiral had turned and was coming toward the gangway. In another moment he would be upon them. She did not want to do it, but in spite of herself the words trembled on her lips.

"Adieu," she forced herself to whisper.

"Not that!" said Macartney.

"Come, my child," said the vice-admiral, taking her tenderly by the hand. "Adieu, Monsieur le Chevalier," he said, extending his hand to Macartney.

"Adieu, Monsieur le Amiral."

Louise extended her hand to him. He caught it, bent low over it, kissed it. Outwardly it was a formal pressure, actually through his lips passed all the feelings of his heart.

"Mademoiselle," he said softly. "For pity's sake, a word, only a word!"

"Au revoir," murmured the girl.

Macartney drew back.

"Thank you for that," he said softly.

Escorted by her grandfather, Louise descended the ladder and took her place in the boat.

"Shove off," cried the first lieutenant. "Out oars! Give way! Handsomely!"

As the cutter swung clear of the side of the ship, a long lance of light leaped out from a gun forward, followed by a great burst of smoke and the report of a discharge. One shot succeeded another until the full number of a vice-admiral's salute had been fired. The frigate was shrouded in smoke. The marquis stood up in the cutter, hat in hand, while the cheers of the men came faintly to him through the commotion.

Louise, too proud to seek refuge in that womanly vent for emotion, tears, stared eagerly back toward the ship with brimming eyes; and Macartney, standing motionless in the open gangway, the sunlight flashing on his brilliant uniform, gazed eagerly after the little boat that carried his heart away to the distant shore.

"Gentlemen," Napoleon said at last, "is all ready?"

There was a strange, unusual dignity about him; the pain of a great bereavement mingled with the exaltation of a great passion.

CHAPTER XIV

THE FRANCE OF IDEAS AND ITS MASTER

MAY time in Southern France; land of the minstrel and of the troubadour; land of love and romance; land of birds and of flowers. Sunshine and morning upon the heaving tide that washes grim-walled, cannon-circled, battle scarred Toulon. Again great ships rise and fall on the swelling seas.

Five years have elapsed since a nation killed a king, struck down privileges, and sent aristocracy of birth reeling from its pedestal that aristocracy of talent might rise to the point of vantage. That Republic which kingdoms mocked and legions struck seemed more of an assured fact to-day. The poor, fatuous Regent is about to assume the royal title since the little lad, most pitiful of children in history, whom men have fondly styled Louis XVII., King by the grace of God, is fast sinking into madness and death beneath the inconceivable treatment meted out to him by the cruel, merciless Convention's order.

But nobody minds what the Comte de Provence, the Regent, does, or does not; what he assumes or what he refuses. He and Marquis de Vaudémont and the kind, in the presence of rapidly enlarging Republican France, stand dazed and futile before the steady advance of those ideas which they are so hopelessly inadequate either to understand or to assimilate. They have seen their plans fail, their hopes diminish, their dreams vanish. Their visions of the future are but baseless fabrics after all. Nothing is left them but a resignation they will not experience, an acquiescence in the grim realities of the present, which they cannot give.

There is something in this Republic then, which they have failed to apprehend. Madame Roland, mocking liberty, has gone; Danton, with his audacity, has gone; Robespierre, the "seagreen incorruptible," has gone; Marat, "friend of the people," has gone. These all made their exit by the very same way of the king, the way of the queen, the way of nobility—a via dolorosa indeed, and as such have ever been, royal road. Yet the Republic remains. It has outlived them all. Will it survive everything? Is there nothing that can take the government out of the hands of the people, once they have grasped it? Democracy has triumphed for five years. Will it triumph to the end—in France?

What are the present conditions? The Directory is there, the Convention is there, the guillotine, chief instrument of deliverance, is there. The new Calendar is still unchanged. Abolished God has not been re-established by legislative enactment. The jargon of affection with which it was thought necessary to ring out the old and ring in the new, still remains, though already falling into some disuse. "Monsieur" almost stands on an equal footing with "Citoyen." Now "Madame" and "Mademoiselle" are coming back. Men are beginning to be dissatisfied.

For one thing is still the same as was in the days when Majesty, and not the people ruled. Men must work while women weep; the world so runs away whether king or commoner is supreme in the land. The universal panacea for all human ills is not found, after all, in the words, "Liberté, Egalité, Fraternité," be they never so loudly proclaimed.

Thoughtful men have come to realize that the destiny of France is in the hands of a certain little captain whom we met in Toulon. Men are glad of it too, for men love the little captain. And the question of the hour is, "What will he do with France—with us, indeed?"

In command of the never-to-be-forgotten army of Italy, the little captain has recently completed the most marvelous military campaign in all history. There are no more worlds to conquer beyond the Alps and the Apennines, and he starts to-day, the 19th of May 1798, with the very flower of the French in his train for Egypt. He will strike England in that treasure-house of the ages, India and the Orient. He will bring the world of the East under his sway as well as the world of the West.

The march of ideas must go on even against the sun! In his own words, "The genius of liberty which has made the Republic the arbitress of Europe, declares that she shall be so to the most remote seas and nations."

And there in the brightness of the spring morning he stands upon the quay where the hapless old met, and young, the matrons and maidens, the children of Toulon, had fallen under the murdering hands of the sansculottes, himself energetically, wrathfully, but vainly protesting, five years before.

A small, a slender figure. If size were a criterion he would be lost amid the brilliant staff which surrounds him. He is pale and emaciated. His long chestnut hair falls to his shoulders under his gorgeously laced and feathered chapeau. The brilliancy of his uniform would attract attention were it worn by a lesser man, but one thinks of nothing in his presence but his face, thin, well-cut, stamped with the pride and the genius of a greater than Cæsar. Had he more flesh, were he not so thin, not to say gaunt, he were as handsome as a Greek god.

Not Jove himself possessed a more majestic brow, a firmer jaw, a more massive head; not the eagle a clearer, keener, colder eye—the gray-blue eye of the masters of men! Antinous himself had not more beautiful features. The one blemish in his appearance was in his complexion, which was slightly disfigured by faint traces of the ravages of an odious and disgusting disease—the itch. And it was this sickness which kept him thin and fragile, and gave the impression of poor health that he presented. At the siege of Toulon, a man suffering that dread malady had been killed before him, and his blood, deluging the little captain, had given him the loathsome disease, which the skill of physicians had not been able, as yet, entirely to eradicate from his system.

But those who judged him physically from his appearance were sadly mistaken in their estimate of his powers. In reality the man's frame was of iron—like his will. Indeed, nature had been kind to him. In addition to all of these attributes of ambition and command, she had given him that last completing touch, without which greatness cannot be, and which, in default of a better name, men call magnetism.

The young general, for he was not yet twenty-nine years of age, stood perfectly quiet on the quay at the head of the steps to the landing, yet there was something in the very atmosphere that surrounded him that evoked admiration and caused it to burst spontaneously into acclaim.

"Gentlemen," he said at last, "is all ready?"

He threw one swift glance about him, sweeping the crowd as he turned his head, and every man in the ranks behind him immediately felt that he had received a personal inspection, which had searched out even the thoughts of his heart. He looked up toward the balconied window of one of the buildings overlooking the harbor. His keen glance detected there, among many others, a woman. By her beauty and her charm she was no unfitting mate for this Olympian. He lifted his hat, threw back his head and smiled at her. His smile was as sweet as his face was strong. And Josephine bowed her head upon the window-sill and burst into tears. She was not alone in that. There were many women who wept as they gazed upon the cheering crowd. For most of them fate had in reserve the bitter fortune of the bereft. For of all the vast multitude but few, save the little general, ever came back from that ill-fated expedition.

"Let us embark, messieurs," said the little captain, descending the stairs toward the barge awaiting him, which after he entered it, immediately pulled away from the quay toward the French flagship L'Orient.

As he mounted her towering sides, the yards were manned, the cannon of her batteries thundered forth an imperial salute to the captain of the armies of the Republic.

Presently, the boats were run up to the davits, signals were broken out at the masthead of L'Orient; capstans were manned, hundreds of brawny sailors heaved upon the straining cables, sails were dropped from the ponderous yard-arms, and slowly the vast armada of thirteen great ships-of-the-line besides numbers of frigates, corvettes, brigs, gunboats and cutters, and hundreds of transports crowded with troops got under way. Slowly they sailed down the harbor past Fort Malbosquet, past promontory L'Eguillette, where the general-in-chief had first given assurance to the world that he was a man and a soldier; passed through the outer road, past Cape Brun and past the rocky promontory of Cape Caronné out into the blue Mediterranean, whose farther waters, beating on ancient shores, had been cut by Alexander's keels; whose waves had washed the streaks of Cleopatra's boats, or buffeted the bows of the galleys of Antony and the young Octavius. As of old, once more they upbore Cæsar and his fortunes!

And somewhere, beneath the distant horizon, cruised the squadron of Horatio Nelson.

CHAPTER XV

"FOR YOU AND FRANCE"

THROUGHOUT the teeming years crowded with such events as have been rarely compressed within a similar period of time, Macartney had borne a stirring part. He, in his staunch frigate, had made a name and a reputation for himself than which, among the lesser lights of that brilliant epoch, there were none higher.

The Inconstant had harried the Mediterranean and swept the narrow seas. Prize after prize had been taken and sent in, some of them of great value, and the account with the Admiralty Commissioners, to Macartney's credit in prize money, was a constantly increasing one. He never touched a penny of it, and it amounted at the opening of the year 1798 to the enormous sum, to him, of thirty thousand pounds.

The temper of the man had materially changed. He had before been a gay, careless, insouciant Irishman. He was become a cool, determined, persistent and ambitious man. He ruled his crews with an iron hand. There was no more efficient body of men on any ship in the king's service than those he commanded. In spite of his stern and rigorous domination of them, the officers and man adored him. In the first place, he was a brilliant success. As has been noted, the record of the Inconstant for prize money was greater than that of any ship in the service. In the second place, he was as brave as a lion, and if there is any quality in a commander that appeals to a subordinate, especially a sailor, it is that of courage. The man's daring was unbounded. In the third place, he was a seaman par excellence, in a day which produced a body of captains to which there is no parallel save in the American sea kings of 1812-15.

Nor had the career of the Inconstant been entirely taken up with the capture of prizes alone. She was as ready for a fight—in that at least the Irishman had not altered with the passing years!—as she was for a chase. In five years, fortune had vouchsafed her four opportunities for distinction.

She had cut out with her own boats from the Great Roads at Toulon a heavily-armed sloop-of-war. She had next captured a man-of-war brig and a heavy corvette. Macartney's brilliant seamanship had enabled him to separate the two ships, strike them alternately, and finally bring them both to a surrender. His third exploit was the capture of La Dame Blanche, a frigate of force slightly less than his own, although a practical match for the Inconstant, after a half hour of brilliant fighting.

His last and greatest achievement had been a stand-up, old-fashioned fight, yard-arm to yard-arm, with a heavily-matched French raze, La Quatorze Juillet, of fifty guns. The raze had been totally dismantled, half of her people killed and wounded, her guns dismounted, her hull riddled like a sieve, before she surrendered herself to her smaller antagonist. The Inconstant herself was not in much better condition. The defence of the other ship had been desperate, and her heavy guns had worked fearful havoc upon the frigate. Macartney had been seriously wounded toward the close of the action.

The two vessels were patched up somehow, and when the frigate limped into Portsmouth harbor under a jury foremast, dragging after her the sinking hull of the raze, England rang with the splendid exploit. There had been a baronetcy in one of the branches of the Macartney family, a creation by James II. when he was in Ireland, which had lapsed, and King George III. was graciously pleased to revive it for the benefit of the captor of La Quatorze Juillet.

For this Macartney was offered a ship-of-the-line, with a promise of a rear-admiral's flag at the next promotion, but he refused it. Indeed, he had been permitted to fly a commodore's broad pennant for a year. He would wait until he got a rear-admiral's flag before giving up his invaluable and beloved frigate, which was docked and thoroughly repaired for further service. And there was a reason other than the success he had won in her that made him cling to his ship.

For five years he had been pursuing an end with a singleness of purpose, a persistence astonishing to Nelson and those who had known him in years before. He was the very antipodes of the name of his frigate. Such constancy of devotion he had not dreamed himself capable of, for before his eyes daily throughout the period that had elapsed had been the picture of a woman. Warm in his heart, he had her lovely face as he saw it that morning when she said good-bye to him at the gangway of the ship.

Responsive to the legend beneath his coat-of-arms, "J'Espere," his heart beat with hope. He loved her as he loved the light of heaven; he loved her as he loved the heaving sea; he loved her as he had never loved home, nor country, nor friends. He loved her as he had never loved man or woman. She had hallowed his ship by her presence. Until he became an admiral he would never leave it. The silent cabin where she had dwelt spoke to him of her. The decks he had trod had been pressed by her foot, in the shadow cast by the towering pyramids of canvas she had stood and marked the rush of water sparkling alongside.

For her the guns had thundered. For her the wind had sung its songs through the tracery of rigging and of spar. Unlike every other captain in the service, he had abandoned his gig, and made the cutter, which had brought her to and carried her from the ship, his own boat on all occasions. When he captured a prize it was for her. When he struck mightily upon the enemy it was for her. When he suffered from the wound which had stricken him down in the moment of his greatest victory, it was for her. When the king's sword had been laid upon his shoulders, the thrill of pride which filled his heart was for her. Everything that tended to bring him the material things of life, to give him honor and distinction, to add to his fame, to increase his station, was for her—only for her.

There was little that was tangible upon which he could build his hopes, however. He heard of the marquis but infrequently. The old man was too great a personage to be entirely unnoticed by the world. Like most of the exiles, he journeyed from land to land, from court to court, in the interests of his master. Once in London Macartney had met him at the king's drawing-room. The marquis had received the young man kindly. Was he not a Chevalier of the Order of St. Louis, a brother in arms and devotion as it were, for the act of the vice-admiral in investing him with the Cross of that Order had, of course, been immediately confirmed by the proper authorities. And had not Macartney been a friend in need? The old marquis did not forget his friends.

From him Macartney had learned something of the family Honoré was a lieutenant in the Austrian army, which had fought so bravely, but so unsuccessfully, against General Bonaparte in Italy. The comtesse was still unmarried.

"She has not lacked suitors, Monsieur le Chevalier," said the old man.

"I can well credit that, my lord," said the young man gravely.

"To all of them she turns a deaf ear. She has but one answer—"

"I am for France," softly quoted the Irishman.

"Yes, monsieur, for France. Alas, my poor country! Who would think it! The restoration of the king seems farther off than ever. The boy king will die without ever coming to his throne. They murder him there in Paris, the slaves, the cowards! I question, sometimes, even whether he who will be Louis XVIII will ever—but no, there is a God in heaven, monsieur. The right will have its way."

"God send it may be so," answered Macartney. "Will you take a message from me to the comtesse?"

"What message, monsieur?" asked the old man suspiciously.

"The same, my lord, that I gave her on the ship," answered Macartney boldly. "The same that you refused to allow me to hope I should ever receive a favorable answer to, but for which I live, nevertheless. I love her, my lord. I have not forgotten her, nor ever shall. I have served my king, and incidentally yours, to some purpose, monsieur, and if I live I shall do more. It is all to make myself worthy of her."

"You will have to rise and do much," said the marquis proudly, "to merit to stand by the side of a de Vaudémont."

"Give me leave, my lord. Were she a peasant girl and I a king, I would strive just as I do now for name and fame and riches to be worthy of her. For the rest, a gentleman is a gentleman, the world over. There may be differences in station, but the degree is the same."

"Upon my word," said the marquis, touched in spite of himself, "you have the spirit of a brave man, mon chevalier. I do not bid you hope. My decision is not changed, but such constancy merits some reward. I shall take your message, sir, as you have spoken it."

"And should the comtesse marry—"

"That is as it pleases the comtesse herself," answered the marquis. "'Tis not the custom in France, but I have refused to put constraint upon her in that matter."

"Then when peace comes may I—"

"I can give you no encouragement, no permission, monsieur. Even were circumstances other than they are, I would fain not have her wed an Englishman. But of all Englishmen that I have met I still say that I prefer you."

"And I am an Irishman," said Macartney smiling.

"Yes," answered the marquis, "perhaps that is why I feel so."

Macartney had written to the woman he loved whenever occasion served, which, of course, was very infrequently, and whenever he could get her address, which was more infrequently still. Once in a long while he had received a brief acknowledgment, a little conventional note, written as if under the pressure of a powerful appeal, and in spite of the warnings of conscience. These letters breathed prayers for his welfare, carried a thanksgiving to him for his thought of her. They were more precious than rubies to him.

Once, after the capture of Le Quatorze Juillet, for which he had been given his baronetcy, he sent her the tricolor which he had hauled down when he had beaten the great ship to a standstill. It had been drabbed in the blood of brave men as it had lain upon the gory deck. Macartney had folded it up, with a copy of the Gazette giving an account of his action and stating the rewards he had received, across which he had written, in his bold, flowing hand, four words; and he had sent it to her by a special messenger, who was charged to find her if he hunted all over Europe, and spent a fortune in the pursuit.

Death is Swallowed up in Victory

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON, BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS*

Elisha's Last Day with Elijah

WE can imagine the prophet Elisha writing some such a narrative as this on the evening of the day when his master was taken from him:

I am lonely beyond words to express. Eight years ago, Elijah found me in my father's field ploughing, and informed me that I was to be his successor in the prophetic office. He did it by throwing his sheepskin mantle over my shoulders. After a brief farewell to my parents and neighbors, I joined him, and have remained with him unto this day. And now one has been taken, and the other left! Let me recall the incidents of this day.

For a week I had noticed that my master has seemed unusually thoughtful and lost to things about him. He must have had some message from God that his days on earth were few. Others beside myself felt this change in him. The young students in the school of the prophets remarked upon it, and they even said to me: "Knowest thou that the Lord will take away thy master from thy head to-day?" And so I kept closer to him than usual. He told me that he should go to Bethel, twenty-six miles away, and suggested—perhaps to test me—that I should remain in Gilgal. But I answered him, "As the Lord liveth, and as thy soul liveth, I will not leave thee." At Jericho and again at the Jordan, my master tested me in the same way, but I followed him the closer, feeling that his departure was at hand. Fifty of the students have told me since my return this evening that they stood together on the mountain side watching on our way, for they felt sure some marvelous thing was about to happen. When we reached the Jordan, and my master would cross over, he took his mantle, and rolled it, and struck the waters, and immediately they were rolled back, and together we crossed in a dry path. And then we began to ascend the mountain in front of us, Mount Nebo.

As we went, I recalled how the Lord had called Moses to the top of that very mountain to die, but I said nothing to my master. I was sure from the grand solemnity of his face, that the Lord had also spoken to him to come up hither. I was convinced of it when he said to me: "Ask what I shall do for thee before I be taken away from thee." I replied to him out of the deepest recesses of my heart: "I pray thee, let a double portion of thy spirit be upon me." His reply made me all the more determined to remain close beside him to the end, for he said, "If thou see me when I am taken from thee, it shall be so unto thee, but if not, it shall not be so." I did not ask that a double portion of God's Spirit upon Elijah should be given me, but that I as his pupil should have twice as much wisdom as a pupil usually receives from his teacher.

Suddenly, as we walked and talked, a fiery cloud swept down between us and parted us, and then I saw the cloud arise, and my master rode upon it, and was borne upward out of my sight. I cried out: "My father, my father, thou hast been as chariots and horsemen to thy country!" In grief I rent my clothes. In his going his mantle dropped to the ground. I picked it up, feeling that it was indeed my very own, and a surety that I should be helped of the Lord to do the works that my master had done. I turned to recross the Jordan. I struck the waters as my master had done, and a dry path appeared on which I crossed over, and came back to Jericho. Upon my return I was met by the fifty young students, who bowed themselves before me, promising me the allegiance they had given Elijah.

And now I am alone, a sense of loss is deep down in my heart, but I will not let my powers be wasted in grief. The greatest honor I can do to the memory of my master is to carry forward the work begun by him. The Lord God himself has taken his hands from it, and placed my hands upon it.

Illustration and Application

I. How much should we think about death? Death and Beyond are the natural themes this story suggests. There have been countries, ancient Egypt, for instance, where death has had more than its rightful share of thought. There the chief occupation of a king was to build himself an imperishable tomb, in which his imperishable mummy should at last be housed. In our time and land, we believe it is better to be remembered for the good we have done than to be mummified; better to build a Christian home of joy than a pyramid of pride. In former centuries, even Christians gave the future world more than its share of songs and sermons, and worked chiefly to "save a soul in heaven." Now we are learning, what the prophets taught long ago, that God seeks to save the whole man and the whole community here and now, in which case heaven is assured in God's own good time. There is a community of Trappist monks, who, like all other monks of their Order, live in complete silence. There is, however, one exception to this rule. When they pass one another, they are permitted to say, "Memento mori," "Remember death." But we have surely gone to the opposite extreme in these days, when neither sinner nor saint commonly desires a preacher at his death-bed. Most people think little, and say less, about heaven, and put hell out of thought, as if by some edict, Christ's awful words about it, had been revised away. In written examinations of youth above twelve years of age, that the writer secured in a dozen representative Sunday Schools of churches, not missions, a few years ago, he found only a minority able to write out a verse on heaven, and hardly a tenth able to quote any word of God in regard to hell. We ought to think much—though not too much—of death and the beyond.

The civilized world is filled with wonder to see how indifferent to death are the Japanese. Even for soldiers this quality loses its advantages when it leads a whole regiment to choose death rather than a surrender that would give them future opportunity to serve their country, if only by eating a part of the enemy's food, and diverting a portion of his troops for guards. We explain the indifference of the Japanese to death by saying "They are fatalists." But should not faith make us face death as bravely?

Let us not, in any case, so trample upon the words of Christ as to count it a matter of no moment when death summons us to the judgment bar of God, whether we have lived in loyalty to Christ or in disobedience to his wise laws. "It is appointed unto men once to die, but after this the judgment." And in that supreme court we are to be "judged according to the deeds done in the body, whether they be good or bad."

After the joys of earth,
After its songs and mirth,
After its hours of light,
After its dreams so bright—What then?

Let us look, as on contrasting pictures, on two death-beds: In a scantily furnished chamber lies an aged Scotch minister, with thin gray hair and wrinkled skin. But his brow is high and broad, his deep-set eyes are bright and piercing; a smile plays round his lips; and though feeble and dying, he looks calm and happy. "Do you think yourself dying, dear sir?" "Really, friend, I care not whether I am or not; for if I die, I shall be with God; if I live he will be with me." Now let us step into yonder mansion. Entering a richly-furnished chamber, we find a dignified personage, enfolded in warm robes, and seated in a large, easy-chair. He, too, is feeble and dying; but the light in his eyes is unsteady, and he looks like a man ill at ease with himself. "Mr. Gibbon, how does the world appear to you now?" The eloquent historian of the Roman Empire—for he it is—closes his eyes a moment, then opens them again, and with a deep sigh, replies: "All things are fleeting. When I look back, I see they have been fleeting; when I look forward, all is dark and doubtful!"

II. What nature intimates of immortality. There are some "bright gleams of everlastingness" even in nature, that Dr. Joseph Cook used to marshal in his lecture, "Does death end all?" It discussed the proposition whether the relation of the soul to the body was that of the harmony to the harp, or of the harper to the harp? The grip of the lecture was in showing that it is life that weaves us, and all things that live, into constant forms. He went from bones to muscle, from muscles to veins, from veins to nerves, from nerves to nervous influence, and then, back of all these forms, to the something that weaves us. Two or more of the more subtle forms may be invisible, yet they are seen by the lens of cause and effect—actually discovered by their effects, life and God. Then he said, "I have shown you the moon and stars, now behold the sun!" and he held up the Bible before the audience, which greeted it with applause.

III. What the Bible Says of Heaven and the Way to it. The best way to be ready to die is intimated in the Golden Text, which carries us back to Enoch, who "walked with God, and he was not: for God took him." Dr. Campbell Morgan tells of a little child who went home from Sunday School, and the mother said: "Tell me what you learned at school." And she said: "Don't you know, mother, we have been hearing about a man who used to go for walk with God. His name was Enoch. He used to go for walk with God. And, mother, one day they went for an extra long walk, and they walked on and on, until God said to Enoch, 'You are a long way from home; you had better come in and stay.' And he went." Death will be no more a terror to us than to Enoch and Elijah, if, like them, we have formed the habit of "going for walks with God." "The Emperor of China is never said to die. The 'Monarch of Endless Years,' only 'leaves this world to become immortal and, 'mounted on a dragon, he departs to the ethereal regions.'" Let us not fall behind the heathen in speaking of death, and when a Christian, victor in a life-long war with temptation, has calmly vanquished the "last enemy," say, as we were infidels, "All is over," and talk of the "deceased" and "the late Mr. Smith." How much better to adopt as the Golden Text of every Christian's funeral, "He was not; for God took him."

An old artist ninety years of age is dying. His masterpiece has been the "Valley of Shadows," in which midnight darkness was wonderfully brought out upon the canvas. As he came near to the end of his life's journey, he called his servant to his side and said, "Bring me my masterpiece and my brush and my paints, for as I come near to the valley, I find I have made a mistake. It is flooded with glory, and must change the picture." It is a valley of shadows, it is true, but shadows are caused by the light, and since He walks with us through the vale, there can be no darkness about us, nor can there be any thing to make us afraid.

A cultured woman just entered into new and beautiful home, was slowly dying of a dreaded disease. "You have every thing to live for," said a visitor. "I have everything to die for," she answered with smile of peace.

Thirty missionaries were upon the steamer Sobraon, sailing from China to England. Suddenly, in the night, all were awakened by the crash of the steamer upon a hidden reef. As the missionaries hurriedly dressed, expecting death was near, one said to another with a firm voice and a happy face: "I think we are going to have the privilege at last of seeing the King." All escaped, but the had learned what it was to face death and see God. One of the Scottish martyrs standing on the ladder from which the were to throw him off, assured the weeping spectators that he had never gone up to his pulpit to preach with so little fear as he had mounted that ladder to die—to him it was perch from which his spirit, wearied of world full of sin and sorrows, was spreading out its joyful wings for the flight to heaven. Another, addressing his weeping mother and sisters, who had entered his cell for last visit on the morning of his execution said, "Let us be glad and rejoice, for the marriage of the Lamb is come, and his wife hath made herself ready. Could I have ever thought that the fear of suffering and death could be so taken from me. Lord! he exclaimed, "Thou hast brought me within two hours of eternity, and this is no matter of terror to me, more than if I rose to go to lie down on a bed of roses; now that I am so near the end of time, I desire to bless the Lord; death is to me as a bed to the weary. Yonder," he remarked on hearing the drums beat for his execution "yonder is my welcome call to the marriage. The Bridegroom is coming. I am ready!"

In the dying words of a Christian woman of New York "O think! to step on shore, and that shore heaven! To clasp a hand, and find it God's! To breathe a new air, and find it celestial! To feel invigorated, and know it to be immortality!" In the words of Dr. Maltbie Babcock:

Why be afraid of death, as though your life were breath? Death but anoints your eyes with clay. O glad surprise! Why should you be forlorn? Death only husks the corn; Why should you fear to meet the thrasher of the wheat? Is sleep a thing to dread? Yet sleeping you are dead Till you awake and rise, here, or beyond the skies. Why should it be a wrench to leave your wooden bench? Why not with happy shout run home when school is out? "The dear ones left behind!" O foolish one, and blind, A day, and you will meet; a night, and you will greet! This is the death of death, to breathe away a breath And know the end of strife, and taste the deathless life, And joy without a fear, and smile without a tear, And work, nor care to rest, and find the last the best.

IV. Heavenly recognition. We cannot well separate Elijah ascending to heaven from the sequel in Matthew 17. Elijah coming back from heaven after eight centuries, still holding his identity, a pledge of the heavenly recognition of friends. Why should any one who believes in immortality doubt heavenly recognition? To forget each other would be to subtract memory from mind, which is so important a part of it that the Greeks named the mind itself from the word for memory. The sweet story is worth repeating of the old Scotch preacher, whose aged wife said, "Robbie, Robbie, dost thee think we'll know each other in heaven?" to which he answered gently but quaintly, "Wife, wife, dost thee think we'll be greater fules there than here?"

IN THE SHADE OF THE VINE

BY MARGARET E SANGSTER

Mrs. Goelet's Jewels

THE first thought of most of us on reading, the other day, that Mrs. Ogden Goelet, of New York, had found the jewels she thought she had lost, was one of thankfulness that we had no great casket of gems to bother us. Worth two hundred thousand dollars, these girdles and tiaras and rings and bracelets and brooches of pearls and diamonds and rubies and emeralds and other splendid jewels, were supposed by their owner to have been carried, with other property, to her summer home at Newport. Missed there, the whole machinery of an acute and resourceful force of detectives was set in motion that they might be found. Clue after clue ended in a blind trail. After some weary weeks of hope deferred, it occurred to an astute adviser, that possibly, just possibly, the lady might be mistaken, that she might have left her jewel-box at home, and that it might be reposing in a safe, in her New York house. Presto! The searchers searched there, and sure enough, Madame's gaw-gaws were where she had put them, and had never been stolen at all.

Such a lapse of memory might happen to any of us. We have no amazing store of jewels; but, dear lady, three days ago, you mislaid your gold thimble, that your Aunt Fanny gave you when she came to visit you last Christmas. You insisted that you had the thimble when you were embroidering the baby's frock, and that you left it in your work-basket, whence somebody had taken it away. The impression on your mind was so very strong that it could not be shaken, nor was it, until you discovered the thimble yesterday, when you were not looking for it, in your top bureau drawer, where you had dropped it yourself.

Four weeks ago, Mrs. Jenny Brown, of Main Street, never mind where, hung up a little silk bag containing her gloves, her card-case, a parcel she had bought in a Broadway shop, and a memorandum, she avers, in her closet. It is not there. Repeated hunts for it have failed to bring to light the black silk bag. Mr. Brown thinks she must have left it on the train. Alfred Brown is sure she forgot it at his Aunt Marie's. Emily Brown fancies the Italian woman who comes around with the organ-grinder saw it lying on the porch, and carried it away under her jacket. Each member of the household has a different theory, and grandmother is quietly making another bag to replace the lost one. Probably it will presently be found in some unlikely corner of the house, where Mrs. Brown, tired and absent-minded, laid it down when she came home. There are people who do not pull out their sofas when rooms are swept, and odd things tumble down behind sofas now and then.

The moral of this part is, not to be too certain about anything. We are all fallible, and we may be mistaken, when we are most firmly convinced in our own minds.

But there is also

MORAL NUMBER TWO

Blessed are people in moderate circumstances. Blessed are people who have a watch, and a wedding-ring, a brooch or two, and nothing else to worry about. Who wants dog-collars, and tiaras, and stomachers, and the like? A pretty woman is no prettier for all the jewelry that blazes in Vanity Fair. An ugly woman has her ugliness emphasized when she decks herself with precious stones, and rivals the sun in her aggressive adiance. When you think of it, the barbaric splendor of our present-day rich women is not much finer in its essence than the display made by her of the South Seas, who strings sea-shells for her ornaments, or her of the Western tepee, who is most satisfied when her beads are most variegated. Blessed are the poor whom the midnight prowler never molests. Blessed are the women who may invite their friends to visit them, and include no sinister gentleman, with a policeman's shield under his dress clothes, among the guests.

If we are not extremely wealthy, never mind. Into our plain domicile never thief intrudes. Our jewels, like Cornelia's of old, are our children. Our safes contain nothing of any monetary value, but we do not lose sleep o' nights because we are afraid somebody will rifle them. Blessed be honest poverty after all!

When a Man's Single

Explain it as you may, when a man's single, he has not quite the dignity of the man who is married. In these days the path of the bachelor is made very easy to the feet. If he possess the means, he may live in an apartment and be surrounded by all the comforts of a home; well-trained servants will attend to his meals and his linen, and like the rich man in the parable, he may fare sumptuously every day. Yet, this sort of living seems selfish, and the man who deliberately chooses it, in preference to household life, with a wife to whom he may be devoted and in due time children to grow up and carry on his name, may in future regret his decision. For old age is very lonely when a man's single.

WONDERFUL LOVE

Wonderful love hath our Father above
Who cares for His children in darkness and light,
Never a day but we're kept on our way
And the powers of evil are made to take flight.

Wonderful love hath our Saviour who stands
Pleading our cause at the throne, as we pray,
Showing the nail-prints that wounded His hands,
Keeping us safe through the sorrowful way.

A Filler of Chinks

"LUCY," said her mother, "is a filler of chinks."

The visiting friend looked up inquiringly. "By chinks," the mother explained, "I mean the little gaps and rifts and rents that nobody else notices, that never are observed when all goes well, that somebody suffers from if they are overlooked, and that make up a sum total of very humble service. Mildred is clever and Margaret is musical. Lucy has no extraordinary talent that I know of, but she is the comfort of our lives."

The friend thought it worth while to watch the quiet little Lucy, a girl so modest and unobtrusive that she was often rather overlooked. She found that Lucy was always doing what others left undone. The weather was very hot, the family was large, and people were coming and going constantly. One sultry afternoon when everybody was looking for a cool place, and one was in the hammock with a book, and another in the shadiest corner of the veranda with a pretence of knitting in her hands, Lucy had disappeared. She came in sight after awhile, with a glass pitcher of lemonade, and a tinkle of ice that was pleasant to hear, and when somebody asked where she had been, she answered, "I've been giving Betty a lift with the towels and napkins. There were dozens to iron, and the poor girl looks tired out. The heat in the kitchen reminded me that lemonade would be nice, so I made it for Betty, and then thought of you, out here, feeling the heat."

"You didn't feel it yourself, I suppose?" said her aunt Laura.

"No, I've been too busy, Auntie, and I really do not mind heat so very much."

"Grandmother grows harder to live with every day," complained one of the young people. "Nothing suits her, and she's so restless and uneasy, and so irritable. I hope when I am old, if I live to be eighty as she is, that I'll be a reasonable being. Most old people are so queer and crabbed."

No wonder that grandmother was restless. She had led an active life and been a personage, one whose advice had been asked and taken, one who had managed her own household, and had gone where she pleased and when she desired, without dictation from any one. Now she was an inmate of her son's house; her world was bounded by the four walls of her room. There were servants in the kitchen and new ways of doing almost everything, ways that seemed to her extravagant and wasteful. Among the people who were her son's friends she felt herself lonely and out of her sphere. She was discontented and cross and knew herself both, with a pang of conscience that smote her heart.

"I cannot imagine what more I could do for John's mother than I do," declared John's wife. "She has a large, sunny room, her own furniture, and nothing to do but fold her hands."

Little Lucy slipped silently away, not once, but often, in the morning, in the afternoon, and after a while in the twilight, to sit with her grandmother. The two had much in common.

Both were very simple-hearted and plain, caring for externals only, as they tended to convenience and comfort. Both were fond of outdoor life. Grandmother could not have a garden in the city, but Lucy managed to fill her window-boxes with geraniums and other vivid-colored plants. Lucy bought a canary, and hung its cage in the old lady's window, and whenever grandmother wanted to call on an old friend, the young girl managed to have an errand in the same part of town, so that she wanted to have company as she went out.

The days passed more easily for the lonely, elderly woman after Lucy, the filler of chinks, took her in her gentle care.

So it was everywhere. Lucy was not a genius, nor brilliant, nor very beautiful, but she was well beloved, for she was a filler of chinks.

Mont-Lawn as Others See It

The Editor of "The New York Observer"
Writes of a Visit to our Children's Home

IN a recent issue of The New York Observer, the Rev. John Bancroft Devins D.D., gives this very interesting account of a visit to Mont-Lawn:

It was hot in the city streets, as the editor of The Observer left them, with his traveling companion, and after a short ride along the banks of the most beautiful river in the world, reached Tarrytown. Here they were welcomed by Dr. and Mrs. Louis Klopsch, and crossed the river on a ferryboat to Nyack, where a carriage was waiting to carry the party two or three miles back to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home. On the way, Dr. Klopsch explained the origin of this agency in child-saving.

Ten years ago, when the industrial paralysis made idle a multitude of workmen, the impulses of the generous were stirred so deeply, that after all the necessary food had been supplied, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD found a balance of several thousand dollars in its treasury. The editors could not well return the money to the givers, and it was decided to send some of the children of the poor to the country for ten days—children, who, through lack of proper nourishment, had become emaciated, or who had been ill through the winter, and were now convalescent. From this beginning ten years ago, the number of children cared for has steadily increased, until to-day about two thousand children a year spend ten days each at Mont-Lawn.

But already we are in sight of the Administration Building, over which the American flag floats. The children are seen in the distance, playing on the lawn, swinging in the scups, exercising upon the gymnastic apparatus, or strolling about the grounds. The moment the carriage appears in sight, as if animated by one instinct, forgetting lawn and scups and seesaws and all else, the children rush forward to greet their friend and his friends from the city.

No city home could be more tidy or more pleasing in its appearance than are the dormitories and other buildings at Mont-Lawn. The cots are carefully dressed for the day, and the children are not expected to return to the rooms after they leave them in the morning, unless there is special need in a particular case. The children are there for fresh air, and this can be secured best by going out of doors when the weather is fair. Many of the beds have cards, indicating that the support of the children occupying a particular bed during the summer, is borne by a friend, or a Christian Endeavor Society, or a church which has become especially interested in this beautiful form of philanthropy. The expense for one of these cots for a year is $21. This enables the cot to be occupied by six or seven different children during the summer, the average expense being about $3 for each child for the visit of ten days.

The guests at Mont-Lawn are early risers, but they are also early retires. There are no electric lights in the buildings, and the bill for kerosene oil for the entire establishment is about $3 a year. The children go to bed when the chickens do, and arise when the birds begin to sing. Breakfast is served at 6 or 6:30—the early hour when a party of children is about to return to the city, which occurs every other day. Dinner is served at noon, and supper at 6 o'clock.

The institutional idea is absent, except in one or two particulars. When the bell rings for a meal, the children gather in front of the matron's room, and form in line, the boys in front. The bell strikes, and the boys step aside, still in line, sufficiently to let the girls pass between the lines and reach the dining tent first. When the children are seated, grace is sung.

Dinner is eaten with that relish which the child of the country never fails to have. Towards the end of the meal the letters are distributed. As Dr. Klopsch reads the name, the child comes and receives his letter or postal card.

Saturday is a special day at the Home, because it means not only the presence of Dr. Klopsch, but it is also "candy day," each child receiving a fine piece of candy at the mid-day meal. Nor are the teachers and caretakers forgotten in this distribution of the Saturday boxes. To show the nationality and the religious parentage of the children, Dr. Klopsch calls for all the Germans in the party of 250 to raise their hands. A goodly number acknowledge Emperor William as the former ruler of their parents. Then comes the call for Italian children, or those born of Italian parents; and the number, while not so large, show that Sunny Italy has lost a part of its population. When the call for Americans is given, nearly every hand goes up; for, whatever may have been the allegiance of the parents, every child will give his life to serve the President, and the flag that floats above the grounds.

"How many Jewish children are here to-day?" says Dr. Klopsch. No hand is raised for a moment, and then he adds: "If I were born a Jew, I should be proud of that fact." This assurance brings up perhaps a dozen hands.

"How many are Catholics?" And seemingly a quarter of the party admitted that they were. The rest claimed to be Protestants. Whether viewed as a national or a religious assembly, it is certainly cosmopolitan and representative.

After the meal, the children march back again to the main building and stop in front of the matron's office. The bell rings, and, helter-skelter, they go for the swings and games, or for a stroll about the grounds. After the teachers and guests have had their dinner, the bean game is played on the lawn. Dr. Klopsch goes to the veranda and shouts, "Now for the bean game!" No explanation is needed. Five hundred little feet chase one another down the hill and over the fence, in order to get a front place in the line on the knoll overlooking the lawn where the game is to be played. Dr. Klopsch takes twenty-five or thirty large white beans, and asks the children to count them as he throws them out on the closely mown lawn. "One!" "One!" comes back from two hundred and fifty throats. "Two!" "Two!" echoes back the refrain; and finally the beans are all distributed, and then comes the next and most exciting moment in the game. "One! Two! Three! Go!" And the children start for the beans scattered all over the lawn. There is no confusion, but there is a good deal of good-natured rivalry, as every bean returned to Dr. Klopsch means a penny for the finder. After all the beans have been found and the pennies distributed, the children return to their other forms of rest and recreation.

Happy the man who has a heart sufficiently large to develop and carry on a charitable project which benefits thousands of people. Thrice happy is he who can include in his sympathies, not one class only, but two. What shall be said of the size of the heart which includes five thousand orphans in India, and a Rescue Mission in the heart of the Bowery in New York, reaching a multitude whom Mr. Hadley, of the Water Street Mission, delights to call "the worthless class;" and in addition to these two great enterprises also provides ten days of supreme happiness for two thousand children a year in their summer home at Nyack-on-the-Hudson, which is aptly styled "The Children's Parspillway will cost $5,781,401. The Canal extends for 4.12 miles beyond Miraflores to La Boca, where the Panama Railroad has constructed a large wharf. A dredged channel 200 feet wide, will reach from this point 4.41 miles to the 6-fathom line in Panama Bay. The total cost of this section from lock to deep water is estimated at $12,427,971.

The total estimated cost of completing the Canal is as follows:

The total amount of excavation is 94,863,703 cubic yards, exclusive of the excavation for Bohio dam and the Gigante spillway.

The location of the Canal, as now decided, is about the same as proposed by the French Company, its total length, from 36 feet deep in the Atlantic to 36 feet deep the Pacific, is 49.09 miles. The time of transit required for a medium sized ship to pass through the Canal after its completion, is computed to be about 11 hours and 14 minutes.

The new company has excavated about 5,000,000 cubic yards, which, added to the old company's excavation of 72,000,000 cubic yards, make a total of 77,000,000. Much of this will be of no value now, on account of the radical changes of plan. That which will be of value is found to be 36,689,965 cubic yards.

The "Canal Strip" will be put in thorough sanitary condition, and shall have all the health appliances of modern civilization. Not over 15,000 laborers will be employed. These will operate with machines worked by steam or electric power, and will excavate 150,000 cubic yards per day. It may be thought advisable, in order to hasten the work, to employ night and day shifts. It has been suggested to furnish the labor from the United States, and a proposition is now awaiting the consideration of the Commission to utilize negroes from our Southern States. From ten to twenty thousand experienced laborers can be furnished from Alabama alone, at $1.10 to $1.75 per day. Opportunities for Gospel work among the laborers will be granted by the Commission. There is no doubt that a great evangelical field will soon be opened there.

There are also other proposals concerning labor, awaiting the decision of the Commission; among them being propositions from several Chinese companies. One of these companies offers to furnish immediately, from ten to sixty thousand Chinese laborers, at fifty to sixty cents per day, per head; all risks, transportation, sanitation and sustenance to be at the expense of the companies in the contract. This enterprising Mongolian further says these men will be brought from China on Chinese ships; Chinese doctors will be furnished, Chinese cooks employed; all food and clothing will be shipped from China; Chinese hospitals will be erected on the Isthmus, and if the laborers die, their bodies will be taken back to China for interment.

Mr. D. I. Murphy is secretary of the Isthmian Commission, and through him, assisted by an army of efficient helpers, many letters from all over the world, applying for mechanical, professional and clerical work, are received and answered daily. The tingle of big events is in the air in the Commission's office at Washington and the quiet that pervades the place impresses one with its importance. On the matter of Isthmian tolls, it is believed that a toll of $1 a vessel per ton net register would yield an income sufficient to pay the expenses of operation, and a return on invested capital besides; otherwise a tariff of 40 or 50 cents a ton would be sufficient.

Unexpected emergencies may arise to upset the plans of the financiers and engineers, and it is for this contingency that the Isthmian Commission is studying so carefully this gigantic undertaking; but the figures obtained from their forthcoming report and given above may be accepted as very fairly accurate.

ANNABEL LEE.

An Arithmetical Horse

A CABLE dispatch from Berlin to the New York Sun, tells of a remarkable horse named Hans, which is attracting much attention from German scientists. He is able to perform simple sums in arithmetic, giving the answers by stamping one of his feet on the ground. He can count up to a hundred, has an eye for colors, an ear for music, and can spell words of one syllable.

Prof. Moebius, director of the Zoological Museum in Berlin, who is one of Germany's highest zoological authorities, devotes a column to the horse to-day in the National Zeitung. He says that he asked the horse how many sevenths added to five-sevenths would make a whole number. The horse stamped his foot twice. Prof. Moebius judges that Hans possesses the capacity to distinguish clearly impressions received by the eyes and ears, and to keep them permanently in his memory and to express them exactly. It is stated that Hans will be produced before Emperor William, who is taking the greatest interest in the animal. This will be after Hans is examined by the Minister of Education and prominent experts.

Prof. Moebius lays special stress upon the fact that the achievements of the horse are undeniably real mental work, and not the result of mere training.

In the New York Fire Department there are several horses that have developed wonderful intelligence. They know the call of their particular station, and can count off the number of strokes as accurately as any of the firemen. If the right number is struck by the electric signal, they are instantly alert, whinneying and stamping, eager to start for the fire. If any other number is struck, their pricked-up ears immediately fall back and they resume the munching of their oats, or stand quietly in their stalls. The firemen are very proud of these intelligent animals, and the latter are really very efficient public servants, even if they have not been so highly trained as the arithmetical, musical and artistic equine wonder described by Prof. Moebius.

These horses stand in their clean, roomy stalls at the back of the engine-house, a slender chain being stretched across their stalls. When there is an alarm, an automatic arrangement drops these chains, and the horses run to their places in front of the engine and hose carriage, three being the signal for the former, and two for the latter. The horses always wear their head-stalls, and the remainder of their harness is suspended over their places. Just here comes in extraordinary equine intelligence. When those chains are simultaneously dropped, as they are sometimes, either to try the horses or for any other reason, the animals are alert in a moment; their ears prick up, eyes flash, and every muscle becomes tense with expectation; but not a foot do they stir until the bell is sounded, or the foreman calls to them to come. If he calls one at a time—Jim or Jack—only Jim or Jack starts, the others wait for bell or call; but if the call is for "all hands," and no name is mentioned, they all come forward and take their places. These horses are all graduates of a training school, where they are taught certain things that must be learned thoroughly before they can become fire-horses. The firemen are proud to tell of their intelligent horses, and the remarkable things they do.

DISCOVERING ONESELF LATE IN LIFE

By DR. O. S. MARDEN

Would'st fashion for thyself a seemly life? Then act as if thy life were just begun.—GOETHE.

THERE is no reason why a man of fifty cannot succeed, so I am just starting in business," recently declared a man whom the changing fortunes of politics had thrown out of office. A series of misfortunes had reduced him to a point where he was obliged to seek for manual labor; but his courage remained unbroken. He still determined, in spite of every adverse circumstance, to succeed in a new line.

All honor to the man, who, in middle life or even later, finding himself what the world calls a failure, resolves to develop new-found powers, or to cultivate those that were neglected in youth, and to make the most of the years of life that still remain to him. We admire the courage and enthusiasm of youth, but the courage and enthusiasm of middle age are much more worthy of our admiration, and not infrequently accomplish more. The enthusiasm and purpose of youth often wane; but the enthusiasm and purpose born in middle life remain steadfast to the end.

A great many men and women who do not discover their possibilities until late in life, make the mistake of thinking that they are too old to learn—too old to start in a new calling, or to attempt to improve or develop the new continent they have discovered within themselves. There is no cause for discouragement. There is no time to indulge in regrets. Every moment is rendered more precious in proportion to the lateness of your discovery. Others have succeeded in educating themselves, in doing distinguished work in various fields, who did not find out their real bent or possibilities until youth had passed. History and biography are full of such examples.

Andrew Johnson, the seventeenth President of the United States, did not know how to read or write until he had reached manhood. At the age of forty, Ulysses S. Grant was regarded as a failure. He had changed his occupation from that of tanner to soldier, and from soldier to real estate dealer, and in the latter calling found himself unable to support his family. The call of his country to arms in 1861, awakened him to the knowledge of himself, and the man who at forty was a failure, at forty-two was one of the greatest military commanders of the nineteenth century.

The late Samuel F. Miller, Justice of the United States Supreme Court, began life as clerk in a drug store. He afterward studied medicine and practiced that profession for eight years, but he had not found his true vocation. He began to experience a distaste for medicine, which deepened into positive aversion. He gave up his practice, studied law, and when past thirty was admitted to the bar. Within fifteen years he was appointed a judge of the Supreme Court.

More remarkable, however, is the case of that distinguished lawyer, the late Judge John Erskine, of Georgia. As a boy, Judge Erskine had a passion for the sea, and when only sixteen, ran away from his home in Ireland to join the crew of a sailing vessel. A short experience on this vessel completely cured him of the desire for a seafaring life. He returned home, finished his education, and then came to this country. Here he drifted from one occupation to another, until he had reached the mature age of forty-five. Only then, after seeking it for thirty years, did he discover his real vocation. He commenced to read law with such zeal and earnestness that he was soon admitted to the bar, and rose rapidly in his chosen profession. After the close of the Civil War he was appointed by President Johnson to the judgeship of the United States for the northern and southern districts of Georgia.

Instances of men and women who did not discover where their greatest ability lay until they had reached or passed middle age, are to be found in every profession and occupation. Amelia E. Barr did not know that she had talent as a writer, until after the death of her husband and three of her children, when necessity compelled her to make a living for herself and her remaining children. Years afterward, when she had won fame and fortune, Mrs. Barr wrote of that sad time of bereavement: "I thought all was over then, yet all was just beginning. It was the open door to a new life—a life full of comforts, and serene still." Mrs. Barr had passed fifty when she won her first success as a novelist.

Another distinguished author, Thomas Hardy, considered by some critics as the greatest living master of English fiction, did not discover his real bent until he was thirty years old. Architecture was his chosen profession, which he followed for about a dozen years. Then, in 1872, he wrote and published his novel, Under the Greenwood Tree. When the success of that book was assured, he gave up architecture and devoted himself with ardor to his true calling.

Rev. Russell H. Conwell had been a soldier, a journalist, and a lawyer, before he entered the ministry. He was thirty-five when he abandoned law for theology.

Herman Kohlsaat, who is better known to people in the Eastern States as a successful newspaper proprietor and editor, than as a restaurant-keeper, nevertheless won his first financial success in the catering business in Chicago. He was the owner of a number of the popular restaurants known as "Dairy Lunches," when he decided to go into the business of newspaper making. Kohlsaat was nearly forty when he bought a controlling interest in the Chicago Inter-Ocean. People ridiculed the idea of a restaurant-keeper turning editor, and were much amazed when, within two years, the new editor had made a success of what was a depreciated property when he took it in hand. The Chicago Record Herald, of which Mr. Kohlsaat is now owner and editor, bears splendid testimony to his ability as maker of a great newspaper.

It is never a question of what one might, could, would, or should have done in the dead past, but always of what he can do now, in the actual, living present. The parable of the laborers in the vineyard applies with special aptitude to those who discover themselves late in life. Those who came at the eleventh hour received as much as those who had worked during the entire day. The Master had decreed it so. No one is to blame for failing to discover the line of his greatest strength in youth. He only is to blame who, when he discovers it, instead of girding himself to begin anew the battle of life, weakly lays down his arms and cries, "It is too late; the battle is already lost!" The strongest and most successful characters are often tossed hither and thither on the waves of circumstances, buffeted by the winds of misfortune and strengthened by failure, before they do the special work they were sent into the world to do.

Look at John Bunyan, tinker, soldier, and itinerant preacher; without early advantages of any kind; with but the most meagre education, and only two books for his library—the Bible and Fox's Martyrs—writing his great allegory in Bedford jail, when he was well on toward middle life. What a loss the world would have suffered had he lost courage and declared that it was no use to attempt to enter new paths at his age. This poor,

It also shows how simple and durable is the heating outfit, how little space it occupies, how and where the radiators may be most conveniently placed in the rooms, and how the radiators may be arranged and decorated to harmonize with and enhance the home furnishings, however artistic.

Our model house, of Colonial architecture, is two stories high and basement, 40 feet long, 16 feet wide; all rooms are completely, modernly furnished and contain many suggestions for the home-builder. Visitors are made very welcome there.

By equipping your house with Steam or Water Warming, the cost of the outfit is added to the real, permanent value of the property. Our Boilers and Radiators cannot wear out, nor is it possible for them to rust or corrode—they outlast the building. They are therefore a permanent, dividend-paying investment, not an expense—for they annually yield dividends in comfort, in added healthfulness, in household cleanliness, in safety—and make the property easier to rent or to sell, if necessary.

Simple to put in OLD buildings—cottages to go-room buildings—without disturbance to building or occupants. State kind and size of building you wish to heat. Valuable information and booklet (free).

Prophets Separated

By MRS. M. BAXTER

WE all have a tendency to desire that we may see the result of our lives, and have the satisfaction that we have not lived in vain. But, more and more, as we see the unspeakable depth and breadth of the world's sin, and the little that is done to stem the torrent of iniquity, the more we are dissatisfied with ourselves, and inclined to think that we have lived in vain. But it is not for the workmen on a building to be responsible for the erection and completion of a building; that is the responsibility of the architect; they have only, each one, to do their part, and to leave the responsibility of the whole to him. Let us, too, trust the responsibility to God.

It must have been revealed to Elijah that God would take him by a whirlwind into heaven. Had he, like Enoch, faith that he should not see death? It is not so stated in Heb. 11: but the facts seem to warrant it. In any case he knew what was about to happen, and his one desire was to be alone. Elisha had faithfully followed him from the time of his call (1 Kings 19:19-21), and when Elijah said to him as they went from Gilgal, "Tarry here, I pray thee, for the Lord hath sent me to Bethel," he said unto him, "As the Lord liveth, and as thy soul liveth, I will not leave thee. So they went down to Bethel." Why must their journey necessarily lead to Bethel? It was there that his ancestor Jacob had seen the wondrous vision of the ladder, the communication between God and man; and in that vision a foreshadowing of Christ (John 1:51). It had been holy ground to Jacob; and on this ground so holy to the patriarch, Jeroboam had blasphemously placed the golden calf.

Elijah said to Elisha at Bethel, "Tarry here, I pray thee, for the Lord hath sent me to Jericho." But again the faithful follower knew what he had to do. It may have cost him much to withstand such a master, but he could have been no true follower of Elijah if he had not considered the known will of God more than any word from even such a man. And again he replied, "As the Lord liveth, and as thy soul liveth, I will not leave thee." Jericho was the city which had been rebuilt in disobedience (John 6:26; 1 Kings 16:34). Why must Elijah come just here? He must see that just in this place, where defiance of God had reached such a height, God had his witnesses, and was by no means dependent on the sole witness of Elijah. God could do everything quite independently of any of us. It is no matter of self-glorification if our gracious God is pleased to use us in any way; it is his deep condescension. He could do all by angels. But he seeks from among man a people ready to his hand, as our beloved Lord was ready to his hand, not planning and carrying out great things for him, but ready to do or not to do, with equal joy; not always the same service but just as he chooses, and when and where. This journey of Elijah's was a preparation for the testimony which Moses and Elijah bore to the coming sufferings of Christ on the Mount of Transfiguration.

The sons of the prophets at Jericho put Elisha to the same test, and he answered them as he had done those at Bethel, and Elijah had thus the opportunity of seeing that the man whom God had chosen to be prophet in his room, was not to be distracted nor turned aside from the path to which God had called him. This lesson to Elijah, which made him see his own comparative insignificance, was his true preparation for the immediate presence of God.

Again, and for the last time, Elijah said "Tarry here, I pray thee, for the Lord hath sent me to Jordan." But he met with the same answer. And they two went on. Here again were sons of the prophets; probably the prophet vocation may have received a great impetus from the victory of Jehovah on Mount Carmel. Here fifty of the sons of the prophets stood to view afar off; and they two stood by Jordan. And Elijah took his mantle, and wrapped it together, and smote the waters, and they were divided hither and thither, so that they two went over on dry ground.

despised, ignorant tinker, who was ridiculed by the Oxford and Cambridge scholars, most of whom, according to Green, the historian, refused even to listen to him, accomplished a work that the world will never let die. He made a name for himself that will endure as long as the English language.

"The Eternal Spirit," says E. Benjamin Andrews, "may mean you for a prophet, poet, or scientist." You can only work out the true pattern of your life by answering to the call whenever it comes to you. What matter though you be thirty, forty, fifty or even more; it is not for you to question, hesitate, or doubt. Listen to the voice within your own soul, and obey. Every day the call is coming to men and women at the ninth, tenth and eleventh hour, to go forth into some new field and work out the life pattern designed for them. Only a few days ago, a leading New York paper published the story of a policeman, who, at the age of forty-five, is studying for the ministry. The fact that he is married and has a family to support, does not in the least discourage him. His own version of how the call to a new life came to him is interesting.

"I was assigned to duty here [Yale University] nearly ten years ago," he said to a reporter, "and it did not take me long to find that the atmosphere of the campus was to my liking. It was very different from Oak Street or some of the neighborhoods in the city, where the policeman has eternally to be on the alert for this or that mischief, or even crime. After a certain time of night, it was a lonely vigil that I kept, and through the long summer vacations time hung heavily enough. Once, about two o'clock in the morning, when I was patrolling the High Street side of the campus, back of the library, I thought of what a lot of valuable time I had wasted, although I have always been a reader, and, in my own way, a student of matters that interested me. I said to myself that although I was earning a livelihood for myself and family, yet there was much more that could be done."

Since that time Mr. Wiser has been diligently studying for his chosen calling, and, if his duties as a policeman do not conflict, he hopes within a very short time to become a special student in the Yale Divinity School.

If you have been honest with yourself in the past; if you have done the best you could under the circumstances in which you were placed; if you have kept up as far as was possible a continual process of self-culture, the discovery of the line of your greatest strength in middle life should not discourage you. It should be matter for congratulation, rather than discouragement. It proves that your mind is still active and alert, that it is still moving along youthful lines. It shows that you are awake to your possibilities, and if to this mental alertness you add a large portion of hope, courage and energy, you can still weave the pattern of a complete life.

Heaven in the Bible*

VERY vague and indefinite are the descriptions of heaven found in the Bible. Probably it is impossible to give a description that in the flesh could understand. In revelation, John attempted it, but it is evident that he was obliged to employ figures and images to convey an idea of the place to the human mind. We cannot believe that the streets are really paved with gold, that the foundations of the walls are really jewels, or the gates actually of pearl. The vision John had, we must suppose to have been one of dazzling splendor, indescribable by human words, and he turned to the treasury of things most precious in mortal eyes, for metaphors that would express its glories. We are not, however, left without aid to a conception of heaven. There is enough told us, even in negation, to kindle the most ardent desire to attain admission there. We learn that there is no pain there, no hunger nor thirst, no sorrow, no weeping, no death. If these were eliminated from our lives here, how different they would be! To escape these, what could we not do? A life without them, even under present conditions, would approximate absolute felicity. To all these, must be added the culminating fact, that in heaven there is no sin. All the struggles against temptation, all the sorrow and suffering and remorse that sin brings into life here, will be absent from life there, and all the environment which promotes growth and knowledge and holiness, will surround the redeemed soul. How much it means to those who are leading spiritual lives here, and whose aspirations are for a closer walk with God, they alone know, and it is for such that heaven is reserved. We infer from all we are told by the inspired writers, that there is a continuity in life; that those who love God here and yearn for holiness, have their desires gratified there under infinitely more favorable conditions, while those who find their happiness here in fleshly pleasures and sensual indulgence, are self-excluded from heaven.

The tabernacle of God is with men.

*What the Bible Teaches About Heaven," of the Christian Endeavor Society, Epworth League and Baptist Young People's Union for St. 11, John 14: 1-3; Rev. 21: 1-8.

We cannot conceive of the heavenly life in its fullness, but the spiritual life is preparation for it. Margaret Gatty has a pretty little parable from nature on the subject. It is of a butterfly nearing the end of her life, asking a caterpillar to be the guardian of her eggs. She gave particular instructions on their being fed with dew and such food as she herself liked. The caterpillar undertook the task, but knew not where to get such food for the embryo butterflies. But to her surprise, the eggs when they came to life proved not to be butterflies, but caterpillars like herself, and she could feed them easily enough. After a time she too went into a cocoon and emerged a butterfly. Then she too fed on the delicate food that she had been so worried to provide for her charges, and understood the delights of butterfly life.

They shall be his people. His people beyond the grave, as they are his people here. The elements in the soul will be developed from those now existing. A remarkable picture is that of the frontispiece to a work by an eminent anatomist. It represents a skeleton of the human hand and arm. In dim light suggestion around it is a wing like that of a huge bird. It is intended to show how the limb might, without changing its shape, put forth new growths and become a wing. We know not what changes of form the glorified human being may undergo, but the spiritual qualities of that future life will be developments of the soul's present powers.

Neither sorrow nor crying. In a recent exhibition of pictures there was one of sweet significance. It was a widow kneeling by the side of a coffin in which were the remains of a beautiful child. The widow's face was swollen with weeping, and tears were still on her cheeks, but there was a look of delighted surprise in her eyes. She had raised herself so that her gaze crossed the top of the coffin and rested on an open window. Through that window she could see the setting sun, and its rays were gilding the spires and monuments of a beautiful city. The spectacle must have reminded her of the home to which her loved ones had gone, of which God himself is the light, and it comforted her.

A GRATEFUL ARMENIAN

BEFORE the awful massacres of Armenians in 1896, there lived in the ancient city of Orfa, Armenia, a family named Tanakjian.

The father being dead, the family consisted of the mother, four grown daughters, three sons, and a young boy of about twelve, named Minas. At the time of the massacre many of the Armenians and children fled to the neighboring village of Garmooq, where they found refuge. Minas and his mother were among those who thus escaped. The remainder of the family were not so fortunate. Three of the brothers were killed, one in the church where so many cruelly perished, and another in the street. Two of the sisters are now living; the husband of one of these was killed at the same time as the others. Young Minas was one of the orphans supported and educated by the gifts of in everybody and everything American, and with courage and faith to meet all difficulties, as he is prominent in his trade, and young and strong. One of the first duties of young Tanakjian on coming to the United States was to call at the offices of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, to express his gratitude for all that had been done for him by its readers. Not only did he express his own thanks, but he had been especially commissioned to deliver, as best he could, the heartfelt gratitude and appreciation of all the other orphans in Orfa, who had been supported and educated by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Minas speaks very little English, saying, "It seems not the same in books." But he will soon learn. He has an earnest, kindly face, full of determination and courage. Loyalty to those who were his friends during the dreadful times following the massacre is one of his strongest characteristics, and there is no doubt but that in a short time he will take front rank in the army of America's adopted citizens. He will never forget his indebtedness to those good-hearted, generous Americans who were the mainstay of the Armenians during that terrible time of trial.

THE USE OF FLOWERS

God might have bade the earth bring forth Enough for great and small, The oak tree and the cedar tree, Without a flower at all. He might have had enough, enough, For every want of ours, For luxury, medicine, and toil, And yet have had no flowers.

WHERE FORTUNES ARE MADE

OF all roads that lead to wealth, Real Estate Road is safest and surest.

Nowhere has this truth had stronger proof than in the growth of the greatest resort on the Atlantic Seaboard.

Since Jeremiah Leeds purchased Absecon Island, the present site of Atlantic City, for forty cents an acre, everybody investing in Atlantic City real estate has made money. Within 12 years land values have risen over 800 per cent.

Now the Greater Atlantic City movement is beginning. The crowded Island demands suburbs. But one direction opens—the mainland, where the railroads approach the city.

Here is situated Pleasantville Terrace, the beautiful new suburb, 60 feet above the ocean, 12 minutes' ride from the Boardwalk, on the Reading Railroad, and a 5-cent fare by trolley—the only unoccupied land accessible to the city within seven miles.

Pleasantville Terrace, a splendid tract of high land, formerly General Doughty's Estate, has just been purchased by the Atlantic City Estate Company, who are placing it on the market for the first time.

The Company have divided this property in lots 25 by 100 feet, which they are offering to investors and home builders at prices that will seem insignificant five years hence. Such an opportunity to secure a home site suburban to the world's Ocean Sanitarium is not likely to occur again.

The price of these lots is $25; but for a short time only $10 will be deducted from the price of every other lot. 5 lots, including corner, $110.

Lots may be had on the following remarkable easy terms: $1 down on each lot; $1 weekly for 1 or 2 lots; $2 weekly for 3 to 5 lots. No charge for deed; no mortgages; no interest; no taxes until 1906.

The Company guarantees a rise of 25 per cent. in value within one year or money back. Titles are absolutely perfect—insured by Integrity Title and Trust Company of Philadelphia. This is a guaranteed investment without speculation or risk—safe as the prosperity of the great resort itself.

Reference is made by permission to Franklin P. Stoy, Mayor of Atlantic City. Free excursions are run every Thursday from Atlantic City, leaving the Reading Station at 3 P. M.

By enclosing $1 with name and address as many lots may be secured as desired, up to five, which is all that can be sold to one person. Satisfaction is guaranteed, or the dollar will be returned. For free booklet and further information write to ATLANTIC CITY, N. J., August 6, 1904.

I regard Pleasantville Terrace as the Natural Suburb of Atlantic City. There can be no extension of the seacoast, therefore the city must extend landward.

Being located on high ground, with unusual Trolley and Railroad Facilities, there is every reason why Pleasantville Terrace should enjoy the same marvelous increase of values that has made Atlantic City the most noted Real Estate Investment in the world.

Lisping their Prayers at Mother's Knee

OUR MAIL-BAG IS THE CHURCH FOR SAINTS OR FOR SINNERS?

IN this issue, "The Saint and Sinner" Symposium, begun in our issue of Aug. 3, is continued. The very large number of letters received show the widespread interest that is taken in the question.

God's Plan for the Church

THAT saint and sinner both dwell together in the Church until harvest-time, sufficient proof, I think, is found in the parable of our Lord, as contained in the thirteenth chapter of Matthew. No Church is justified in keeping among its members scandalous persons, but we all know from sad experience of schisms and broken households, the need of care in this matter. Our foreign missionaries are using a "period of probation" very effectively among their heathen converts.

OPHELIA S. MITCHELL.

Louisville, Ky.

The Church Composed of Sinners

THE true Church—the Church or Body of Christ—is only composed of sinners saved by grace. The churches built by men are meant for worship, and in such places both saints and sinners meet. No one should be excluded, but in the election of members or elders the utmost care should be exercised, to prevent bad or doubtful characters from holding such a position.

W. PAYNE LE SUEUR.

Morley, Alberta.

Emphatically for Both

THE Church is emphatically for both, sinners being the exclusive material out of which saints are made, largely in the Church and by the Church—for God. The Church really is a body of learners seeking to learn the acceptable worship of God. In it and by it both saints and sinners are taught the way of the Lord.

W. A. SHOEMAKER.

Elmira, N. Y.

Reach Out a Helping Hand

THE saint should reach out a helping hand to the poor, fallen, discouraged sinner, who has perhaps often tried to be a Christian, but failed, and now wishes to try again. If we took for our life motto, "To do as Jesus would do," we would follow more closely in his footsteps.

OLLIE C. NORDWALL.

Repentant Sinners Should be Welcomed

THE Church should call sinners, but receive only repentants. I have never been able to understand the probation plan. It says, "If you are strong enough to stand alone for six months, we will help you; if not, you cannot belong to us." Does the Master put us on probation when we come to Him? Is the Church better than the Master? The very minute we bring truly repentant hearts to Him he accepts us as his disciples. Why should not the Church? I remember how long it was after I became a Christian before I joined the Church, because I was so afraid of that six months' probation. I tried to live just as near my Master, but I knew He understood everything and could see my motives for everything I did, and I was afraid that the Church, not knowing the motive, might misjudge. At last I joined a Church that took me without any probation, and on the simple assertion that I loved the Lord with all my heart and my neighbor as myself. The minute I was received into their Christian fellowship I felt stronger and I have never been sorry. Better for the Church to receive ten hypocrites than to turn away one repentant soul.

Bring the Sinners In

AT one time, it was my privilege to join a band of young Christians, in which none were excluded who desired membership. Those who made no profession were entered as associate members. I never knew a more prosperous society. Our strength came from God alone; we did not look to our unconverted members for our example, but in every way endeavored to win them to Christ. There was so much earnestness manifested among them that I couldn't help doing my best also. During my stay, we were able in His strength to win all (with one exception). Sinners will not frequent a truly spiritual prayer meeting unless their hearts yearn for something better than the world can supply.

IRENA BATES.

The Unconverted Not Eligible

THE Church never was designed to be a home for lost sinners. It would be absurd to call a mixture of saved and unsaved people a Church; because the term, "Church," in its spiritual and scriptural sense, means a body of believers. It is my candid opinion that the union of an unsaved person with the Church is not helpful, but rather injurious to both. Repentance, not union with the Church, is what God requires of lost sinners. Union with the Church should come afterwards.

Elder Knapp's Solution of the Question

"THE saint or sinner" question reminds me of a story told by Elder Knapp. I heard it about thirty years ago. It seems to fit the above question so well, that I give it as I remember it, without comment: "I was holding revival meetings in New York City," he said, "and among the professed converts was a woman who had been a sinner, and, according to her story, one of the worst in the city. After her conversion, she worked among the fallen women of the city with great success. In course of time she applied for admission to the Church. When it became known that she desired to join, a number of the women of the Church got together, and declared that if she was admitted they would leave the Church. The officials were in sore trouble over the matter, and in their extremity applied to me. I advised them to call a meeting of the Church and if it was their pleasure, I would in the meeting consult with them. It was a very serious matter and threatened to disrupt the Church. I laid the matter before the Lord in prayer and I went to the meeting. They were badly split and could not agree. I was called upon for my opinion. I told them that it seemed to me that the difficulty had originated when we began our series of revival meetings, in one of which this woman had been converted. When we began, we prayed the Lord to convert souls; we did not specify what kind of souls we wanted converted, and he in his grace had converted a soul that was not wanted. Now the question is, What are we going to do with this one whom the Lord clearly has chosen for his own? There was profound silence for a moment. One of the objectors said, 'I guess if she is good enough for the Lord, she is good enough for me. All who feel as I do, stand up.' There seemed but one motion, as every one stood up. This," said Elder Knapp, "happened several years ago, and I can certify to the fact that that woman is one of his honored workers in a field to which He, without doubt, called her Himself."

J. H. SYME.

Be Ye Separate

NOT long ago I heard a pastor tell this story. A young man asked a companion if his sister were a church member. "No," answered his companion, "my sister is not a member of the church, though her name is on the church-book and she answers to the roll-call. My sister belongs to society, to the club, to the lodge, to the card-party, the theater, the ball-room. She does not belong to the Church."

Now I ask any thoughtful Christian if this lady and her class are of any benefit to the Church, or the Church to them, is it not scriptural and, therefore, better for the two to be "separate" until there is reasonable evidence of the new birth and the indwelling spirit?

Marion, Iowa.

Must be Converted First

THE first exhortation addressed to sinners dead in trespasses and sins is: "Repent and believe on the Lord Jesus Christ." With the heart unchanged, and the spirit unrenewed, it is impossible to please God or to live a consecrated life. No unconverted man or woman is fit for membership in the Church that is built on the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner-stone.

It is for All Professing Christians

A CHURCH is for those who profess Jesus as Lord. It is not for those who say they are "good enough," but for those who realize their weakness and sinfulness, and desire greatly the blessed influence of the Church. As long as any one knows the Church helps him to grow, and enables him to grow strong in the Lord and in the power of his might, as long as he desires to grow in grace and in knowledge of the Lord Jesus Christ, I can't see any reason why we should refuse him admittance.

"The Visible Church is for the Sinners"

MY humble contention is that the visible Church is for the sinners, for how otherwise could we take the words of the Blessed Master, "I came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance"? It suggests itself to me that the one great lack of the visible Church of to-day is that too many are ready to think "more highly of himself than he ought," and this spirit breeds a class distinction which is no part of the plan of redemption. Let all men and women who are members of the "Church" pray for that spirit which will cleanse us of self, and fill us with Jesus Christ, and then will thousands be turned to the Lord daily.

Accept All Who are Drawn to Christ

I WOULD consider it highly incompatible with its teachings, if an evangelical Church should refuse to accept into membership any person who publicly confesses his faith in the Lord Jesus Christ as his personal Saviour, and affirms it to be his purpose to strive to live a Christian life. Whether the applicant is known to have been notoriously irreligious or not, he should first be required to give public testimony, and in as simple a manner as possible, state about when he experienced the change of thought towards God and realize his need of a Saviour, what caused this change, and the reasons for now desiring to unite with the Church. If his answers are satisfactory to his examiners, and his present life and conduct, so far as is known, in accord with his testimony, there can be found no reasonable objection to receiving him into fellowship. The Gospel message is "Whosoever will may come," and if the Church would be consistent and follow the example of Him whom it represents, it must in like manner, accept "Whosoever cometh."

It is very probable that by giving credence merely to personal testimonies, there shall be received into fellowship some whose purpose it is to use their membership in the Church of Christ as a cloak to disarm suspicion and to cover their unrighteous living; but there are none among us at that time, who are themselves so righteous and endowed by the Holy Spirit with such unerring powers of discernment (as was manifested in the case of Ananias and Sapphira), that can properly and wisely advise us when to withhold the privileges of fellowship from applicants, and therefore deny admission to those who apply because of their passions, though their lives or words of testimony at the present give evidence of a change in life or thought, and for fear lest they might not be what they pretend, would be rank hypocrisy on our part.

There is nothing to be gained by keeping an applicant for membership on probation. I do not find this taught in the Bible, from which, I think, should be obtained all our ideas of church government. It is said that Moody, then a fresh from the country, applied for admission into a Church in Boston, but older and wiser men did not consider him quite eligible as yet to membership, and he was therefore told to wait for a time and consider the step more carefully, but this young man, filled with the Spirit of God, went on from that church to find other fields in which to labor, and moved the world for God.

LEONARD L. NONES.

New York.

Only the Saved Acceptable

THE Church is the visible body of Christ on earth (I. Cor. 12: 27; Col. 1: 24). No unsafe person can, in reality become a member of the real Church, unless they accept Christ. For the Church "should be holy and without spot. To admit everybody as members of the visible organization regardless whether saved or not, would be forming an alliance with the world that Acts 2: 47 directly opposes: "The Lord added unto the Church daily such as were being saved." "Only saved souls can be members of Christ's body, the Church, of which he is the Head. And they are thus joined to that body by his Spirit" (I. Cor. 12: 13).

EVANGELIST G. H. W.

Would Not Even Exclude a Saloon-keeper

WE think it is for both, and do not think any one should be excluded, not even a saloon-keeper. We feel he is no worse than a great many who take an active part in church work. Though they do not keep a saloon, they support them by their patronage as well as by their votes.

Saline, N. D.

MRS. LULU SALISBURY.

Certain Sinners Should Be Excluded

WE are told that a man who has murdered shall not have life eternal with God, but will be punished for ever and as to a man or woman who has been married and parted and married again, there is no trace in God's teachings their forgiveness. Many more such as these are found in the Bible. Taking such characters into a Church will not do the person any good, and stands a fair show of doing the Church a great deal of harm.

Ethel, Mo.

FRED BELI.

Teach the Sinner the Way

NONE should be allowed to think that joining the Church will save the soul. Jesus received sinners and ate with them; but this did not save them. He said of those who the judgment would make the claim, "We have eaten and drunk in thy presence," "Depart from me, for I never knew you."

Jesus said, "He that cometh unto me I will in no wise cast out." And how are we to come? The only way, the narrow way, that Jesus pointed out is, "Repentance toward God and faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ." But if the applicant be ignorant of these conditions and manifestly anxious to know them, he will be willing to tarry, or join the Church on trial until he receive the necessary instructions.

Stockton, Ill.

J. S. LEWIS.

Only Believers Eligible

ONLY those who repent and believe in Jesus should be accepted (Luke 24: 47). The Church is not the Saviour of men, but Jesus Christ. It is rank idolatry to preach the Church as the Saviour of men, and to receive people into the Church to save them is denying Christ as the only Saviour. Bible examples and teachings all forbid the reception of unbelievers into the Church. The Lord added the saved to the Church, Acts 2d, 47th verse, correct reading.

Austin, Texas.

L. M. MAYS.

Accept Only the Converted

THE Church is a very good place for sinners who are saved by grace, but the wrong place for any other kind. An applicant should undergo a thorough examination as to spiritual condition, before being enrolled as a Church member. If we are to have good, strong, efficient Christians, we must maintain a high standard for recruits, rolling sinners on the Church book and trying to convert

GOSPEL WORK ON ADMIRAL STIRLING'S SHIPS IN WAR TIME

FROM A SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT

THE United States Navy in China is a big subject, yet it is composed of units, of individuals whose places in the family circle at home are vacant, and to whose fathers and mothers a line from a missionary father and mother in Shanghai, the Chicago of China, may be welcome.

We recently had a most pleasant chat with Admiral Yates Stirling on the New Orleans (his temporary flagship, while waiting for the San Francisco). The Admiral has been transferred to Shanghai headquarters from the Philippine Squadron. We all feel pleased to welcome this genial and gallant officer and representative American to our city. It has been one of the compensations of the present war in North China to be the headquarters of the United States Navy transferred to Central China, and an unusual number of American ships have gladdened our eyes on the Huangpu River and in the harbor. Japan has been the favorite anchorage for American transports and battleships hitherto.

We have reaped quite a harvest of new friends and delightful reminiscences from the new arrangement, in Shanghai. The United States monitor Monadnock is our guard-ship, and Commander Dennis Mahan, Lieu-welcome. When we think of the New Orleans, we recall Admiral Stirling, and his cordial greetings and answers to our many questions about the fleet. The Cincinnati sent her steam launch for us on Sunday mornings, and genial Commander Mason never failed to give us a personal welcome, and attend Divine Service. Commanders Harris and Marshall of the Wilmington and Vicksburg, granted us permission to meet with the crews on many occasions, and we held charming entertainments on board, making many friends among the men. Commander Hutchins of the Annapolis, and his officers, were "cordiality personified." Commander Dyer of the Albany, and Commander Nazro of the Raleigh, favored our presence on board also, when-great favorite, associated with the famous days of 1900, and the Kentucky and Wisconsin are rare visitors, hailing only once or so a year. The Monterey (companion monitor with the Monadnock), is the present guard-ship at Canton, alternating between Canton and Shanghai with the Monadnock. While on a visit to Hongkong and Canton this spring, we were cordially welcomed on the Monterey by Commander Osterhaus, who permitted us to entertain the men on board that evening, and invited the men of the Callao to come on board also.

We now pass on to the "deck," where we missionaries have spent many pleasant hours with the sailor boys, and had very satisfactory results. Several of our ships came to us from the Isles of the Pacific, or Korea, not having had Gospel services for weeks and months. The conditions were favorable for Gospel workers, of whom we have many in Shanghai.

Music is most appreciated in ship services. Two ladies have an enviable record in that line. Singing evangelists from the U. S. A., they came to China as Miss Dieterle and Miss McDonald, about 1900, when the assembled ships, and foreigners from all over the tenant Oman and the junior officers are all very popular and well known. The monitor is anchored off the Ewo Jey, and is visited from week to week, and services held on board by friends of the men. But this spring we have had practically the whole of the cruiser and guboard squadrons at our doors, and have had very pleasant visits with the Commanders, and Sunday services and mid-week social hours with the men. The U. S. New Orleans, Albany, Cincinnati, Raleigh, Wilmington, Vicksburg, Annapolis, El Cano, Villalobos and Frolic will long be remembered. The two little guboard squadrons with Spanish names, from the Philippines, around the Yangtsekiang, and come often to Shanghai; but the others only pay us occasional visits, and we are always sorry to see them go.

It is difficult to discriminate where all are so heartily ever we desired; and the little despatch boat Frolic (formerly the famous yacht Commanche, sold to the United States Government by Senator Mark Hanna's brother), was always just full of welcome and sunshine. Our visits were an inspiration!

We can merely mention the commanders of our China naval ships and pay them a warm tribute of regard as we pass on, and wish them bon voyage wherever they may go. Our battleships remain at Woosung, at the outer anchorage, several miles from the city, when they pay us flying visits, and we have a 14-mile railroad trip to make when we pay them a visit. The Oregon is a Empire, made Shanghai a "City of Refuge." Their music was much blessed in winning the sailors to a higher life. Miss McDonald is now Mrs. C. P. Newton, of Shanghai, and Miss Dieterle is doing missionary work in our Beulah Chapel. They are wholly consecrated musicians, and every song is sung in the hope to win a soul for the Kingdom. We have found the magic lantern also an invaluable aid in interesting the men on board. The explanation of many of the pictures thrown on the screen has been rendered by a song sung by our children. Ethel, Earle, and Ora, with the baby organ.

At a recent ship entertainment, a young man was represented on the screen at "The Parting of the Ways," just stepping out from the old home, and going forth to meet the glowing future. We sang, "Where is my

Labor's Afflictions

TEXT—Exodus 1: 12: "The more they afflicted them, the more they multiplied and grew."

SOME virtues," wrote Joseph Addison, "are seen only in affliction." But from the Egyptian standpoint, it would take a very long and a very useless investigation to find any virtue in the national catastrophe, which, as the text would indicate, was about to overwhelm the Egyptian kingdom. The mightiest foreign foe ever assembled upon the borderland, drained by the arteries of the gigantic Nile, was not to be feared as much as was the host of enslaved Hebrews who were living among them. It was only a few hundred years before that a little handful of Hebrews, with their flocks and herds, had migrated to and settled in the land of Goshen during the premiership of Joseph, the famous statesman. But since that time the descendants of old Jacob had multiplied so greatly that now they could be counted literally by the hundreds of thousands. Not only in numbers were they to be feared, but in mental power also. With the proverbial acquisitiveness of the Hebrew, these people were absorbing much of the wealth of the kingdom. Moreover, the "signs of the times" declared they would soon become rulers of the nation. By a silent revolution, they threatened to take possession of the Egyptian government, as long afterward the descendants of the old Aztecs, whose fathers had been conquered by Cortez, bided their time, and finally worked out their own governmental salvation by electing practically a full-blooded Indian to the throne of the Montezumas—Porfirio Diaz, President of the Mexican Republic.

Pharaoh's Method

"What shall we do? What shall we do?" was the one question that was upon almost every Egyptian lip. "Shall we allow the Hebrew people to become the dominant factors upon the banks of the Nile, and to sit upon the throne of the Pharaohs?" This question was not only asked in the street, but it was anxiously discussed in the king's palace. To-night we see the lights blazing in the privy council room. As we enter the council chamber, we see the king sitting at the end of the long room, surrounded by his best and strongest ministers. After the question has been talked over long and earnestly, I see the king rise. He looks straight at his counselors of state, as he says: "Gentlemen, we are facing a condition, not a theory. We dare not, and cannot, deport the Hebrews from our realm. They are now essential to our national welfare and prosperity, as laborers, clerks, and servants. But we can debar them from holding property. We can forbid them studying in our schools. We can enslave them, and make them the chattels of our people. We can degrade them by ignorance and overwork. Thus saith the king. I here and now decree the Hebrew men, and women, and children from henceforth to be in perpetual bondage. They shall be compelled to make bricks without straw. My ministers will see that my decree is carried out. When the king speaks, the king's will becomes the law."

This royal behest was carried out to the letter. The Hebrew people living in Egypt were disfranchised. Not only were they deprived of the rights of citizenship, but they were degraded to the most abject and humiliating servitude. Their property was taken away from them, and they could not even claim their wives and children as their own. Yet, strange to say, and yet not strange after all, the more the Hebrews were cursed and struck, and ill-used, and murdered by the Egyptians, the more their numbers grew, and the more of a menace they became to the Egyptian government. The labor question, on account of the brutalities practiced under the shadow of Pharaoh's throne in 1573 B.C., became as imminent and dangerous as is the labor question in the United States of America in 1904, A.D., under the shadow of the statue of the Goddess of Liberty, which stands in New York Harbor, and with uplifted arm by day and uplifted light by night, declares that all men in this land are free and equal.

Self-Inflicted Grievances

This is the first Sunday in September. To-morrow is Labor Day. Many preachers this Sabbath morning will be talking to the mechanics, the clerks and the farm-hands, to the masons, the carpenters and plumbers, and to all those who work with their hands. It is not inappropriate that this morning I should present some of the conditions that are afflicting American labor. If in this talk I should speak frankly concerning capital, I shall speak with equal candor concerning labor; for I firmly believe, as a dear friend of mine said to me a few days ago, that, "the greatest curse labor has to bear to-day does not come from capital, but from labor itself." One-sided treatment of the labor question will never help to solve the problem.

"The more the Egyptian masters afflicted the Hebrew slaves," says our text, "the more they multiplied and grew, and the Egyptians grieved because of the children of Israel." Labor's afflictions! We first find them in the American laborer being compelled to compete for work in a home market that is glutted with foreign immigrants. We find them in the great army of invaders, which, each year, disembarks at Bedloe's Island, New York's Castle Garden of the present day. We find them in the impoverished Italians, and the Bohemians, and the Portuguese, and in the human off-scourings of Europe, who each year come to our manufacturers, and foundrymen, and contractors, and say: "Let me handle your pick;" "Let me lay your asphalt pavement;" "Let me dig your mines;" "Let me chop your wood;" "Let me work in your foundries." "We are foreigners. We do not intend to become citizens of the United States. As soon as we can save up a little money, we intend to return to our native land and live there. But, meantime, we will work cheaper than any American man can work. Why? Because our living expenses are practically nothing. We will live in dugouts. We will eat food that no American family would eat. We will buy no books, and will wear the cheapest clothing. As a result of these conditions of living, we can crowd your American workman to the wall."

Our Debt to Foreigners

The American laborer, from this foreign competition, must have help, and help right soon to save him from this condition of affairs. Our National Legislature must give it. Shall we lift high our tariff walls to protect capital, and not at the same time lift high our walls of immigration laws to protect our native workers? Is not the American laborer's sturdy arm as valuable, in the sight of our Government, as the capitalist's pocket-book? "What do you mean by such a statement as that?" someone asks. "Would you start another Know-nothing Party? Would your ballot-box slogan be 'American work only for the American-born.' 'American political offices only to be held by those cradled under the shadows of Mt. Washington and Pike's Peak?'" Oh, no, I am not preaching any such political nonsense. I do not believe there ever was a political party wrapped in the swaddling clothes of so many errors as that born in 1853, and which, with Ex-President Millard Fillmore as its Presidential candidate, swept many of our Northern States in 1856 with the political cry "America only for the American-born." American liberties and American prowess, both on land and sea, militarily and industrially, have been won and built up by America's adopted sons as well as by her native-born children. Were there not foreigners among George Washington's mightiest companions-in-arms? Baron Johan DeKalb, who was shot at Camden in 1780, and Kosciuszko and Lafayette, and many others—they were all foreign-born. Who was the most valued statesman during Washington's Administration, next to the President himself? Alexander Hamilton, who was foreign-born. Who was John Ericsson, the inventor of the Monitor, that revolutionized naval warfare and saved the American navy off Newport News? He was a Swedish-American; he was foreign-born. Some of our greatest merchants, like A. T. Stewart, of New York; our greatest foundrymen, like Andrew Carnegie, of Pittsburgh; our greatest scientists, like Agassiz, of Harvard; our social reformers, like Jacob A. Riis, of New York; and the most eminent political leaders of our day, like Carl Schurz, once Senator from Missouri and member of President Hayes' Cabinet—they were all foreign-born. If you blot out from our nation's history all the deeds which America's foster-sons and daughters have accomplished for the land of their adoption, you blot out some of its brightest pages.

Foreign Competition

But while we, as American citizens, would welcome gladly into our midst the German, or Englishman or Scotchman or Swede, and the men of any foreign nationality who with intelligence would come among us and say: "Brother, give me thy hand, for to-day I would be one with you, and become an American citizen;" yet to-day we would not welcome the ignorant, the idle, the filthy, the pauper, the lazzaroni or the criminal off-scourings of Europe or Asia, who would come to this land, not to become American citizens, but to stay here just long enough to scrape together a few thousand dollars, and then go back to the land of their birth. We would not welcome the ignorant and the depraved of foreign lands, who would underbid our American workmen, and compel our American boys and girls to live in dugouts or as rats in a cellar, as they live. These classes have neither part nor parcel in the glorious inheritance of freedom and equality for which our forefathers fought and bled. While we would gladly open our gates to the oppressed of other lands, we would shut them against a horde that can have no appreciation for the precious privilege of American citizenship, and no sympathy with our national aims and ambitions, and whose coming is as much a menace to our people, as the cloud of locusts is to a harvest-field. Nations, like individuals, should be as well as generous in their hospitality. We must protect ourselves against the industrial locusts of the World by wise and discriminating laws, which shall be unjust to none, and which, while vindicating our ancient hospitality as a world-wide asylum for the lovers of liberty and independence, shall shut out the swarms of mere mercenaries, and against the "indigestible elements" which other lands seek to thrust upon us, from whatever quarter they may come.

Unwise Labor Unions

Labor's next great affliction is to be found in the absurd and tyrannical demands made by some labor unions, which seem to have the suicidal policy of antagonizing capital at all times and under all pretenses, and of widening the breach between capital and labor, with the result that labor itself is the heaviest sufferer through their insane follies. The most brutal tyrant the Southern negro knew in ante-bellum days was not the white man, but the negro himself, who was made the overseer of the plantation. In the same way, in many cases, the most brutal tyrant the laboring man has to-day is not the capitalist, but the "walking delegate" or the mercenary political trickster, who, a laboring man, manipulates the executive committee which govern the labor unions for their own ruin. Of course this indictment is not universal in its application. There are many honest and upright and beneficent labor organizations, like that of which the late Mr. Arthur was the President, namely: the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers. Mr. Arthur brought that organization up to such perfection that it not only looked after the interests of the owners of the different railroads, but after the interests of the engineers themselves. There are many clear-brained, sagacious and noble-minded labor leaders, whose object is not to organize the labor market but to steady it, so that employer as well as the employed may have their share. "I do not believe in strikes for the laboring man," said Terence V. Powderly a few months ago. "It is, we had some, when I was at the head of the Knights of Labor, but we settled 1100 labor disputes without strikes." Indeed, I might say we prevented over 100 strikes." Yet, strange to say, where there has been able and sagacious labor leader, whose chief object seemed to have been to make every man do his honest quota of work and get his just pay, there have been many whose chief object has been to find out how they can permit a laborer to do and how much they can make an employer pay without literally breaking his back. Such men are an incubus on labor. Like the old man of the sea who sat on the neck of Sinbad, they sit heavily upon the workingman's shoulders, impeding his progress and involving him in endless disputes and trouble. The sooner he rids himself of such embarrassment the better.

Mutual Sympathy

Now, my laboring friends, mark you this. I am not claiming that capital is all right and labor is all wrong. I think some of the most merciless men in the world are to be found in the ranks of capitalists. Some of them will squeeze out of a worker his last drop of blood. Some of them have no more sympathy with the hunger and poverty of the worker than Marie Antoinette had with the sufferings of poor Paris, when she heard the cry of the mobs, "Give us bread! We have bread!" "Why," said the shallow-brained French queen to one of her attendants, "do they ask for bread? If they have no bread, why don't they eat cake?" But while capital in some instances may be merciless, it is quite certain that if the labor unions will stop their petty bickerings and their unjustifiable tyrannies and unitedly demand what is right, capital will be compelled to yield to all of labor's just demands. So long as labor persists in making absurd claims, just so long will labor not only be refused such demands, but labor will lose much of what she justly and rightfully claims to have. When a labor union comes and says, "Capitalist, you must hire the men I send to you at no other price," then the capitalist, stung by such tyranny, replies, "Rather than have you dictate to me what I shall do, I will fight your organization to the last dollar. My forefathers died on Bunker Hill and at Valley Forge for liberty. Free I was born, free I shall live, and free I shall die." It is flint against flint, and is the inevitable result of such a course of action. This is the spirit with which capital is to-day fighting labor when labor makes absurd and unjust demands.

Port Arthur's Hopeless Struggle

GENERAL VIEW OF THE HARBOR AND FORTS OF PORT ARTHUR

1—Golden Hill, the principal fort. 2—Tiger's Tail fortifications. 3—Channel leading into harbor. 4—Shallow part of harbor, partly dredged for merchant ships. 5—Inner or Naval Basin for warships. 6—Commercial quarter of city. 7—Chinese Eastern Railroad. 8—Steamer of Volunteer Fleet. 9—Hill over which Japanese entered city in 1895. 10—Old French Dry Dock. 11—Upper basin for torpedo fleet. 12—Old Chinese fort, now used as Russian barracks.

ALTHOUGH the fall of Port Arthur has seemed inevitable for many weeks past, the determined defence by the Russians has excited the wonder and admiration of the military world. At the same time, the frightful sacrifice of life on both sides has been so appalling as to shock humanity. It is asserted that one-fifth of the Japanese assaulting force has been either killed or wounded. Russian mines have annihilated whole Japanese regiments. Practically all the Russian warships in the port are dismantled, their guns being used in the land defence. The vessels will probably be blown up in the last extremity.

Gen. Stoessel, foreseeing the downfall of the fortress, sometime ago concluded a message to a friend in Moscow with the words: "Port Arthur will be my tomb. Farewell forever!" Still, even face to face with death, the defenders stood to their guns. A land assault by the now reinforced Japanese began on Aug. 22, and at frightful loss of life, all the outer defences were captured. Soon hardly a building was left standing in the city, according to the reports received at Chefoo. Thousands of dead strewn the hillsides. The living were partially sheltered by bomb-proofs. Theatres, hospitals, barracks, and every dwelling that afforded a mark for the enemy's guns was reduced to ruins. Only a few women and children remained in the fortress. Lieut. McCully, the U. S. naval attaché, left for Chefoo on Aug. 23. The German military attaché also left the doomed fortress.

On Aug. 24, the end seemed near. All the hills surrounding the city, except Golden Hill, were now crowned with Japanese cannon. In the fort, the scene was like a charnel-house. Many of the dead were laid in warehouses awaiting burial in quicklime. The Chinese hospitals were full of wounded. The Japanese cruisers Isoshin and Kasuga, after a heavy bombardment, silenced the strong forts east of Golden Hill. Perhaps the most destructive attack was that on the famous "Chair Fort," which was captured after a fierce struggle and the loss of many lives.

An international dispute of considerable proportions arose over the fact that two Russian warships—the cruiser Askold and the destroyer Grozovoi—found shelter at Shanghai after the famous sea fight off Port Arthur on August 10. Both vessels had sustained damage from the Japanese fire, and they went into dock for repairs. Japan demanded that the Chinese authorities compel the Russian ships to go to sea at the expiration of the time limit, but the Russian Consul-General absolutely refused to allow this, and the Chinese Taotai was powerless. Meanwhile, a Japanese destroyer steamed up the river, and for a time it was feared that an attack would be made on the Russian vessels by a Japanese squadron that hovered near. The Consuls met, and protests and counter-protests were entered. The United States torpedo-boat destroyer Chauncey was in the harbor, lying at her dock between the Askold and her enemy, and as there were eight American (under Admiral Stirling) one German, two British and four French warships in port, any attempt to take the fugitives by force, or to destroy them, might have stirred up a serious international quarrel, all the ships other than the combatants being desirous of preserving the neutrality of the Chinese harbor, and protecting foreign interests. After a week of acute discussion, the affair was settled by an order from the Czar directing that the two Russian ships be dismantled. They will, therefore, be permitted to stay, but cannot share in further naval operations, and will probably be claimed as prizes by Japan at the close of the war.

RUSSIAN CRUISER "ASKOLD," NOW AT SHANGHAI

Another Russian refugee warship, the Novik, which fled to Khorsakovsk, on the Island of Sakhalin, met with a more tragic fate. She was overtaken by the Chitose, and Akitsu-shima, two of Admiral Kamimura's ships, and destroyed on Aug. 20, her crew, however, being saved. The Novik was the boldest vessel of the Port Arthur fleet and had led in many of its most daring operations. She was at one time the flagship of the late Admiral Makaroff. The Diana, another fugitive warship from Port Arthur, succeeded in reaching the French-Chinese port of Saigon in safety.

Russia's converted cruisers have apparently resumed operations, hunting for contraband. The British steamer Comedian was stopped in South Atlantic waters by a steamer supposed to be the Smolensk, and her papers examined. Britain has made an official protest to St. Petersburg.

Two Russian destroyers at Port Arthur are reported as having been sunk by submarine mines.

LABOR'S AFFLICTIONS

But I would speak also in reference to another great affliction from which labor to-day is suffering. I allude not to the competition of American labor with the foreign hordes, but to that unnatural and ever-increasing competition between our American boys and our American sisters in the labor market. Brothers struggle for bread in competition with sisters; fathers compete with their own daughters. Now, I know the words that I am going to speak will not be popular to some, but what I have to say I hope may be heard patiently and with profit.

The world, by every law of justice, owes every man, woman and child a living, if they are ready to work for it.

But God never intended some people to work for a living in certain ways any more than he intended a colt six months old to do the work of a well-developed draft horse. He never intended young boys and girls to leave school before their time, or wives and daughters to labor as farm-hands in the fields, when there are sturdy men and brothers, physically able to bear the brunt of the work under the noontide sun. Yet everywhere we see strong men, able-bodied men, who want to work, and yet who are unable to find employment, because the work that they should do is being done by women who ought to be at home caring for the household. This condition is a menace not only to the American labor market, but to the American home and family. Both must suffer by the substitution of women and girls for men and boys in the factories and stores of our land. The natural place for woman is the home. It is there at the qualities with which God has endowed her, and their proper exercise. To be the wife and mother, to make the house a home by her sweet and refining influence, to train the children to be good and wise men and virtuous women by a mother's love and care—these are the services she alone can render, and if she deserts at duty it will go undone, and this country will lose its moral tone. There is no compensation known to man for the lack of a mother's beneficent influence on her children.

I yield to no man in my admiration for the girl who, being left fatherless, and having no brothers capable of earning a livelihood for the bereaved family, goes forth to toil for the support of her widowed mother and her fatherless brothers and sisters. Many a noble girl is doing that, and deserves to be honored for her conduct. Many a girl, unsought in marriage, seeing her father gradually losing by age his capacity for work, takes up the burden of helping to provide for the family, which he is no longer able to bear alone. All honor to her for the assistance she is rendering, and for the sympathy and reverence for her parents which she displays, in relieving them of care and anxiety. Many a widow, clinging to her children, and shrinking from the pain of having them scattered in the charitable homes of relatives or friends, finds employment, by which she can support and educate them and fit them for their duty in life. God bless and help all such, and give them the strength they need for their arduous lot! They should have our hearty sympathy and our cordial help in their self-sacrificing labor.

But the spectacle of what such women are doing has stirred the ambition of another class of women. These are they who voluntarily and by choice, elect to do a man's work in the world. In order that they may escape the drudgery of domestic service, or the weariness of school teaching, or in order to obtain money for extravagant dress and ornament, or for luxuries which their fathers cannot provide, they thrust themselves into business pursuits, displacing some man who was earning a higher salary, and they help to depress the market rate of wages.

I protest against a system which makes it impossible for a strong, able-bodied man to find work, forcing him to stay at home and live upon his young daughters' earnings, when they themselves should be at school or helping their mothers at home. There are only two ways to rectify this evil. Employers should hire their employees in two ways. First, when an applicant comes for a place, give the preference to men who are husbands and fathers and the heads of families; second, absolutely refuse to employ any young girl in a store or factory, unless that young girl is fatherless, brotherless, and has others dependent upon her for support. It is high time that some of our female clerks, who are working in stores for a little extra spending money, should go back to their homes and domestically help to care for their mothers and fathers and younger sisters and brothers, where they belong.

The afflictions of the industrial workers of America are very great. I have tried to present three or four of the difficult labor problems which confront the laboring classes of America at the present time. Do not, however, even for one moment suppose that I consider these problems and others like them impossible of solution. The same God who led the children of Israel out of their enslavement will yet lead his American children to freedom from their industrial troubles. In 1893, from the top of the great Pyramid of Gizeh, I had two visions. In the first vision I looked towards the ruins of the capital of Memphis, where lived the tyrant. I saw the mighty river Nile changed literally into a river of blood. I heard the cries of anguish as the poor Hebrew slaves groaned and moaned in torture. But then I turned and looked to the far north. In my second vision I saw another sight; for there I saw the Promised Land of Canaan. I saw Moses and Joshua. I saw Jerusalem gleaming in the glowing sun. I saw the rich grapes of Eschol. I saw David and Solomon in all their glory. As Moses led the children of Israel out of Egypt and through the Red Sea, I see some other man heaven sent as was Moses, raised up to lead the American laborers and American capitalists out of their selfishnesses and meannesses. I see America in my second vision as the Land of True Freedom. I see all men, both laborers and capitalists, living together in harmony and love—all living as Christ would have them live. May all of us, whether we work in broadcloth or in overalls, try to speed that millennial day, by doing to our brothers as we would have our brothers do to us. Then all labor troubles will not be solved by the "Black Rule of Selfishness," but by the "Golden Rule of Christian Love."

Midsummer Rain and Hailstorms

BY WILSON A. BENTLEY, AUTHOR OF "STUDIES AMONG THE SNOW CRYSTALS," ETC.

WHENCE come those globes of purest water, that after each shower and rain-storm gleam and glisten like so many pearls or opals from each dripping tree and bough, shrub and grass leaf? From how far or high, from among those mountainous-looking billows, or sombre shrouds of vapor, which the summer storms pile or weave above the earth, come the life-giving, refreshing drops? From what cloud strata, floating perchance on lofty mountain-top, or at still more dizzy heights, come the small, the medium, the large drops? What marvelous and mysterious mechanical, electrical and magnetic processes combine to form them? What is the life-history, identical or dissimilar, of each one of all the countless myriads of rain-drops that go to form a heavy rainfall?

The story of the rain-drops forms a very interesting chapter in the book of nature. The minute water-particles or molecules called water-vapor (out of which rain-drops are made), come to us from far and near. Like those particles that go to form the snow-crystals, they were wrenched away by the sun's heat (motion), from an inconceivably vast number of their fellows, called ocean, river, glacier, etc., and then, after a time, mighty aerial currents wafted them, or a portion of them, from their distant home; perchance from some far southern ocean, or slowly-dissolving berg in northern sea, across the locality whereon they fell, and then swirled them upward to majestic heights, and blew them together into tiny rain-drops, or left them there, far above the turmoil of earth, freely floating in that frigid, rarefied air, where cloud and crystal land unite, for mysterious attractive forces to work upon, to be fashioned by them into tiny rain-drops, granular snow, or beauteous snow-crystals.

For practically identical reasons, the rain-drops vary in size, one from another, and in the altitude at which they form, at different times and during various weather conditions, rainfalls, etc., as do their near relatives, the snow crystals. The commonly accepted theory that the bulk of the rainfall originates at relatively low altitudes, in what are called nimbus, or rain-clouds, and is a process of liquid condensation alone, seems to be fallacious, according to recent researches. It has been learned through the knowledge gained by a long series of observations of the approximate height of the clouds, from which various rainfalls emanate, supplemented by data secured by means of hundreds of sets of rain-drop impressions, that the lower clouds alone, rarely, if ever, shed moisture except in the form of small drops, or of a fine mist-like rain. The rain-drops were allowed to fall into flour, and the hard dough pellet that the drops always form at the bottom of the cavity made by them in the flour, and which, by actual experiment, were found to be very near the actual size of the rain-drops that made them, were studied, extracted, and photographed. It seems to be only when such low clouds lie below other vastly higher cloud strata, and are ascending to great heights to merge with and to form the latter, that they produce, or rather help to produce, the larger rain-drops, and to shed heavy falls of rain.

A full realization of these general considerations leads to a true conception, a true theory of the mechanism of rain formation, a theory that will soon be recognized as fact, i. e., that a large portion—all the larger drops and sometimes the smaller ones of a given rainfall—are due to result from the melting of snow crystals or granular snow. The vast and frigid heights often attained by the summits of rain-producing clouds, preclude the acceptance of any theory of rain formation that rejects the important part that snow plays, during, or rather preceding, the formation of rain. This theory allows of an easy and complete explanation of the differences in the size of the drops, and of the large size they sometimes attain to. These various phenomena are seen to be due simply to differences in the size of the individual crystals and groups (flakes), and in the dimension of the large granular snow-pellets, from the melting of which they result.

While it is doubtless true that a large percentage of the rain-drops is due to congelation, or results from crystalline processes, a certain percent. of such growth is doubtless due to liquid segmentation, or to their overtaking and merging one with another while falling to earth. But not all of the rainfall owes its existence to snow. A considerable portion—all, in fact, that is shed from low clouds, or from the lower portion of clouds whose summits attain to a great height, is doubtless precipitated wholly in liquid form—is the result of liquid distillation and condensation. If, then, the summer skies above us are so often filled with flying snowflakes, what kind of snow is likely produced within those dense, rapidly expanding, wind-summer much greater dimensions and specific gravity than do similar snow forms in winter and spring. Doubtless, during heavy rainfalls, and especially during the so-called cloudbursts, the upper portions of the clouds are filled with snow crystals and granular snow, to a degree of density almost inconceivably great.

Could we but take an aerial journey upward, and pass successively through the various vertical cloud strata, from the summit, during a thunder-shower, at the exact moment when precipitation commences, what marvelous sights we might behold! We should see, as we entered the base of a thunder-cloud, the minute water particles meeting together into minute rain-drops the largest of which would fall downward. Higher within the cloud larger drops would form, blown together by wind action, or drawn together by attractive forces. The cold would now be so intense that snow crystals would occasionally form. Still higher within the cloud we would enter the main of the Frost King, and the cloud would be full of falling snow crystals. The minute water molecules freely floating there would be intensely active, swarming around, attaching themselves to the growing crystals. Many of the crystals would be so light and feathery, that the expanding uprushing winds would carry them along with us as we passed upward to near the apex, the summit of the cloud. Meanwhile, they would continue to grow in size and specific gravity, until they would fall back toward earth, gathering, as they did so, cloud and granular material to themselves until they became heavy and of large size.

The summits of thunder-clouds often attain to a height of from 30,000 to 40,000 feet. Indeed, observers have measured such, on rare occasions, possessing a height of seven or ten miles. Here is to be sought the explanation of why lofty, isolated peaks, even in tropical regions, are covered with perpetual snow.

The largest rain-drops are doubtless produced within those terrible whirl storms called tornadoes. These drops have as yet been unmeasured, so far as known. The largest produced within thunderstorms occur simultaneously and associated with the formation of hailstones; and doubtless owe their origin to the melting of enormous granular snow-pellets, or loosely-constructed hailstones. These monster drops sometimes attain to 1-3 to 1-2 of an inch diameter. The largest of those common-produced within ordinary thunderstorms and severe storms, rarely exceed 1-4 of an inch in diameter. Indeed, the great majority of the larger drops of a given heavy rainfall commonly possess diameters of but 1-8 to 1-12 of an inch. The smaller drops possess various diameters, all way from 1-12 of an inch to microscopic drops too minute to measure by ordinary methods (1-100 of an inch or less in diameter); large, medium and small drops are produced simultaneously, but more rarely the rainfall consists wholly of large, or of medium-sized drops alone.

agitated summer clouds, the melting of which produces so much of the rainfall? As a rule, not the clear, transparent, beautifully symmetrical crystals, such as often fall in winter, nor often the perfect star.

For the reason that the lower air in summer is so much warmer and moister, and also because the summer clouds often possess vastly greater vertical dimensions than do winter clouds, and are, moreover, more violently agitated by expanding, uprushing winds, it may be assumed that the snow pellets, and, indeed, all of the snow forms, attain in

A Monument to Answered Prayer

THERE is an ever-growing monument to a prayer-answering God in the city of Pittsburg, Pa. This work of faith was mentioned by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD some two months after its opening, which is now over two and a-half years ago. Rev. Charles H. Pridgen and his wife were the chosen founders. For some years these two had been praying for such a work. After a whole night of special intercession, a telegram was received from a distance, and the offer was made to furnish them with a building. A large church with a parsonage was bought in due time by the same patron. It is situated at the corner of Wylie Avenue and Congress Street.

On Dec. 8, 1901, the Pittsburg Bible Institute and the Wylie Avenue Church were opened. The work, modestly begun, has slowly but surely increased. The number of students (young men and women), and the membership of the Institute and of the undenominational and inter-denominational church have grown every year. The Bible is the text-book, and a general historical idea is given of each book, to which are added doctrinal teaching, biblical theology, Christian evidences, and the spiritual application. Quite a large Sunday School is held in connection with the church, and many little waifs are taught side by side with the children of the well-to-do.

One of the recent developments of the work has been the providing of a place for conducting a rescue work for fallen girls. This effort has been greatly blessed. Some of the rescued have been restored to their homes, some have married, and some are in Christian work.

A MEETING IN THE RESCUE MISSION OF THE PITTSBURG BIBLE INSTITUTE

There is a Gospel work also among the foreign population of the city, and hundreds who cannot speak English have been given the Gospel in their own tongue. A "Lord's watch," with constant prayer, is held daily from 9 to 12 A. M.

Hundreds of requests have been presented at this meeting, which is open to all to send requests for prayer free of charge.

In close proximity to the Wylie Avenue Church and the Bible Institute, which is in the very heart of the city of Pittsburg, is a large building which has also been given to the work in answer to prayer. It is used as a Student Home, and contains ample accommodations for the purpose. Here the students have a co-operative board system, as in many colleges, which reduces the individual outlay to a minimum, and fosters the spirit of individual effort. Most of the work in the Home is done by the students.

All the buildings are electrically lighted, and a large printing plant, a gift of another friend, is run by electricity. The printing plant, when new, cost over $20,000.

The principle of this whole work the founders assure us, is that its needs are never made public, and there are no collections or public appeals. From the beginning until the present time simple prayer has been the only means employed. The result is a wonderful demonstration of the power of faith and prevailing prayer.

With Our Squadron at Shanghai

"wandering boy to-night?" and one rose up in the darkness and went out, conscience-stricken. He told us this afterward. "Sowing the Seed" followed; then the God Shepherd going out on the mountains to seek the lost one; and another representing the Shepherd's return, with the lost sheep safe folded in His arms. As I sang, another young sailor rose and went out, struggling with his convictions, and unexpectedly found the fit sailor, his friend, doing the same thing. They clasped each other by the hand and said, "We've wandered long enough, let us come home to-night"; and come they did, and a number more of their shipmates followed. "My Mother's Bible," "My Name in Mother's Prayer," "The Latch of Father's Door," and "The Toils of the Road will seem Nothing when we get to the End of the Way," have been often blessed in the singing, as parents, teachers and pastors at home were vividly recalled, and decisions have been made for eternity. We usually carry little printed "covenants" for the men to sign, and keep as souvenirs. Laid away in their "diddy boxes," they retain pledges of promise to friends at home, and the men all appreciate a visible token. Sometimes they write at the bottom, after the signature, and those of friends who "witness" signing also: "Send this to my mother when I'm gone," but oftener they sign as they "sign on" for Christ, with face illuminated with the manly resolve, "I wish you'd write, and send this to my mother."

Another sunny-faced lad we always recall with pleasure. He told us he got so reproved every time he looked at his Bible, coming out, that he threw it overboard! Being not far from the Philippines, another was sent out to rescue it, and it was given to one who prized it so much that it became the "Lamp to his feet." Now both lads are shining brightly on the mess-deck, for Jesus. One lad, on the same ship, saw a little "covenant" lying on the deck, thrown down by a boy, who said, "I can't keep it," and with a sudden impulse of reverence he picked it up, and soon after signed it himself.

Our reception on the American ships is usually unexceptional, as far as the officers are concerned; but, of course, the boys and men must be won to attend the sea services. A programme, printed on dainty Chinese or Japanese paper and distributed, is an attractive means of gaining their attention, and if the programme referred is correspondingly attractive, the attendance will increase from week to week, until, practically, the whole ship is with us. Flowers are also appreciated, especially in the sick bays, and cards, papers like THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, etc. A lady in Colorado sent us 200 Easter cards this year, and armed with these dainty souvenirs, programmes, and blossoms, we began work on a shipboard that has been our most phenomenal success of all the year. If the looks of surprised gratitude on those boys' faces could have been photographed and reproduced in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, we are sure a thousand friends would mail us Easter cards in 1905. When we approach the ships on Sunday mornings and see Old Glory hoisted above all the pennants, as the "Church Flag," and streaming magnificently in the sunlight, our hearts thrill with patriotism as we step

Hongkong recently arrived at Woosung, and "general leave" was granted to their men, and our Americans also, for several days, at the rate of about 2,000 a day. Our streets were full of sailors, and when night came, sleeping accommodation was quite inadequate. Our doors were open, and many cheerfully took the opportunity of sleeping in the Mission Chapel; American boys came to the door late at night and begged to be taken in off the streets. Some, we are told, slept in their jinrikishas and in alleyways, or wherever night overtook them. That was a grand week of Gospel "harvesting," many were won back to righteousness, and no doubt will remember the week in Shanghai as "the place where they first saw the Light."

We do our best to get the men to form a little Bible class on board, and are gratified to hear of its success in some instances. A gentleman on the Cincinnati wrote from Chemulpo, that the Bible class formed in Shanghai was the brightest thing on the ship. Sometimes we hear the rumble of distant artillery operations at Port Arthur, here in Weihaiwei (where we are for the midsummer) and we can only hope that our sisters in the great family of nations—England and America—will not be drawn into international complications. The United States and British fleets are hovering on the outskirts.

A sweet little girl in Shanghai went with us on a ship one Sunday, and, mounted on a box, spoke the following little poem. It led one stalwart young Virginian to "stop and think," and was used to bring him back to God. The subject is a question, and is it not the best thing we can do, and keep on asking the men to do, for the Salvation of the boys in the Navy.

Each evening, ere I slumbered, on my little cot of pine,
Into my chamber entered the little mother mine,
And bending gently o'er me, in accents soft and mild,
Would question, ere she kissed me, "And have you prayed, my child?"

And thus she came each evening, and questioned o'er and o'er,
'Till death came in between us, and us asunder tore;
But better far than riches which on other lives have smiled,
To me was mother's question, "And have you prayed, my child?"

For now, when troubles press me, and the heart will nigh despair,
Because its path and anguish with no one it can share,
The heart will cease its beatings—complaining loud and wild,
If I remember mother's, "And have you prayed, my child?"

on board and feel as if "on American soil." Then to see the audience assemble, as on U. S. S. Cincinnati, under Commander Mason, for Sunday service attendance—from 150 to 200 men pouring into the seats, and filling up all the nooks and corners—is a sight to inspire even the least enthusiastic.

Our Mission Home in Shanghai is open to the lads, and the growing desire of our hearts is to do more for them while on shore, in the way of homelike evenings, and a place of refuge from the temptations of the streets. Since the war in Manchuria began, the Russian and Jewish population in Shanghai has steadily increased, every steamer bringing in the flotsam and jetsam that defy all law and morality. Our American settlement is beginning to teem with places of vice, newly opened, and we had too many already. One bright lad, still trying to walk in "mother's way," said pathetically one night: "There's not a place in Shanghai where a boy can spend an evening without a bar-room;" and it is practically true. The British fleet from

A COLORADO FLYER WRECKED

REMOVING THE BODIES FROM THE OVERTURNED CHAIR-CAR

RAISING THE WRECKED LOCOMOTIVE FROM THE BED OF THE DRY CREEK

SCENES IN THE GREAT RAILROAD WRECK AT EDEN, COLO.

NEARLY eighty people were killed in the wreck of the Missouri Pacific's World's-Fair Flyer, which left Denver, Colo., on the night of August 7, en route for St. Louis. A cloudburst had filled the channel of Steele's Hollow, near Eden, a few miles north of Pueblo, where a bridge ninety-six feet long and fifteen feet high, spans the chasm. Although the hollow was full of water when the train approached the bridge, the engineer, seeing that rails and ties were in place, failed to check his train, but dashed up the bridge at full speed.

Then occurred a scene of indescribable horror. The train dropped through the bridge. The baggage-car and smoker were crushed by the engine, while the chair-car broke loose and floated away on the raging waters. All but three of the occupants of this car lost their lives, as the car careened along to a point half a mile away.

Mr. Charles Van Schlacks, vice-president and general manager of the railroad, said, after the accident, "He could not believe that the engineer, who perished in the wreck, was at fault, for he was one of the most careful and trusted men in the company's employ." The point at which the wreck occurred is on the eastern slope of the Rockies, where there is a gradual incline from the Kansas plains to the mountains. The railroad track runs parallel with Fountain River, crossing and recrossing it. The cloudburst in the foothills poured down through one of the dry creeks to the river, completely choking the stream and sweeping everything before it.

In telling the story of the wreck, one of the survivors says: "At the very first crash, the lights in the cars went out. In the rush of the current and the darkness, I could see no one, but the screams were awful. I floated on a tie for over a mile before I drifted to land, the rain falling in torrents, and the thunder rolling continuously, while vivid flashes of lightning illuminated the awful scene."

The porter of the forward sleeping-car, when he felt the shock, set the brakes, thus stopping the two sleepers and the dining-car on the very brink of the torrent. An umbrella found standing upright in the sand, buried to the handle, would indicate that many bodies may have been buried deeply in the sand.

Our Symposium

REPLIES to the question, Whether the Church is for Saints or for Sinners, have come in such numbers that we have been able to print only a small portion of them in our present issue and in that of August 3. They show how strong is the interest aroused and how diverse are the opinions of the writers.

There is evidently a closer agreement among our correspondents than appears on the surface. Those who hold that the Church is for saints, believe that sinners should be cordially welcomed to the pews, and admitted to fellowship when they give evidence of conversion. Those who hold that the Church is for sinners, qualify their statement by the condition that they should be repentant sinners, who are seeking a holier life. Thus the difference between the two is not very wide, and the only practical diversity is whether the sinner should be put on probation for a time before being admitted to fellowship.

It is obvious that an open sinner, who continues in sin, and has no sorrow for it, nor any desire to abandon it, is out of place in a church. It is well that he should hear the Gospel, and every encouragement should be given him to attend the services. Some word may be blessed of the Holy Spirit to his soul; the warnings and the invitations which our Lord authorizes us to give, may lead him to renounce his sin and come to Christ for salvation. He is of the raw material out of which saints are made, and it is for the rescue of such that the Church is bidden to strive. But, as one of our correspondents points out, to admit such a person to fellowship before he gave evidence of a change of attitude, would be to do the Church harm by introducing a leaven of evil, and to do the person himself harm, by lulling his conscience to sleep. The Church is an organization of believers, who are pledged to follow Christ, who are seeking to become like him and who are striving against sin. It is not an organization of perfect people, but of people who are aiming at perfection. If the sinner has that aim, if he is trusting in Christ and sincerely desiring to be delivered from sin, he is eligible, though he may be a long way behind his fellow-members in attainment. The difference between the sinner who is eligible for fellowship, and the one who is not, is the difference of attitude. One who has turned his back on sin, and is seeking deliverance, deserves, and should receive, all the help the Church can give; while he, who loves sin, and is making no effort to abandon it, is not in sympathy with the members of Christ's Church, and can have no real fellowship with them.

On the question of probation, there is, and always must be, a difference of opinion. There is, however, a growing disposition to dispense with it, except in cases where the applicant for membership is of an impulsive, shallow temperament, and there is ground for suspicion that the desire for admission is transient. The entire period of membership is a probation, inasmuch as the Church reserves to itself the power to exclude at any time a member who is walking unworthily. It may therefore be doubted whether a formal period of probation, implying a suspicion of motive, answers any useful purpose. A cordial welcome, a glad acceptance, will do more to strengthen an applicant's good resolution, than a close and suspicious scrutiny, that suggests doubt and indicates distrust.

Women and Strikes

OUR distant readers may need to be reminded that "The Martha Washington" is a very large, commodious, and beautiful hotel, built in New York for the exclusive occupation of women, and primarily designed to furnish working-women with a comfortable home, within the limits of a modest income.

New York readers know the hotel, of which the town feels justly proud, so well has it thus far justified the expectations of those to whom its erection was the realization of a long-sought ideal.

A little while ago, the housekeeper, an efficient person, who had been in charge of the house from its opening, was discharged by the manager, a new arrival, who was naturally making changes. Disturbed at her removal, every woman employed in the hotel and three men immediately went on strike. The usual disorganization followed. The patrons waited on themselves. The cooking was temporarily suspended, and the smooth running order was interrupted. This is not what we wish to speak of. The Martha Washington can soon secure another force of workers, and it is most improbable that the retiring brigade will offer any serious opposition to their undertaking their duties; but the question is, are women at last going to organize, to strike, to resent their grievances about hours, wages and any supposed injustice, as men do, and if so, where will it end?

Heretofore, there has been little of the coercive element in the protests women have made, when things have not satisfied them. Generations of Eve's daughters have calmly endured injustice under every sky, rather than resort to extreme measures. Perhaps there are cases in which advantage has been taken of their patience. An employer who would hesitate to do an injustice to a man who was a member of a Union, might oppress a woman with impunity. But it would appear that now there is to be a change. If the women organize, and make it a principle to stand together, it will no longer be safe to do an injustice to any member of the sisterhood. The possibility of a strike taking place, might act as a wholesome restraint on capricious employers, and a protection to the weak. The women are evidently learning that in union there is strength, but we may hope that the strength will be used with discretion. Strikes are always to be deprecated and should only be used as a last resort when all other measures fail. In following the example of the men, they may wisely remember that, only too often, the men have learned by bitter experience, that a strike entails suffering on themselves as well as a loss to their employers. They, too, may have to realize that a half loaf is better than no bread.

Vain Ambitions

TRAVELERS passing through a desert, discovered a boulder which had been buried perhaps for ages in that sterile wilderness, and now had been partially revealed by a sand-storm. Examining the stone, they found it apparently a fragment of some great sculpture or monument. On searching further they were encouraged by finding other pieces of stone, which, though worn smooth by long exposure to the elements and the ceaseless friction of the desert sands, still retained some traces of human workmanship. At last they uncovered what seemed to be the base or pedestal of a mighty statue or monolith. Upon it was an inscription, which, after much labor, they deciphered and copied. When this was submitted to eminent scholars, the latter pronounced it an unknown language. After many futile efforts, these learned men succeeded in finding the key to this strange tongue, and translated the words of the inscription. It ran:

My name is Ozymandias—King of kings!
Look on my works, ye mighty, and despair!

Who was Ozymandias? Over what vast realm and multitudinous peoples did this great monarch rule? Where was his capital; where his court? What were his palaces, his temples, his cities, and the records of his illustrious achievements? Where the "works" which were to be the despair of coming generations? Alas! The desert, with its sea of sand dunes, and its dreary solitudes, keeps its secret well. Time and the elements have blotted him out as completely as though he had never been. His dream of imperishable fame was a vain one, like all others that are dreamed of achievements not founded upon the eternal laws of justice, truth, and righteousness.

A gigantic struggle for conquest is now going on in the Eastern world, in which the West may even yet be involved. When all is passed and ended, it may be that, like Ozymandias, those ambitious spirits that stirred up world-strife by the launching of vast projects, will only fail of historic immortality, but will be utterly forgotten, while the memory of the good and the true lives on through the ages.

Pastor Sheldon and the Saloon

A NOTABLE, though belated, contribution to "The Bishop and the Saloon" controversy is given below. Pastor Sheldon, in all his books, sermons and his church work, has been so prominently and vigorously outspoken for Christian temperance, that his present expression of opinion will be read with general interest:

"EDITOR OF THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

"Dear Sir:—Your communication relative to Bishop Potter and his address on the occasion of the dedication of the Subway Tavern, New York, has just reached me, forwarded here (Tolchaco, Arizona). It is probably now too late for the expression of opinion you asked for, but I venture to send a brief statement.

"1. Bishop Potter's address, as a whole, was a source of much pleasure to the brewers, saloon-keepers, and 'moderate drinkers' of the country. When a minister of the Gospel of Jesus gives encouragement to the liquor business, it seems to me there is something wrong somewhere.

"2. The history of temperance legislation in Kansas proves that one of the greatest successes in legislation has been a result, not 'one of the most tragic failures of modern history.' The people of Kansas to-day, as a whole, are more for their prosperity, peace and moral well-being to the Prohibitory amendment than to any other legislative enactment.

"3. I believe the true attitude of the Church and Christianity towards the saloon and the whole liquor business generally, including drinking, 'moderate,' or any other kind, is uncompromising hostility. The saloon has no more right to exist than a counterfeiter's den, or a professional burglar's outfit. There is less harm done in a year by all the thieves and burglars of the United States, than by the saloons and breweries in one day.

"The saloon is evil, and only evil. It has not one redeeming quality. The people who sell intoxicating drink are actuated by any motives of philanthropy or brotherhood. Their business is to make money out of a human passion.

"When a Bishop of a Christian Church rises to defend or encourage the drink habit, the devil rejoices, and all lovers of Jesus and his kingdom feel their hearts beat with sorrow and shame.

Great Battles Recalled

FULL of interest will be the army manoeuvres which are planned to take place on the old battle-ground of Manassas Junction. Following the example of European nations, the War Department decided, some time ago, on giving our soldiers and the National Guard an opportunity of seeing in battle formation. The ordinary drill, however thorough, gives the soldier but little idea of the duties he has to perform in great combinations. The most efficient preparation for actual warfare, it has been found, is a sham battle, and when it was decided to hold one, the field of Manassas was chosen, not only the most suitable but as the one consecrated by the thrilling memories of the war. It is proposed to assemble 35,000 men of all arms on the historic field, and divide them into two opposing armies. The mimic struggle will resolve itself into a test of strategic skill; bridges are to be built by the engineers, entrenchments will be dug and military telegraph lines will be set up. Men from New England will be ranged in the same army with men from the South, and will meet in friendly conflict an army composed of similar elements. In this case, the conditions will differ from those of the memorable battles of the sixties, in the fact that the farmers whose lands and crops may be injured will receive compensation from the Government. Still more will they differ in the spirit of the troops engaged. In the old battles, fierce passions, deadly animosity and sectional hatred held sway, while now representatives of both sides will join in amicable rivalry under one flag. The efficiency of the manoeuvres are designed to prove, we trust, never bested. In our internal relations, and in our dealings with foreign nations, we may hope to avoid the horrors of war, not so much by cultivating the military spirit, as by fulfilling the conditions of God's promise to his people:

The work of righteousness shall be peace; and the effect of righteousness, quietness and assurance for ever (Isaiah 32: 17).

Fraudulent Citizenship

Orders came from Washington to New York last week to set a case of naturalization. A man had applied to the State Department for a passport, and at his naturalization papers evidence of his right to one. Something in the character of his application excited suspicion. The citizen was therefore examined. It appeared from his answers that he is a native of Haiti, and was entirely unacquainted with Hartford, Conn., where, according to his naturalization certificate, he had spent the five years aliens are required to be in the United States before being entitled to naturalization. The District Attorney who conducted the examination, and the Government had been informed that a man in Haiti or in Central or South America could buy a certificate purporting to naturalize him as a citizen of the United States for a price varying from two to seven hundred dollars. This certificate enabled him to escape certain payments and avoid certain duties that his Government demands of its own citizens, while not performing any duties of American citizenship. It is supposed that the Haitian must have been induced to purchase such papers and came to this country to obtain a passport by them, which would be of further advantage to him. He was detained, pending fuller examination. It is not thought that the man was guilty of an attempt to obtain citizenship by fraud, but that he was duped by wicked men, who, taking advantage of his ignorance of our laws, led him to believe that naturalization in the United States could be obtained by purchase, without residence and without the examination of a court. Unhappily, there have been many who have fallen into similar error in seeking citizenship in the kingdom of God. They have thought that by large gifts to churches and charities they could enter the kingdom without that change of nature which is essential.

Thou hast thought that the gift of God may be purchased with money. Thou hast neither part nor lot in this matter, for thy heart is not right (Acts 8: 20).

Heroism in a Lighthouse

The story of heroic devotion to the public interest was related to the Lighthouse Board on Aug. 13, by Major W. E. Craighill. It appears that there is a lighthouse on Cat Island, a lonely rock on the Mississippi coast. It is a remote spot rarely visited. The lighthouse keeper and his wife sometimes did not see a human being for several days at a time. One day recently the keeper did not come in at his usual hour, and his wife, going out to ascertain the cause, found his dead body on the rock. He had died from heart disease. The woman was overwhelmed with grief, but, knowing that some ship might be wrecked if the light did not burn, she put aside her sorrow and went to the chamber and lighted the lamp. It is a revolving light, but something was wrong with the mechanism, and it would not turn. She found that she could turn it with her hands, and this she did all night long. No one came to the rock the next day, and again that night she turned the light through the long weary hours. Not till late on the following night did any one come to her relief. The Major urged the Lighthouse Board to ignore precedent and make the woman the keeper of the lighthouse as a reward for her devotion. It must have been hard for her to leave the corpse of her husband on the rock, while she passed the night turning the lamp; but there come occasions in life when natural impulses and the desires of natural affection should yield to the dictates of conscience and higher duties. The reproof our Lord administered to a man in his day, shows that he expects that behavior of all his followers.

Follow thou me, and let the dead bury their dead (Matt. 8: 22).

Ancient Surgery

During a recent journey in New Mexico, undertaken to investigate the relics of the old cliff-dwellers, a correspondent of the Post, of Denver, Colo., found remarkable evidence of ancient surgical skill. He examined about thirty skulls which had been collected from the old burying grounds, and among them was one which had been skilfully trephined. It has hitherto been supposed that the art of trephining was one of the triumphs of modern surgery, but this is indubitable evidence that the cliff-dweller whose skull had been fractured had received excellent surgical treatment, and had recovered from his injuries. The man had been struck with such force as to shatter the bone, leaving a hole the size of a quarter of a dollar, and from that, as a centre, fractures about two inches long extended in all directions. The cliff-dweller surgeon had cleared away the fragments of bone, and had covered the hole with a species of cement. Nature had healed the fractures perfectly, and the injured man had apparently lived many years after the operation. Whatever there is to be said for our new machinery, it would appear that in surgery, our devices are not so original as we had supposed. The ancient preacher is found to have been justified in his assertion.

Is there anything whereof it may be said, See, this is new? it hath been already of old time, which was before us (Eccles. 1: 10).

Profit from Eavesdropping

A prominent stockbroker in New York, tells a story of successful speculation due to the intelligence and promptitude of an eavesdropper. He received a visit one day from a man who was evidently unaccustomed to Wall Street transactions. The man asked him to purchase all the shares he could of a particular class. He had only two thousand dollars, but he wanted it used as a margin, in order that he might secure more shares than could actually be purchased with the money. The broker was convinced that his customer must have gained some inside information, otherwise he would not have so much confidence. He pressed him to let him into his secret, and finally, on the promise to transact his business for him to his advantage, he learned the facts. The man was a waiter in the restaurant of a hotel, which was frequented by wealthy dealers in stocks. Some of them had been dining there, and he overheard them discussing a plan for depressing the value of the shares, with the design of making a huge profit when they rose in price. The waiter saw in the stock market reports that their scheme was succeeding, and he resolved to share in the speculation. The broker helped him in his operations; and the men who had planned the scheme, found to their surprise, that some one had forestalled them by getting possession of the shares. The waiter made a large fortune by his speculation. He owes it to the fact that he was alert in availing himself of information not intended for him. He showed more wisdom than do men who, when they are offered spiritual riches, neglect the opportunity.

The children of this world are in their generation wiser than the children of light (Luke 16: 8).

BRIEF NOTES

France is having the hottest summer it has known in half a century. Several times the thermometer registered 103 in the shade.

In an address replying to congratulations on his eightieth birthday, Dr. John Paton said that, if he were beginning life over again, he would choose the career of a missionary to the heathen.

Ramon Corral, the recently elected Vice-President of Mexico, is a millionaire and a skilful lawyer. President Diaz deems him the most fitting man to succeed him. He is about fifty years of age.

In Zurich, Switzerland, the authorities are considering a proposal to levy a tax of one dollar a year per head, in return for which every inhabitant will be entitled to free medical attendance by physicians maintained by the municipality.

In Moukden, in Manchuria, now one of the chief points occupied by the retreating Russian army, there is an excellent medical mission station of the Presbyterian Church. The chief director is Dr. Christie, a Scotchman. The number of native Christians in Manchuria is estimated at thirty thousand.

A party of 465 boys from Dr. T. J. Barnardo's homes in England, has arrived in Canada. This makes an aggregate of 15,762 young people, chiefly street waifs, who have been sent from these homes. Careful record is kept of their conduct after their arrival on this side. The average of failures is less than two in the hundred.

"FOR YOU AND FRANCE"

SHE was at Vienna at the time. When the package was laid at her feet, the messenger withdrawing for the moment, recognizing the writing, her hand shook so that she could scarcely tear off the wrapping. As she gazed upon the hated flag of the Republic, and read what her lover had done, she lifted the paper to her lips and kissed it where it had been written "For you and France." Before she realized what she was doing, she wrote him half a dozen words, which meant more to him than all the formal acknowledgments and greetings she had sent him in four years.

"Monsieur, I wait. I hope—for—France—and—" The sentence was ended in a dash. Her hand trembled when she wrote at the bottom of the page "Louise de Vaudémont." After she had given it to the messenger, and he had gone beyond recall, she would have given worlds to have recalled and destroyed the letter. But, in truth, the splendor of such a gift in such a way, had dazzled her. It had been nearly a year since she had heard from him, and she had lost control of herself for the time being. With pardonable vanity she sometimes stood before her glass and wished that Macartney could see her now. For if he loved her then, what would he think of her to-day?

The promises of her early years had been marvelously fulfilled. She had blossomed into a perfect woman nobly planned. A true ocean daughter, she, the blue of the sparkling sea shone in her eye; the gold of the sunlight gleamed in her hair. The strength and vigor of the salt air had given her health and strength and grace. She rode the storms of life as buoyantly as the ship which had given her birth had done. A true daughter of wave-washed Brittany, a fitting bride for a sea king.

Brébœuf adored her. She was the reincarnation of the young matron he had followed from the iron shores of Finistère to the smiling hills and valleys of Provence, when she first left Morbihan a bride. Aurore, most devoted of humble friends and familiar companions, would have given her life for her.

When the old marquis delivered the message Macartney had given him at London, he watched his granddaughter keenly. Under his severe scrutiny she had not been able to preserve her impassivity, the artificial calmness of her rank and station. The blood had leaped into her face at the words her lover said. She had been forced to turn away in confusion, unable to sustain her grandfather's penetrating gaze. Well versed was the old man in the ways of men and women, and his heart sunk with pity at the uselessness of it all as he looked upon his granddaughter.

"My child," he said firmly but with tenderness—he was loath to give her pain, and there was little of happiness to the exiles then—"your way and this man's way lie apart. He can never be anything more to you than he is to-day."

"Here he is enough to me to-day, monsieur," answered the girl, with some of his own directness and courage, laying her hand on her heart as she spoke. "Do you—care so much for this man?"

For answer she put her face in her hands and turned away.

"I—I love him," she murmured. "But there—have no fear, my grandfather—I am for—France." She smiled piteously through the tears that trembled on her lashes. "We will say no more about it if it pleases you, sir."

CHAPTER XVI

THE REPUBLICANISM OF BRÉBŒUF

THE destination of the expedition of General Bonaparte, the invincible young soldier of the Republicans, had been concealed from everyone with extraordinary care and success. That something important was in the air, however, which would take General Bonaparte from France, was well understood in the Chancelleries of the various powers, who were arrayed openly or secretly against Republican France.

"Citoyen Vaudémont, be seated," said Garron.—"The women will stand"

It was evident to the wise heads who governed European politics, that the individual most to be reckoned with in fighting France was the young general, who had immortalized himself in Italy. It was patent that if a blow was to be struck for the restoration of the Bourbon kingdom, no better opportunity could be found than that presented by the absence of Bonaparte on his great expedition.

La Vendée, then, as always, loyal to the crown, was again ready to revolt. The Marquis de Vaudémont had offered to go there as the representative of the king and endeavor to raise nobles and peasants equally devoted to the Bourbon cause, in rebellion against the Republic. With Bonaparte adventuring somewhere on the sea they felt certain of success.

Honoré de Vaudémont, with a few adventurous spirits for assistants, and with the sanction of his king and of his grandfather, of course, had entered upon a perilous but promising undertaking of his own, which was no less than the abduction of Bonaparte. For this purpose the young man had resigned his commission in the Austrian army and had enlisted in the French army under the name of Captain Honoré. Influence and the judicious expenditure of money had even secured him a lieutenant's commission on the personal guard of General Bonaparte. It was hoped that some opportunity might arise during the general absence in which he might be seized and turned over to the Royalists. Some of the more desperate in the plot had inclined toward assassination, but Honoré Vaudémont was too noble for murder, and that idea had been given over. Therefore, when Bonaparte had embarked in the Orient, Honoré had been one of the soldiers detailed to that ship.

Pursuant to the plan, the marquis, accompanied by his granddaughter, who positively refused to be left behind, repaired to Genoa, incognito, of course, and there had taken passage for himself and the comtesse and the two servants on a small Spanish brig bound for Brittany. They sailed from Genoa on the 20th of May. According to the best advice they could obtain, Bonaparte would not leave Toulon until nearly the first of June. This, the marquis calculated, would enable him to reach Brittany at La Vendée, just as the dreaded French general took his departure.

Unfortunately, however, the armada sailed on the 19th, and they had the luck to be overhauled by one of the convoying line of battle-ships, on the extreme flank of the great fleet. The officer who boarded the Spanish brig at once perceived that the marquis was a Frenchman. That he was of the régime was as apparent as the other fact. The brig was detained, and the marquis was ordered to board the ship of-the-line in question.

The French ship was a magnificent vessel called Le Tonnant, rated as an eighty-gun ship. She was commanded by the marquis' ancient enemy, Master Jean Garron, now capitaine de vaisseau in the Republican navy. Overjoyed at his opportunity, Garron detained the marquis, sent an armed crew to the Spanish brig, had the comtesse and the two servants brought to the ship, signalled to the admiral that nothing of importance had been found on the prize and quietly kept to himself the fact that he had taken some prisoners on board his ship.

The marquis instantly realizing the predicament in which he was soon to be involved, would have killed him on sight had he not been deprived of his weapons as soon as he boarded the ship. The officers who had fetched the comtesse and the others to Le Tonnant had told her nothing, save that her grandfather had been detained and desired her presence. She had gone willingly, of course. What was her horror and surprise to be met at the gangway hat in hand, by the man she had never forgotten, for he had caused the death of her father; and whom she hated and despised above all others for that, and because he had aspired to her hand. Her grandfather stood by, outwardly imperturbable, inwardly overwhelmed with rage and dismay.

The captain offered his hand to the girl as she came over the side, but she turned from him with a haughty gesture, refusing to touch him. Brébœuf, who came last, was, of course, infinitely astonished. He had accustomed himself, however, in the service of the marquis, to the habit of self-control, so, in accordance with his nature, he betrayed no emotion of any sort. He did, however, come to a sudden and astonishing resolution. On occasion Brébœuf could think as swiftly as he spoke slowly.

When the eyes of the Breton fell upon his master and Garron; when his mind grasped the situation, the impossible happened. While Garron stared at him with an evil, sinister glance, the sailor walked deliberately up to the marquis and struck him a smart blow upon the breast. Had the heaven itself opened, the

And noble could not have been more astonished. Then he Breton turned to Garron.

"Vive la République!" he said.

The captain laughed venomously.

"So your old servant has at last turned, has he?" he asked. "That's a brave lad. He's seen the light. Will you serve the Republic?" he asked, turning to Brébœuf.

The man nodded. He had already spoken more than he usually did and did not intend to waste any more words. Garron knew him and his habits of old. "You are tired of this ci-devant, monsieur, eh?"

Brébœuf nodded again.

"They all desert you, Citizen Vaudémont," cried Garron. "I will take you in to my service, Brébœuf. You can attend personally upon me, worthy citizen. Is that what you would like?"

Brébœuf nodded so violently that one might think that his head would be shaken off.

Dupetit Thouars, capitaine de frégate, the executive officer of the ship, with a look of intense disgust on his handsome face at his captain's insolence and discourtesy, bowed low before the marquis and signed to him to precede him toward the cabin. But the marquis stood petrified with amazement, staring at Brébœuf.

"You, you!" he cried at last. "Who for years have been my bread! You, whom I thought as faithful, as loyal as myself, to take advantage of this opportunity! Mon Dieu! Give me a sword, some one, that I may kill the slave!"

"Ugh! You traitor!" screamed Aurore, dashing at Brébœuf with uplifted hands, as if she would hurl herself upon him, which, indeed, she was only prevented from doing by the interposition of two of the sailors who seized her and held her firmly.

"Come, monsieur," said Garron. "Be calm, Aurore." "Brébœuf has deserted us," said the marquis, slowly turning away. "There is no longer loyalty in man!" The Breton rolled his eyes, moistened his lips, stared at the retreating forms of his master and mistress, gulped, a convulsive effort, and finally he managed to crawl out in his deep voice four words, which they heard as they entered the cabin.

"A bas les aristocrates!"

Surely he was becoming voluble!

Again Garron laughed that ugly laugh. Beckoning the Breton, he stalked after the others toward his cabin, while the ship rang with laughter and cheers for the new, if belated, convert to Republicanism.

The opportunity which fate had furnished Garron as one that he meant to use to the fullest limit. At the first sight of the young comtesse, his old determination to make her his wife had instantly renewed itself with an astonishing accession of desire. Not to win her matters, Garron was a brute. His importance in France had greatly diminished in the five years that had passed. With the march of ideas in which, in spite of her excesses, France led the world and the age, he had not kept step. Had Jean Garron possessed real talent, or even a mediocre capacity, he might have been a flag by this time. As it was, he was lucky to retain his rank. Finding his influence vanishing more and more, he had resolved to enter into a correspondence with the English, from motives of self-interest which can easily be understood.

He had longed for an opportunity of betraying the destination of the expedition of which he was a part, the English; but in the first place, he had not known until the last minute, and in the second place, no safe means of communication had hitherto presented itself. That he lacked to consummate his treason to the Republic was opportunity. That would come sooner or later.

While waiting his chance for treason, he determined to enjoy himself with the marquis and Louise. The baggage of the de Vaudémont party had been brought aboard. It had been deposited in the captain's cabin, and Garron had broken open the portmanteaux in the presence of Thouars, and had then examined their contents, also. As luck would have it he found two papers. One was the plan of the projected uprising in La Vendée, of which the marquis was the head. The other was a memorandum of the conspiracy to kidnap General Bonaparte, which Comte Honoré was endeavoring to engineer.

Here was enough to hang the whole party to the gallows without delay. Indeed, both documents were of the greatest value. The rebellion in La Vendée could be a serious menace to the State. The conspiracy of Comte Honoré's threatened the life of him whom his countrymen regarded justly as the hope of France, and whom many people looked upon as the ostle of ideas and the ideal government throughout the world.

Garron's proper course was plain. He should instantly have laid both documents before his commanding-in-chief. In the interest of his private design, however, he chose to keep them to himself.

The day after the capture of the marquis and his party, Garron caused them to be summoned to his cabin. Le Tonnant, like most of the French eighties, is fitted for a flagship. He occupied the admiral's bin, and the vacant captain's quarters were given to a marquis, more through the insistence of Dupetit Thouars than from any desire on Garron's part to make them comfortable. Thouars, who came of a noble family of Brittany, and who had been a midshipman under de Vaudémont in the East Indies, had adhered to the cause of the Republic from conscientious scruples. He had been promoted rapidly until he had reached his present position. No more gallant officer, no better seaman ever trod a ship's deck than he, and it was a galling circumstance that he found himself under the command of such a vaurien as Garron. Indeed, the captain was detested thoroughly by the whole of the crew, and it was only Dupetit Thouars' strong personality, and the corresponding attachment for him by the crew, which maintained any discipline at all on the ship-of-the-line, and prevented it from becoming a hotbed of mutiny and disaffection.

Garron, who realized more or less of the situation, did not necessarily cross his powerful subordinate, and had sulkily acquiesced in the latter's insistence that the marquis and his party be quartered in the vacant cabin rather than in the steerage, where Garron had first indicated they should be disposed.

With the marquis were his granddaughter and Aurore. Aurore had sworn to throw herself into the sea if she were parted from Louise, and again Dupetit Thouars had intervened, so that her wishes had been granted.

CHAPTER XVII

GARRON HAS HIS PRICE

THE marquis found Garron seated at a table in his spacious cabin. Le Tonnant was an old ship which had been completely rebuilt in the last year. She had formerly been under the command of the marquis, and had once flown his commodore's broad pennant from her masthead. He knew her thoroughly. In her cabin he had almost felt at home. It was with a sense of shock, therefore, that his eye fell upon the squat, sinister, black-browed figure seated where he himself had sat years before.

"Citoyen Vaudémont, be seated. The women," with a glance toward Louise and Aurore, "will stand."

"While you remain seated," returned the marquis, "we will all stand."

"As you please. In pursuance of my duties as an officer of the Republic I have searched your baggage and have found this—"

The marquis was outwardly as impassive as if cut out of marble, although he at once recognized the papers which Garron held up, and which it had been a great imprudence for him not to have destroyed. Being more of a sailor than a diplomat, the marquis had forgotten that the thing that is reduced in writing is practically told to the winds. His heart rose in his throat as he saw in a flash the consequences of Garron's discovery. They would, of course, be laid instantly before Bonaparte. His grandson would be condemned and executed; his own life would be forfeited, the rebellion in La Vendée would be nipped in the bud before it had time to come to a head even.

And Louise! Alone on this ship in the power of this man! For once the marquis had played the fool. He had laid the stakes on the board and then put all his cards in his adversary's hand. The game, however, was not quite played out. Perhaps he could kill Garron where he sat and destroy the papers. They would kill him but the rest would go free, and the Royalists in La Vendée would not be discovered. He made a quick step toward the captain. He was without a weapon, of course, but such was his passion and his rage that although nearly seventy years of age, he felt that he could strangle Garron with his own hands. Nothing at all in the marquis' demeanor save that quick movement toward Garron had betrayed what was in his mind. The nobles of France lived behind a mask in those days. It was a part of their creed, but Garron instantly divined what the marquis would do.

"Brébœuf!" he called sharply, and the marquis found himself looking into the barrel of a pistol held by his ancient servitor. The Breton's hand did not tremble. With a dark, inscrutable face he glanced along the weapon which was pointed straight at the marquis' head. Another step and the marquis would be a dead man.

Nor would he have effected anything whatever by his endeavor. The old man stopped, shrugged his shoulders, took from his pocket a jeweled snuff-box and elaborately helped himself to a pinch.

"You do not offer me a pinch of snuff, Vaudémont," said Garron resentfully.

"I take snuff only with gentlemen, monsieur," returned the marquis calmly.

It was very dangerous thus to bait his captor, but for his life the marquis could not resist. The man became purple with rage. He tore at the stock around his neck. The marquis smiled satirically, turned away and looked indifferently out of the nearest port. The comtesse shrank nearer to him and laid her hand upon his arm. He patted it gently and reassuringly, and then Garron spoke again.

"You don't seem surprised," he said, recovering himself as best he could and returning to the papers.

"Pardon, monsieur, I am surprised—ah—that you can read them. That is all," said the marquis.

"Perdition!" shouted the captain. "I suppose you know what I am going to do with them."

"I know very well what I would do with them."

"What is that?"

"What any officer loyal to a cause, however mistaken it might be, would do."

"And that is?"

"Lay them before General Bonaparte at once."

"What good would that do me?" asked Garron.

"No good at all, monsieur," answered the marquis quickly, who began to see possibly there was a chance for him after all. "No good whatever, my good Garron. You would have your thanks for your pains. There are persons whom I need not mention who would give a great deal of money for these documents, and for my unworthy life as well, and it may be that such an argument might appeal to you."

"And do you think I am to be bought?"

"I do not think. I know you are," said the marquis with quiet contempt.

"We'll see," said Garron brutally. "The only question is the price."

"Ah!" said the vice-admiral.

"There is the price!"

As Garron spoke he rose and stepped toward Louise, at whom he pointed his finger. The girl did not shrink from him. She faced him as boldly, as coldly as the marquis himself, although her heart quivered at the man's approach. The marquis deftly stepped between the two.

"You ask too much, monsieur," said the old man. "We prefer the other alternative whatever it may be."

"We'll see about that," said Garron. "I am in no hurry. I'll wait until we get to Egypt and get rid of these soldiers. Until we have the ship to ourselves and General Bonaparte is busy on shore and then—we'll see!"

"And you think your value will be enhanced by our association with you, Garron?"

"I don't think anything about it," said the man roughly. "All I know is that you give me the comtesse, or she gives me herself, or these papers go to General Bonaparte. You know what would be your fate then?"

"The yard-arm, I suppose," said the marquis, shrugging his shoulders. "Well, 'tis not pleasant, this hanging death, I believe, but after one is dead it makes but little difference how one is killed. Although the method is one that does not commend itself to a gentleman, it will doubtless serve. Besides, we have been looking death in the face daily for so long a time, that to me, at least, it is not unwelcome."

"And how about the young comte?"

"He knew the risk when he entered upon this undertaking," said the vice-admiral.

"And the young comtesse?"

"She, too, can die."

"Die? Curse you!" laughed Garron. "Who said she was going to die? She shall live!"

"Monsieur, if you venture to lay a hand upon me," interrupted the young girl, "I will kill you and then myself!"

"You all talk well," answered Garron, looking hatefully from one to the other; "but I am master, and in the end 'tis my will, not yours, that will determine what happens."

"I demand as a prisoner of war, to see Admiral Brueys and General Bonaparte!" said the marquis. "He, at least, is a soldier and does not war upon defenseless women."

The old man intended to confess to Bonaparte the whole situation, realizing that he was bound to hear it anyway, and then appeal to him to protect his granddaughter. An appeal to the magnanimity of General Bonaparte he felt sure would bring about a mere nominal punishment for them. Hence, his demand of Garron.

"You are my prisoner," returned the captain of the ship, "and I will send you to Admiral Brueys and General Bonaparte when, or if, I please. Meanwhile, you will stay aboard this ship. Now, you can go! Confine yourselves to your cabin and the quarter-deck until I determine what's to be done."

The honors of the interview certainly, if the results be a criterion, were with Garron. There was nothing for the marquis to do but go. But he could at least repay Brébœuf for his treachery.

"Monsieur Garron," he said, as he turned away, "I will give you a word of advice. Do not trust the man behind you. He served me and mine for years, only to betray me yesterday. What he would do to me that he would also do to you—"

If the marquis could sow dissension between the two, Garron might make it unpleasant for the Breton. "If my hand had held that pistol I would have shot him down like the dog he is."

"You hear, Brébœuf?" laughed Garron. "How your former master thinks of you?"

"Ah," growled the old sailor with something of a snarl in his tones like that of an angry wolf.

"Have no fear for me, Vaudémont," said Garron, "I can take care of myself. And Citizen Brébœuf has just realized the blessings of liberty. He is my friend, not yours. Now, go!"

Luxury's Deadly Flower

QUARTERLY TEMPERANCE S. S. LESSON,
BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS*

STRANGE, great thoughts are my companions while I spend my days in the fields with my flocks. Men know me as 'Amos, the cowherd,' but God is speaking to me, and I am conscious I shall yet be known as Amos, the prophet of the Lord. That distinction, however, will bring me sorrow. How do I know it? Because those profligate people in yonder kingdom of Israel are ever in my thoughts, and when the prophet's work is given to me, it will be to reprove them. It should be an inspiration to me that on this very spot where I now am, brave young David fought and overcame the great giant Goliath. I wait God's bidding.

"It came to me last night, and the field about me was illumined with heavenly light. Distinctly I heard the Voice say: 'Go, and reprove my people Israel in my name.' And I am now upon my way, with a twenty-five mile journey ahead of me. I carry with me only my shepherd's staff and sling, for God is my defense. The wild beasts have no terror for me, neither have wicked and angry men. My message is my only care."

"I approach Jerusalem, where I may rest a night, but I may not tarry, for the King's business requires haste."

"I am approaching Bethel. I recall what Jacob said of it when he awoke out of the beautiful vision: 'This is none other than the house of God, and this is the gate of heaven.' Alas! how changed since then. It is now the house of the golden calf, and the gate of death. Even now I see the smoke of sacrifice arising to the calf. How can I refrain my indignation? I must remember that I am on God's errand. I wonder if I shall meet the king himself? I have been told that he takes upon himself the duties of a priest to the calf, conducting the sacrifices."

"I am now in Bethel, and I have taken counsel of the Lord as to what I shall say. I shall begin by declaring in the streets of Bethel the doom of the nations round about. First the Syrians, then the Philistines, Tyrians, Edomites, Ammonites, Moabites, and when the Israelites are rejoicing in the evil that is to befall their neighbors, I will proclaim their own downfall unless they turn from their idol worshiping, Sabbath breaking, and drunkenness. I will tell them that God has said, 'Seek ye me, and ye shall live.'"

"The message has been spoken, and the prophet has been disdained; he has been told by Amaziah, the high priest of the calf, that he had better go back to his own country. He has informed the king that I am a pestilent fellow. The people themselves are so sodden with drink that they cannot be stirred, even with the thought of danger (See also Isaiah 28: 1-8)."

Illustration and Application

Why the drinking of intoxicating beverages is a sin, and the selling of them a crime, and what we can and should do about them, are the practical questions for this quarterly temperance Sunday.

Why drinking intoxicants is a sin, and selling a crime. The lesson committee have selected some brave words of Amos for a temperance lesson, although none of these words are specifically pleas for total abstinence or prohibition. Can you think why they did so? Is not this the explanation? Amos bravely condemned the sins of luxury in his time, and if we catch his spirit—that is what we should get from every hero's act or word in the Bible—and do what he would do, and say what he would say to-day, we shall condemn the worst sin of luxury in our time, the drinking that leads to every other evil. Can any one honestly seek good and not evil, which Amos commands, without turning his back on drink? Can any one "hate the evil, and love the good, and establish judgment in the gate," which Amos also commands, and not outlaw the saloon, that "evil" which is the mother of almost every other "evil"? To this fact Cardinal Gibbons recently referred in pledging one hundred and thirty boys to abstain until they were twenty-one. He said: "There is no vice prevalent in these modern days so destructive as intemperance. Not only must it bear its own sin, but it leads also to many others. Robbery, crimes of violence, impurity, the disgrace of honored and honorable names, can all be traced to its evil and seductive influence."

These words, and the exhortation of the Roman Catholic Plenary Council to Catholic rum-sellers, to find a more reputable way of making a living, ought to be tactfully urged upon Catholics, young and old, who drink or sell.

Amos especially condemned those sins, such as oppressing the poor, that come from the love of money, the root, not of all evil, but of "all kinds of evil." Appetite, greed and lust are the three chief roots of evil, but greed is the tap root, whose sap gives even to appetite and lust much of their strength. A court preacher in the chapel of Louis XIV, at Versailles, set forth the sins of peers and nobles so boldly, crying, "Woe to the rich! Woe to the great!" that the courtiers told the king he ought to be punished. Louis answered only (the best thing he ever said or did), "Gentlemen, the preacher has done his duty, let us now do ours." No one can fearlessly condemn to-day the sins to which the love of money leads and not include the drink traffic. Why is it a sin to drink, and still more to sell intoxicating beverages? Let us put aside for consideration by itself at some other

There is no time for that side issue in a brief Sunday School study of temperance. The buying and selling of intoxicating beverages is the thing to fix our thoughts upon. This will include "bitters" as well as beer, if the former are used without direct orders of a reliable physician. It has been abundantly proved that many of the patent medicines are stronger in alcohol than most of the drinks sold in saloons. And no doubt many who use them in self-prescription are playing the quack on themselves, drinking under false pretences of doctoring. In such cases they too are beverages. Why is it a sin to buy or sell intoxicating beverages?

1. Because alcohol is a poison. Manifestly poison should never be used except in prescriptions. A poison beverage injures the drinker when taken in any quantity, and to take even one glass is therefore a sin, per se. Temperance means moderation in what is right, but there can be no moderation in adultery, or theft, or self poisoning. The Bible law for all such cases is, "Abstain from every form of evil." To disobey that law of God once is clearly a sin; to do it habitually is rebellion against God. They are far behind the times who think it all right to drink if one does not get drunk. But science teaches that alcoholism, the state of the daily tippler who may never have been intoxicated, is more harmful to the drinker himself and his posterity, than an occasional spree. In France scientific men are teaching this in great posters, needed also in our land.

2. Because intoxicants may intoxicate. It is an error to suppose a man is not drunk until he is "dead drunk," or nearly so. A man begins to be drunk when he begins to be affected by the drink. Every man who uses intoxicants certainly runs the risk of being more than a little affected by them some day. When he becomes uncontrollably drunk, he injures others as well as himself. The papers printed recently in great headlines, "Raving maniac roaming at large." Because one maniac had escaped from the asylum, a whole city was alarmed. But the child who defined a drunkard as a man who was "crazy on purpose," reminds us every drunken man is a maniac at large, liable to kill friend or foe, liable in any case to "make a fool of himself."

3. Because drink multiplies sorrow. God wants men to be glad. His laws are but paths to joy. The Bible calls wine a "mocker" because it promises joy and brings "woe," at last if not at first. At a hearing in Congress in behalf of a bill to prohibit selling beer to speak-easies, a foreign woman rose in opposition and said for the beer drinkers, "We believe in the joy of living." Her "joy" seemed to be jeopardized by an attack on even speak-easy beer. Her words keep coming up as we read the daily troubles into which beer leads its victims. We thought of the words as we read of a man who in delirium tremens seemed to die, and was shipped for burial on the train, where he came back to life to the great alarm of the baggage-men. O, the drinker's "joy of living." The writer once saw in a saloon-keeper's front window the picture so often seen on the walls of the Y.M.C.A., "Breaking home ties." A country boy is just leaving home for the city. The wagon is at the door in which his big brother will drive him to the railway station. His father is carrying out his bags. His sister and the dog are looking on sadly. In the centre of the picture his mother is gazing earnestly into his face and saying her last words of advice and warning. Who that knows anything of such scenes can doubt that the chief fear on her heart, and on her lips for her boy is that he will be caught by the saloon, the man-eater shark of the city? Half the loads carried by anxious hearts would be lifted off if the saloon was banished. All the saloons are not worth one broken heart. The best gift fathers and sons can give to wives and mothers is total abstinence.

4. Because drink harms our country. Amos was a great patriot. He loved his country so well that he condemned selfish and oppressive public officers who sought "graft" and oppressed the poor. Such a patriotism will condemn the saloon as the worst foe of liberty. Its evil power in politics is its crowning curse. In the history of Elijah's times one chapter that was omitted in the quarter's lessons, contains the story of how Benhadad, King of Syria, was defeated by drink (I. Kings 20). "Benhadad was drinking himself drunk in the pavilions, he and the kings, the thirty and two kings that helped him." On the other hand, the victory was "by the young men of the princes of the provinces." The young men who win to-day are the young men whose brains are not fuddled by drink. They win in their own private battles of life and in the patriotic struggles for the nation. It is the men who drink who are defeated everywhere in the end, whether in the battles of business or of patriotism.

Verdict of Scholars Upon Alcohol

(Translation from the French)

M. BERTHELOT, Member of the Academies of Science and of Medicine: "Alcohol is not a food, even though it may be fuel. . . . Atwater himself did not conclude from his experiments that alcohol is a true food, that is, that it is capable of assimilation by the human organism."

DR. CHARLES RICHEL, of the Academy of Medicine: "If alcoholic drinks could be entirely abolished, possibly a small portion of nourishment would be lost, but one would have rendered an immense service to humanity."

M. METCHNIKOFF, Chief Attendant at the Pasteur Institute: "As for myself, I am convinced that alcohol is a poison."

DR. LANCERAUX, of the Academy of Medicine: "Alcohol is dangerous, not only on account of the symptoms it induces in the nervous system, but especially on account of the mal-nutrition which it induces in the organism of one who indulges in excess."

DR. HERICOURT, Director of the Scientific Review: "Alcohol, even in the dose which some wish to class as healthful, can surely be the cause of death, by diminishing the resistance of the organism to infectious diseases."

The effort to reinstate alcohol, which has recently been attempted, rested only upon the laboratory experiments of the American Atwater. Yet Atwater says: "The moderate use of alcohol is filled with danger. Alcohol would not be called a food in the proper sense of the word. The net result of its use is an injury and not a benefit. Temperance Record, Nov. 22, 1900. Professor Atwater's Conclusions."

M. ROUX, of the Academy of Medicine, Assistant Director of the Pasteur Institute: "The struggle against alcoholism must be continued."

DR. MAGNAN, of the Academy of Medicine, Chief Physician of St. Anne Insane Asylum: "In my opinion, alcohol would not be, in any case a food to be recommended. It pushes into our asylums of the Seine, almost one-half of the inmates."

DR. WEISS, Government Civil Engineer of Bridges and Roads, Fellow of the Faculty of Medicine: "The truth is this—There is not a well-proved fact to show that it would be useful to include alcohol in the diet; many people, often without suspecting it, suffer for having used it; I do not know one who has regretted being deprived of it."

DR. LEGRAIN, chief physician of the Asylums of Ville-Evrard: "It is scientific to proclaim it a perpetual danger, that alcohol—although a chemical food—is perfectly useless, and that it is wise to let it alone."

DR. GARNIER, chief physician of the special Alms House Infirmary: "The food, alcohol, feeds crime and madness; the former is indebted to this substance for about 70 per cent. of its victims; the latter for 33 per cent. Alcohol food! Granting that this term might be chemically correct, it will never be socially true. The individual who drinks passes to the toxic dose in an insidious manner, especially if he is deluded by the mirage that alcohol is a food."—Extracts from the Review, Feb. 13, and other publications.

Citizens! They tell you, "Our alcohol is a food." We appeal to your good sense, the evidence is in your hands.

them afterward, is even more risky than for some pure woman to marry a drunkard "to reform him!" Accept none who have not had the healing touch of "the Great Physician." Smith Branch, Ky. EDWIN T. PRESTON.

Receive Penitents on Probation

WHEN notorious sinners accept the Gospel, profess repentance toward God and faith in our Lord Jesus, and apply for admission to Church fellowship, we dare not act the part of the "elder brother" in the parable, toward these returning prodigals. God alone knows the hearts of all. They should be received for a term of probation, during which their conduct may prove whether their repentance is sincere or not. To admit them at once into full membership, and afterwards find their "goodness was as the morning cloud," that passeth away, then the Church will suffer by their unholy influences. Ventura, Calif. S. F. ELLIOTTE.

Keep Out the Unconverted

THE Church should have sufficient evidence that the applicant has been born again. I believe in probation. Keep sinners out of the Church as far as possible—that is, unconverted men and women. Seymour, Texas. D. C. BELLINGS.

"Be Ye Not Unequally Yoked"

SURELY the Church is for the Lord's people, or for his redeemed ones, "his saints," a place where they can meet together in an assembly, or the gathering of the people together to praise and worship the Lord in spirit and in truth; and to be a member of such a body as is the Church, which stands for close relation and fellowship with our Saviour and Lord Jesus Christ, one must have the spirit and mind of a true Christian, or be a disciple of Christ. II. Cor. 6: 14, "Be ye not unequally yoked together with unbelievers; for what fellowship hath righteousness with unrighteousness? and what communion hath light with darkness?" To all them that believe, repent, and obey the Gospel, it is the Church's privilege, as well as its duty, to welcome them into membership. The one condition then to all men everywhere, to make them legal members of the Church of Christ, is that they believe, repent, and obey the Gospel. Lyndon, Kan. J. W. BANNING.

Would Open Wide the Door

WHEN three thousand were added to the Church in a day there was no hunt for repentant sinners. The time is too short for that worldly process. The sinner cannot hurt the Church as much as the Church can hurt the sinner. Burnham, Me. M. C.

For Saint and Sinner Both

THE Church is composed of the saints. The mission of the Church is to save sinners, not out of the Church, but in it. If the sinner come to the saint, and ask, "Where dwellest thou?" the reply must be, "Come in and see." It is a mistaken idea on the part of the saint that he must devote all his time and exert every energy to work out his own salvation. He is already saved, and his business is to go out into the highways and compel sinners to come in, that the Master's house—the Church—may be filled. Past sins have nothing to do with the sinner's conversion. Jesus said to the woman, "Go thy way and sin no more." To the villain on the cross he said, "To-day shalt thou be with me in Paradise." The sinner should be able to manifest somewhat of the spirit of the Master at the threshold of the church, as he is entering. In my opinion, a period of probation is a hindrance rather than a help to the repentant sinner. The very fact of probation means distrust, and distrust tends to discouragement and doubt. Atwater, O. W. J. S.

No Probation Mentioned in Scripture

THE Scriptures state in Acts 2: 36-47 exactly what is required of a sinner to become a church member. There is nothing said about a period of probation or of taking a vote of the Brethren to decide on whether they should be admitted, but the Lord added to the church, and the conditions are specified in plain language. Let us not substitute human methods for Bible methods. The Lord's way is best. Pentwater, Mich. J. W. BRAY.

For Saints and Not for Sinners

THE New Testament answer is this: The Church is for saints, the Gospel is for sinners. When a sinner becomes a saint by believing on Jesus Christ, and being born again of the Holy Ghost, then he is ready for Church membership, not before. We read in I. Cor. 14: 33, "churches of the saints," but nowhere in Scripture of churches of sinners. That epistle was written "To the Church of God, which is at Corinth, to them that are sanctified in Christ Jesus, called to be saints." And that to the Romans was addressed, "To all that be in Rome, beloved of God, called to be saints." When convicted sinners, on the day of Pentecost asked, "Men and brethren, what shall we do?" Peter answered, "Repent, and be baptized every one of you. . . . Then they that gladly received his word were baptized, and the same day there were added to them about 3,000 souls." And the last verse of the chapter reads (in the Revised Version), "And the Lord added to them day by day those that were saved." That church was made up of saints, not sinners. Acts 2: 37, 42, 47. Detroit, Mich. REV. C. A. VOTEY.

Welcome the Repentant Sinner

IS God's never-dying love for the regenerated or the unsaved? For both! Christ came into the world to save sinners. The Church must carry on this work. But the Church member, shuddering, cries, "Shall we ask that man or woman in the very lowest depths of earthly hell to become one of us; to join his or her voice, harsh with the scar-forgotten curse, in songs of praise with us; to sit in our cushioned pews beside our innocent children. No! No!" Another professed Christian adds: "How do we know that this sinner is in earnest? Do you suppose he will be true to his sacred vows? Will he not pollute us? Will it not be 'casting our pearls before swine?' If, indeed, he is in earnest, let him prove himself reborn."

Are you not asking more of this man than you yourself could have borne? We are still held by the limitations of the flesh. When this "sinner" has become one of you, it will not be necessary to have a period of probation, if every fellow-member encourages him with such cheery words as: "Don't fear!" "You won't fail." "I'm your brother!" Delaware, O. E. S. VANDEMAN.

For Saints Only

I BELIEVE the Church is for saints only. The line should be distinctly drawn between the saved and unsaved, by admitting only those into the Church who have made a public profession and repentance of sins past, and a solemn desire to forsake all forms of sin. Brandon, Man. FRED. SMITH.

Repentance and Confession the True Tests

THE New Testament plainly teaches that no matter how great a sinner a person may be, when he repents and confesses Christ, and is baptized, he is then a Christian—a member of the Church of Christ—and should be received into full fellowship at once. This certainly is the Bible way, and, in my opinion, the best way. There is no time when a new convert needs so much encouragement, as at the commencement of the Christian life. Deer Harbor, Wash. W. P. CADWELL.

The Church is for Sin-Sick Souls

IT has always seemed to me that the Church should be to the spiritually-sick soul what the hospital is to those that are sick physically. There they may come in closer touch with the greatest of physicians, and Church members, with all love, patience and sympathy, should be helpers, like the nurses, and assist in the healing. "They that are whole need not a physician, but they that are sick." Bradford, Pa. A. B.

LEARNING THINGS

We Are All in the Apprentice Class.

When a simple change of diet brings back health and happiness the story is briefly told. A lady of Springfield, Ill. says: "After being afflicted for years with nervousness and heart trouble, I received a shock four years ago that left me in such a condition that my life was despaired of. I could get no relief from doctors nor from the numberless heart and nerve medicines I tried, because I didn't know that the coffee was daily putting me back more than the Drs. could put me ahead.

"Finally at the request of a friend I left off coffee and began the use of Postum and against my convictions I gradually improved in health until for the past 6 or 8 months I have been entirely free from nervousness and those terrible sinking, weakening spells of heart trouble."

"My troubles all came from the use of coffee which I had drunk from childhood and yet they disappeared when I quit coffee and took up the use of Postum." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Many people marvel at the effects of leaving off coffee and drinking Postum, but there is nothing marvelous about it—only common sense.

Coffee is a destroyer—Postum is a re-builder. That's the reason.

Lincoln as an Abstainer

ABRAHAM LINCOLN, throughout his life, boy and man, always stood for temperance. Far back in his Indiana boyhood, the first essay he ever wrote was on the subject of Temperance. A local Baptist preacher was so struck with its merit that he secured it from the boy, and sent it to Ohio, where it is said to have appeared in a newspaper.

Soon after coming to Springfield to practice law, he joined the Sons of Temperance, and, as we shall see in the next chapters, frequently made temperance speeches of very effective character.

The story is told by Judge Weldon that he was once in the room with Stephen A. Douglas when Lincoln entered. Douglas, desiring to show his hospitality, in accordance with the customs of the times, brought out a bottle of whiskey and some glasses, and invited his callers to take a drink with him. Lincoln respectfully declined, on the ground that he had always been a temperance man, and felt that he was too old to change.

Leonard Swett tells us that Lincoln told him not more than a year before he was elected President, that he had never tasted liquor in his life. "What?" said Swett, "do you mean to say that you never tasted it?" "Yes," replied Lincoln, "I never tasted it." When we take into consideration the habits of the time, this is a most remarkable testimony to Lincoln's temperance principles, the stability of his character, and the iron quality of his will-power.

Mr. C. C. Coffin, a most distinguished journalist of the day, who accompanied the notification committee from the Chicago Convention to Springfield, at the time of Lincoln's first nomination for the presidency of the United States, related in his newspaper an incident that occurred on that occasion. He says that, after the exchange of formalities, Lincoln said:

"Mrs. Lincoln will be pleased to see you, gentlemen. You will find her in the other room. You must be thirsty after

How to Organize an Evangelistic Campaign, a suggestive booklet, intended to encourage pastors and Christian workers where the thought is in their hearts. Designed to stimulate evangelism in general, and to emphasize the fact that the pastors are themselves most important factors in bringing about the conditions favorable to an effective Gospel campaign. The author is Rev. James B. Ely, Executive Officer of the Presbyterian Evangelistic Committee of Philadelphia, Witherspoon Building, Philadelphia.

Legends of Gems, by Frank Shelley, is a dainty little book, bound in Russia leather. As its title indicates, it is a collection of legends connected with precious and semi-precious stones. While these stories are very interesting, especially to those who make the collecting of gems a fad, there is also a deal of quaint and rare information regarding the intrinsic value of gems and the places where different precious stones are to be found.

your long ride. You will find a pitcher of water in the library."

The newspaper man crossed the hall and entered the library. There were miscellaneous books on the shelves, two globes, celestial and terrestrial, in the corners of the room, and a plain table, with writing materials upon it, a pitcher of cold water, and glasses, and no wines or liquors. There was humor in the invitation to take a glass of water, which was explained to Mr. Coffin by a citizen of Springfield, who said that, when it was known that the committee was coming, several citizens called upon Mr. Lincoln and informed him that some entertainment must be provided.

"Yes, that is so. What ought to be done? Just let me know and I will attend to it," he said.

"Oh, we will supply the needful liquors," said his friends.

"Gentlemen," said Mr. Lincoln, "I thank you for your kind attention, but must respectfully decline your offer. I have no liquors in my house, and have never been in the habit of entertaining my friends in that way. I cannot permit my friends to do for me what I will not myself do. I shall provide cold water—nothing else."

The Hon. John Hay, the present Secretary of State, and one of Lincoln's secretaries and biographers, has declared that Lincoln was a man of extremely temperate habits, and that he made no use of either whiskey or tobacco during all the years of his association with him.

Mr. John G. Nicolay, his private secretary, and a joint biographer with Secretary Hay, says: "During all the five years of my service as his private secretary, I never saw him drink a glass of whiskey, and I never knew or heard of his taking one."

From all this it will be seen that Abraham Lincoln, in his heroic struggle against poverty and hard conditions, in his victory over the vicious habits and customs of the day in which he lived, in the fidelity to principle, and in the cleanliness and purity of his personal habits of life, stands out before us as an ideal leader of the new army of total abstainers to which his name has been given.

Died, April 19, 1904, at Orangeville, Ohio, Mira May Kellison. She was born May 4th, 1880, and united with the church three years before her death, and was a sincere Christian worker whenever opportunity offered.

Died, July 19th, 1904, at the residence of her daughter, Mrs. Christian Parker, at Edgewood, R. I., Mrs. H. D. Gavitt. All her life had been spent in God's service, and death had no terrors for her; it was only going home.

Mr. Robert Fairchild, Sr., one of the most prominent citizens of Houston, Texas, died at his home, 2015 Dallas Avenue, Wednesday morning, after a brief illness, and was buried Thursday afternoon from Trinity M. E. Church, Rev. W. H. Logan officiating. The funeral was under the auspices of Silver Trowel Lodge, No. 47, A. F. and A. M., of which fraternity he was a highly esteemed and honored member.

Mrs. Margaret Foster Watson, of Toledo, Ohio, died on Saturday, June 11th. In 1880, Mrs. Watson began holding evangelistic meetings on alternate Sundays, with the prisoners in the Workhouse and County Jail, and has continued them ever since. The sick, the needy, the tempted, the afflicted, all found in her a constant friend, and she will be sadly missed in the many circles where she delighted to go about doing good. She was an efficient and active worker up to the day of her death. Mrs. Watson was born in Clinton County, Pa.

The Dear Little Wife at Home

THE dear little wife at home, John,

She has ever so much to do,

Stitches to set and babies to pet

And so many steps for you.

The beautiful household fairy,

Filling your home with light,

Whatever you meet to-day, John,

Go cheerily home to-night.

Although you are worn and weary,

You needn't be cross or curt,

There are words like darts to gentle hearts,

There are looks that wound and hurt.

With the key in the latch at home, John,

Drop troubles out of sight,

To the dear little wife who is waiting,

Go cheerily home to-night.

What though the tempter try you,

Though the shafts of adverse fate

May hurtle near and the sky be drear

And the laggard fortune wait.

You are passing rich already,

Let the haunting fears take flight,

With the faith that wins success, John,

Go cheerily home to-night.

The Happy Holiday of Ernest and Greta

ERNEST was the very smallest boy at Mont-Lawn, and if the fashions of a few years ago prevailed at present, he surely would be running around in dresses. The photographer did not catch the little chap's happiest expression, for the boy had never had his picture taken before, and he was a little suspicious of the mysterious box propped up on three legs, and did not seem to have his usual unbounded confidence in whatever his sister said, when she assured him there was nothing for him to be "scared about." So the little fellow snuggled close to Greta's side, and stood quiet for a fraction of a minute, while he was being "snapped."

During the whole of their stay at Mont-Lawn, these two children were inseparable, day and night they were constantly together; the boy was so small he was not put in the ranks with older and larger children of his own sex, and it was amusing to watch him as he looked to Greta for guidance, in all this new and untried way of living. When at meals under the big tent, everything must be arranged on Ernest's plate to his liking, and the meat cut and potatoes mashed by Greta, before she would pay any attention to her own meal. There was nothing indicative of squalid poverty about the children; to be sure they had come from a very poor home, and their clothing was faded and darned, but it was perfectly clean. The girl's hair was always neatly brushed and tied with ribbons, which had experienced more than one introduction to soap and water.

Hand-in-hand these children went, roaming the daisy-starred fields, or doing "stunts" in the open-air "gym"; from early morning until the call for evening prayer at their bedsides they were happy, amusing themselves, and giving "teacher" no trouble whatever. Some children, no matter where they are, or to what walk in life they belong, have the faculty of accumulating more than their share of bumps, bruises, dirt and torn clothing; but nothing ever happened to this pair, they had the brightest, merriest time possible, and they never got into any scrapes. It seems that Greta had been up to the Home once before, when her brother was too small to accompany her, and how proud and happy she was to bring him this year.

As the years pass by, and the time comes when the little boy grows to be a big boy, he may lose father and mother, and be left alone; but if Greta is spared, he will always be protected and cared for by this faithful "little mother."

All too many of the tenement children are not only thin and miserable in appearance, but their clothing oftentimes is little more than rags, and none too clean when they arrive at the Home; then something must be found for them to wear, and the gifts of clothing which have been sent by kind friends are brought into requisition to good purpose. Friends have been most liberal with donations of clothing this season, but there is still a deficit in that suitable for boys from six to ten, and Housemother Collins is sometimes at her wit's end, to make the boys present a respectable appearance.

One of the chief charms of Mont-Lawn is the entire absence of any "institutional" air; the children romp and play about the grounds as if they all belonged to one family, with an older sister in the guise of a teacher looking carefully after each group. The larger girls and boys are most proud and happy to assist in the work of keeping this great establishment in order; they look after the younger children, help about the kitchen and dining tent, and in many ways lighten the burdens of teachers and care-takers, and at the same time the helpers are being helped, in getting a knowledge of the right way to work, which is almost impossible in the narrow homes in which most of them live. Ten days' vacation at Mont-Lawn marks an epoch in every child's life; but who can measure the influence for good received there, or the extent to which it may color all their after lives?

"He was a little suspicious of the mysterious box!"

ANSWERED PRAYERS

ASK AND YE SHALL RECEIVE

PRAYING ones, who long have prayed, And yet no answer heard. Have ye been sometimes half afraid God might not keep his word? Seems prayer to fall on deafened ears, Does Heaven seem blind and dumb? Is hope deferred? Believe! believe! The answering time will come.

"Ask what ye will," His word is true, His power is all divine; Ye cannot test his love too far, His uttermost is thine. God does not mock believing prayer, Ye shall not go unfed; He gives no serpent for a fish, Nor gives he stones for bread.

Thine inmost longings may be told, The hopes that turned to shame; The empty life, the thwarted plan, The good that never came. Oh, if thou truly hast believed, Not vain has been thy prayer; As God is true, thy hope shall come Some time, some how, some where.

M. M., Richmond, Va. "In my distress I cried unto the Lord and he heard my voice. Bless his holy name."

F. B. J., Bessemer, Ala. "God has answered so many prayers for me until I feel his presence, and I tell him about everything. He cheers my heart when I am in trouble, and always helps me."

M. P., Massachusetts "I was in great trouble. I prayed for help and he answered. He always answers prayers of faith. I wish every one knew what a friend and helper we have in Christ."

Mrs. A. B., Ohio. "I can truly say with the psalmist of old, the Lord has done great things for me, whereof I am glad, and I praise his holy name."

John S., Denhoff, N. Dak. gratefully acknowledges answers to prayer in times of great suffering. He promised to proclaim the fact to the world, for the glory of God, and even at this late date he writes to make public acknowledgment.

G. H., Littlefield, Ill. "I write to add my testimony of praise and thanks for the answer of prayer. A few months ago a mother and brother lay at the point of death. I believe it was through prayer that God spared them to us from what seemed certain death."

Mt. Blanchard, Ohio. "I want to acknowledge God's goodness to me in answering prayer. Praise his holy name. He has answered many a prayer for me that seemed an impossibility. May this be the means of helping some one to trust Jesus." From one who trusts in Jesus.

A Vermont reader. "I wish to add my testimony to those who acknowledge answered prayers, I know that our God is a prayer-hearing and a prayer-answering God. Many times has he heard and answered my prayers. Not always as I have wished, but answered as he thought best.

"Peace and wonderful gladness. Are answers unto prayer."

Miss Z. I. D., Milford, Mich. "I have received many wonderful answers to prayer. I know that our God is infinite in power and resources and mercy and is omnipresent, from the way in which he gives to those that ask. I believe the prayers of others are good for us, so I desire the prayers of Christ's children for spiritual strength, wisdom, grace, endurance, and Christian knowledge and power in him. In September, God willing, I am to speak in a large school in the northern part of Michigan, Big Rapids, on 'Alcohol in the light of science.' As many young men there yield to the temptation of strong drink, I ask for prayers that God will bless me in this opportunity."

TENT SERVICES IN NEW YORK

THE Rev. Wm. F. Coburn has been conducting evangelistic services in "Tent Peniel," at the corner of 110th Street and Central Park West, New York City, since the first Sunday in June. These meetings are interdenominational, and have been largely attended. The location is a beautiful one and accessible, while a fine fountain playing continually inside the tent cools the air. The music is especially interesting and enjoyable, and a vested choir of children, under the direction of Miss Grace D. Hildebrand, the "Gospel nightingale," has proved a very attractive feature. The Oliphant sisters sing at every service.

DR. WM. COBURN

Dr. Coburn is a well-known evangelist, and has held many large and successful revival meetings in the principal cities. He holds two services daily in the Gospel Tent, at 7 and 8 P. M., and on Sunday, Bible School at 3 P. M., preaching at 11 A. M. 4.30 and 8 P. M. There have been many hopeful conversions.

Peniel Tent is near one of the principal entrances to Central Park, where, during the heated term, many who are without money or work, spend their nights. An earnest effort has been made to bring as many of these unfortunates as possible under the influence of the meetings. One night Dr. Coburn spoke on "The Joy of Salvation." A young man gave up a position paying him forty dollars a week that he might know that joy. One of the members of a crew of an ocean liner made public confession of faith before sailing the next day for Liverpool.

Is the World Growing Better?

MANY facts might be cited as proofs that the world is growing worse rather than better. There is more swindling, and that on a more gigantic scale. There is probably more vice, more gambling, more crime of all kinds. The love of money, and the absorption of men's minds in the pursuit of it, were never so intense as they are to-day. Greed and selfishness hold sway and are seen in every walk of life. With all this there is a decline in religious faith. There are probably not so many avowed infidels in the world as there used to be, but there are more agnostics. Few men declare openly that there is a God, but there are an immense number who say that they do not know whether or not there is a God, whether or not there is a life beyond the grave. All these are sad and appalling facts which will be admitted by every man who mingles with the world and intelligently observes the significance of passing events.

On the other hand, there are welcome signs of improvement. The world has become more humane. Sympathy with the sick and the suffering is more prevalent, and efforts for the relief of the sufferers are more general. Hospitals have been established for the treatment of disease, and they are liberally supported. Does war break out? An army of doctors and nurses are sent out to minister to the wounded. Is there a famine in any part of the world, or does a great disaster fall upon any community? The fact needs only to be made known, and money is immediately given generously and in large sums for the relief of the victims. Efforts for the benefit of special classes have been multiplied, and the Social Settlements have been established to raise the moral tone of the slums. In heathen lands, devoted men and women are laboring in greater numbers than ever before, to preach and teach the way of life to the people. These, and other features of our time, indicate that, while the struggle between good and evil continues, and there is much to cause depression, the spirit of Christ is gaining ground in the world. Every movement that springs from concern for the welfare of others, is an evidence of that fact, and there are more of such movements now than at any previous period. It remains true, that love, disinterested affection, compassion for suffering, and practical efforts to alleviate it, show a mind akin to that of Christ, and the more men are under the influence of such a spirit of love and unselfishness, the better the world will be.

The promise of Christ that if he was lifted up, he would draw all men unto him, is sure, and we confidently look for its fulfillment. It is the real hope of the world. The practical outcome of it is the personal one. Every Christian ought by his own life to manifest Christ and seek to bring others under his power. The circle

*Topic of the Christian Endeavor Society, Epworth League and Baptist Young People's Union for Sept. 18. Ps. 37: 1-13; Eccles. 7: 10.

he reaches may be small, but if every one would do all in his power to leaven his own particular circle, the effect on the world would be transforming. We have no right to leave the propagation of Christianity to the clergy. Each Christian ought to be a light and a worker for Christ in the world. Every one has about him some whom he may influence and every one should feel that, whatever others may do, he at least will do his duty. If each Christian now living could win three souls for Christ during his lifetime, the next generation would be a very different one from any the world has yet seen. Slow and painful has the process of redemption been thus far, but the remedy for sin is in our hands, committed to us by Christ, and it is for us to make it known. When that duty is made a matter of personal concern, the condition of mankind will be so obvious, that there will be no need to ask if the world is getting better.

PRESSING HIS GARMENT'S HEM

THE Saviour passed along the way
From country lane to city mart,
Where crowds were moving to and fro,
With many an aching heart.
They touched the seamless robe he wore,
They pressed his garment's hem;
And, lo! the tender love he bore,
Brought health and joy to them.

Unseen, he walks the earth to-day,
Our daily paths beside,
When lonely, 'mid the fields we stray,
Or join the restless tide.
He will not bid us hold our peace,
Our eager prayers condemn,
But we may clasp his pierced hand,
And press his garment's hem.

Oh aching, fearing, human heart,
There's balm and rest for thee!
Oh weary, heavy-laden one,
He's calling, "Come to Me!"
When sorrow, like a surging tide,
No earthly power can stem,
How sweet to feel his wounded side,
And press his garment's hem.

A WOMAN'S WIDE AFRICAN PARISH

BY MISSIONARY MARY A. SHARP

MY parish of Krootown is a settlement of bamboo houses with thatched roofs. They usually have a lamp at night to burn kerosene from the United States. In my church (which is indicated on the photograph by the mark of the cross), the native converts hold every morning at sunrise a prayer-meeting, besides other meetings, and the regular Sunday services, three times on Lord's Day, and Sunday School. We also have day school during the week. A school building is needed badly. One American friend has offered to give $1,500 to erect a schoolhouse in Krootown. The city council of Monrovia has given an eligible lot for the purpose. Meantime we have to use the church. Crowds of children of all ages and sizes, and all manner of dress, and no dress, come to us. We try to give them wear at least a shirt. Many will them from birth until even after death. If a person dies, fires are built outside the huts and tom-toms are beaten to scare away the witches that have come after the dead one's spirit. Not until lately did I find out the reason for giving their children all sorts of names. The first woman who came to church flourished under the name of Koko, which means "rooster." Then there was a young man Combo, meaning "cat," and a girl Bwa "dog," and so on. Such names were given to confuse the witches; they could hear no boys or girls called by name—only common things. If a person is sick, they are bewitched, and usually taken to another part of the town after dark. The strong belief in witchcraft and in polygamy is the great hindrance to the Gospel. Those who profess conversion are quite free from belief in demon power, and no

They have no shirt, which is true. A shirt consists of a strip of calico, sewed up at the ends to the armhole, and a hole cut in the middle through which they put their heads. Often make some of remnants of calico of different colors. Then they use the little English they are master of. "Tank you, mammy! Tank you plenty! I'm fine, too much!" They are quick to learn, but usually stop short of what we call a good English education. But with this tribe, now is the harvest-time, as they are just waking up to the desire "learn book." A boy will present himself. "Me come to you to stay. Me want to be book and good palaver." With aching heart, I often have to turn them away; space and means being too limited. For help, the older ones teach the younger. The harvest here truly is great, but laborers are few. The heathen are still under the oppression of the devil. They say witches are after man is admitted to church membership unless he puts away all his wives but one, though he has bought and paid for them all. The number of wives a man has affects his standing in the community. One "rich" man came to me, saying he wanted to be a Christian and to be baptized. I questioned him closely. He was willing to put away all his Jujus (what they worship), and Gre Gres (charms that bring luck and keep witches away), but when it came to his wives; "Put away all my wives but one, and be all the same as one poor fellow." That was too hard; to be reduced in rank, he could not recede to that. Like the young man of old, he went away sorrowfully. But that day is past, as most, if not all, of those who have united with the church, are the most prosperous. I thank you so much for the $20 you sent. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has become the world's almoner. I mean that it shall go toward the new schoolhouse. Monrovia, Liberia. MARY A. SHARP.

Russia's Royal Christening

COY-BELLS pealed throughout St. Petersburg and the city was shaken by repeated discharges of guns from the fortress. At last, after years of weary waiting and repeated disappointments, a son has been born to the royal couple, and now, with great pomp and ceremony, the little boy was being carried to the church, where the ceremony of christening the infant was to be performed. The functionaries concerned in the ceremony drove in gorgeous carriages, drawn by splendid horses, to the great palace. The newborn heir-apparent was carried in a magnificent carriage, in the form of a golden chariot, drawn by eight pure white horses. The little baby peacefully reposed in the arms of the Empress' lady-in-waiting, the Princess Alitzin. The chariot was surrounded by mounted equestrians, a company of Cossacks following, the little sleeping babe being their Commander-in-chief. A long, gorgeous procession was formed when the cavalcade reached the church. Princess Galitzin carried the infant, while the flow and veil were carried by Gens. Richter and Voroutsoffdashkoff, respectively. Numerous gold and silver ikons adorned the interior of the church, which was resplendent with the blaze of thousands of candles. The Czar, proud and happy, despite the shadow of awful war hanging over the country, was accompanied by his mother. After the reception, the clergy retired to an inner apartment, this movement being in accordance with the traditions of the Orthodox church. The ceremony of christening began with a solemn exorcism to "free the child from the influence of evil spirits." Until this was performed, the little innocent babe was not prepared for his baptismal robes. After the child was anointed with holy oil on forehead, ears, eyes, hands, feet, and shoulders, the form of a cross was made upon his head, by clipping his silky, baby hair. The imperial chaplain then plunged the little body three times beneath the waters in the font, saying, "The servant of God, Alexis, is baptized in the name of the Father. Amen. In the name of the Son. Amen. In the name of the Holy Ghost. Amen." Crying lustily, the heir to the throne of all the Russias was clad in his baptismal garments, and then carried three times around the font, the choir at the same time singing a Te Deum, while 301 guns thundered from the fortress. Divine service was then conducted, when the Czar was readmitted. The Dowager Empress carried the infant to the altar, where communion was administered by the Archbishop, who touched the child's mouth with consecrated wine. And thus came to an end the grand ceremonial. A Revival in Colorado WITHIN three hours' ride of the turbulent mining camps of Cripple Creek, lies the fruitful valley of the Arkansas. During the past month the churches here have been marshalled for an aggressive effort under the Rev. F. E. Smiley, D.D., of Chicago, and his efficient musical director. July 4 was observed as a day of prayer. Sixteen services were held, including a number of cottage prayer-meetings, led by the principal citizens. Three big mass meetings in the tent, morning, afternoon and evening, attracted multitudes. Many visitors came from neighboring towns. Over two hundred openly confessed Christ. Dr. Smiley has accepted invitations from three more of the leading towns, and will pitch his tent at La Junta, Las Animas and Lamar, which will occupy his time until September.

Let this Machine do your Washing Free.

There are Motor-Springs beneath the tub. These springs do nearly all the hard work, when once you start them going. And this washing machine works as easy as a bicycle wheel does. There are slats on the inside bottom of the tub. These slats act as paddles, to swing the water in the same direction you revolve the tub. You throw the soiled clothes into the tub first. Then you throw enough water over the clothes to float them.

Next you put the heavy wooden covers on top of the clothes to anchor them, and to press them down. This cover has slats on its lower side to grip the clothes and hold them from turning around when the tub turns.

Now, we are all ready for quick and easy washing. You grasp the upright handle on the side of the tub and, with it, you revolve the tub one-third way round, till it strikes a motor-spring.

This motor-spring throws the tub back till it strikes the other motor-spring, which in turn throws it back on the first motor-spring.

The machine must have a little help from you, at every swing, but the motor-springs, and the ball-bearings, do practically all the hard work.

You can sit in a rocking chair and do all that the washer requires of you. A child can run it easily full of clothes.

When you revolve the tub the clothes don't move. But the water moves like a mill race through the clothes.

The paddles on the tub bottom drive the soapy water THROUGH and through the clothes at every swing of the tub. Back and forth, in and out of every fold, and through every mesh in the cloth, the hot soapy water runs like a torrent. This is how it carries away all the dirt from the clothes, in from six to ten minutes by the clock.

It drives the dirt out through the meshes of the fabrics WITHOUT ANY RUBBING,—without any WEAR and TEAR from the washboard.

It will wash the finest lace fabric without breaking a thread, or a button, and it will wash a heavy, dirty carpet with equal ease and rapidity. Fifteen to twenty garments, or five large bed-sheets, can be washed at one time with this "1900" Washer.

A child can do this in six to twelve minutes better than any able washer-woman could do the same clothes in TWICE the time, with three times the wear and tear from the washboard.

This is what we SAY, now how do we PROVE it? We send you our "1900" Washer free of charge, on a full month's trial, and we even pay the freight out of our own pockets. No cash deposit is asked, no notes, no contract, no security.

You may use the washer four weeks at our expense. If you find it won't wash as many clothes in FOUR hours as you can wash by hand in EIGHT hours, you send it back to the railway station,—that's all.

But, if, from a month's actual use, you are convinced it saves HALF the time in washing, does the work better, and does it twice as easily as it could be done by hand, you keep the machine.

Then you mail us 50 cents a week till it is paid for. Remember that 50 cents is part of what the machine saves you every week on your own, or on a washer-woman's labor. We intend that the "1900" Washer shall pay for itself and thus cost you nothing.

You don't risk a cent from first to last, and you don't buy it until you have had a full month's trial.

Could we afford to pay freight on thousands of these machines every month, if we did not positively KNOW they would do all we claim for them? Can you afford to be without a machine that will do your washing in HALF THE TIME, with half the wear and tear of the washboard, when you can have that machine for a month's free trial, and let it PAY FOR ITSELF? This offer may be withdrawn at any time it overcrows our factory.

Write us TODAY, while the offer is still open, and while you think of it. The postage stamp is all you risk. Write me personally on this offer, viz.: R. F. Bieber, General Manager of "1900" Washer Company, 3022 Henry St., Binghamton, New York.

THE NEGRO FARMER

What the Georgia State Industrial School is Doing for Him

IT was a most interesting gathering which recently met at the Fifth Annual Farmers' Conference, of the Georgia State Industrial College, near Savannah. Here were representatives of various social conditions, of mental growths, of moral status, and also of ignorance and poverty, awaiting needed aid. These elements formed an interesting study for the sociologist, the moralist, and the philanthropist.

Educators met to get new ideas of helpfulness, and to impart knowledge; but the most interesting and characteristic representatives were the farmers themselves. There was the old-time negro of ante-bellum days, uncouth in dress and manner, who said, "I didn't expose to say nuthin' dis mawnin', but meant to run in on the win' up." There was the newer type, arisen since the war, displaying a keen alertness, comparing favorably with that of the average Northern or Western farmer, and lastly, the negro farmer of the New South, who is intelligent, progressive, and able to compete with his white neighbor.

Geo. F. Thomas, of Hawkinsville, Ga., ably represented this latter class. This man owns 185 acres of land, and last year made $500 profit. Many of this farmer's products have won prizes at State and County Fairs. At the Atlanta Exposition in 1895, Mr. Thomas' exhibit won a premium of $500. This shows the possibilities of negro farming in the South.

It is the aim of the Farmers' Conference to help, in an intelligent manner, by spreading education along agricultural lines, among the farmers of Georgia and adjacent States; to aid them in becoming more self-reliant, intelligent and prosperous. Many testimonies were given by different men at this Conference, that showed beyond question that they had been greatly benefited. These men told how they had received their first inspiration for 'home-owning, variety in crops, and improved methods of preparing the soil, from their attendance at the conferences of the school. Those who attended this year for the first time, eagerly sought for all knowledge that would enable them to improve their farms. The questions they asked, and the determination they expressed, of going home and improving their condition, evidenced the inspiration and help they were receiving.

No one made a dull or uninteresting speech; no matter how ignorant he might be, there was always something to be learned, something of interest. One man said, with the greatest earnestness, "I tells you I ain't nebbber had any eddication; I couldn't read my name if it was writ as big as de top ob dat table; but I'se here to learn, an' I specs to do still more to better my condition." This man started with a capital of $4.00, ten years ago; perseverance and thrift have gained him a farm of 100 acres.

There were several farmers present who owned 200 or 400 acres, the largest farm having 500 acres, ranging from this all the way down to one acre. A large number of tenant farmers were present, many of these expressed their determination to raise better crops, and make preparations to own their homes.

A canvass among the students of the school, who are mainly from the rural districts, showed the majority to be from families who own their homes, and in only one instance did the family live in a one-room log house. This indicates that the negro farmer is slowly becoming a land-owner, and that the log cabin of only one room is passing away. The negro farmer is realizing the importance and advantage of home owning, and of living in better houses.

Prof. Carver, of Tuskegee Institute, gave a very helpful talk on practical farming, emphasizing the importance of proper preparation of the soil, correct seeding, and diversity of crops.

It was also shown that the oyster industry work, which is done almost entirely by negroes, might become much more profitable if they would show themselves more reliable, if they would own their outfits, and lease and plant their oyster grounds. They might improve the product, and sell, when possible, direct to the consumer. If a man owned a small truck farm, he might combine oyster-raising with farming to his advantage. The oyster-men seemed greatly gratified at these suggestions, and the College will assist them to better their condition in every way possible.

This College combines the scientific with the practical, by collecting carefully prepared data, from which are given suggestions and methods of helpfulness.

Many fine lectures have been delivered before the school, and there is strong evidence of the great interest the Southern white man feels in the efforts put forth by the negro to better his social condition.

Under the direction of a commission of five eminent Southern white men, President R. R. Wright has, with the assistance of a faithful faculty, striven to make the school of the greatest benefit to the negroes of the Black Belt of Georgia.

Mr. Booker Washington expresses a deep interest in the work, and in a recent letter to President Wright, says: "I hope sometime by actions, rather than words, to show how much I appreciate you and your work."

There are nearly 500 students in the school this term; 113 have graduated from its academic courses; 50 or more former students are working at various trades, learned at the College; many are instructors in the schools of various States.

When the Farmers' Conference in all its various phases is considered, it would seem to be one of the most useful features of the school, and should be encouraged in every way.

"A Toothsome Flavor"

True for you, there's a treat in the crisp, nutty, delicate sweet taste of Grape-Nuts served with thick rich cream. (Don't spoil the food by trying to cook it. That work is done and perfectly done at the factories.)

The cream should soften it a bit, but not enough to excuse the eater from at least a few good earnest "chews" for our Dame Nature sends rich blessings to the long chewer. Of course the one with weak teeth can soften the food with milk down to a mush if necessary, but the good old Dame doesn't smile quite cheerfully on them.

You know children and adults must use the teeth and grind freely to make them grow strong and to preserve them. Then the act of chewing brings down the much needed saliva from the gums, and that helps amazingly in the digestion of foods of various kinds.

The saliva is not so much required with Grape-Nuts, for this food is pre-digested, that is the starch turned into form of sugar in the process of making and that helps give it the fascinating flavor.

Grape-Nuts people are healthy and enjoy good things. "There's a reason."

WARNING A NATION

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

THE prophets Joel, Amos and Hosea were contemporaries; Isaiah must have been born during their time, and may have derived some measure of his inspiration from God through them. Joel wrote to "all the inhabitants of the land" (Joel 1:2); Hosea especially to Israel—i.e., the ten tribes, whom he calls Ephraim; and Amos, who was a man of Judah, was called to bear testimony against Israel and to foretell the Assyrian captivity. He was no scholar, and was, by his own confession, no prophet, nor yet a prophet's son, but a simple laborer on the land, "a herdman and a gatherer of sycamore fruit" (or, wild figs, margin, Amos 7:4). And to this rough countryman came the word of God: "Go, prophesy to my people Israel" (Am. 7:14, 15). He was among the herdmen in Tekoa, in the hill country of Judah, not far from Bethlehem. God has his own witnesses among the most unlikely people. Only he knows who are simple enough, humble enough, little enough, in their own eyes, to be supplied instruments in his hand, to deliver his unvarnished messages.

His first mission was to declare to Israel, God's coming punishment of the nations around them, with his reason why. To each nation, God said: "For three transgressions, and for four, I will not turn away the punishment thereof." And now the prophet turns on Judah and Israel, and the same words are addressed to them: "For three transgressions of Judah, and for four, I will not turn away the punishment thereof, because they have rejected the law of the Lord, and have not kept his statutes." And now this rough countryman, stirred up to jealousy for the honor of his God, delivers this unexpected message: "Hear this word that the Lord hath spoken against you, O children of Israel, against the whole family which I brought up out of the land of Egypt saying, You only have I known of all families of the earth: therefore, I will visit upon you all your iniquities." Privilege entails responsibility. It is a solemn lesson. The nearer we are to God, the more responsible we are.

God, by the prophet, exposes the sin of the state religion—the worship of the golden calf at Bethel—and reminds the people of his past appeals to them. And then follows the solemn word, "Because I will do this unto thee, prepare to meet thy God, O Israel."

But how should they prepare to meet Him? Chapter V. tells us. It begins with a lamentation of the prophet. But the lamentation turns into an earnest exhortation. "Thus saith the Lord unto the house of Israel, seek ye me, and ye shall live, but seek not Bethel, nor enter into Gilgal, and pass not to Beersheeba"—i.e., seek God alone; no mixture of some fear of God joined with the fashionable idolatry of the day. Destruction was staring Israel in the face: the Word of the Lord had gone forth; sentence was spoken against her. But every one of her people who would truly seek the Lord should be preserved; he should live.

In the last two chapters, although dealing in large measure with the then present crisis in the history of Israel, some verses refer to the future restoration of Israel. Amos sees a basket of summer fruit, and the Lord shows him that the summer for Israel is over, the fruit all gathered. "The end is come upon my people Israel; I will not pass by them any more." It was final. Israel, as separate from Judah, is no longer recognized by God from this time.

And now the prophet has a vision of the Lord standing by the altar. And his word is one of terrible vengeance. Nothing shall now prevent the punishment of his rebellious people, "Behold, the eyes of the Lord are upon the sinful kingdom, and I will destroy it from the face of the earth." He continues, "Saving that I will not utterly destroy the house of Jacob, saith the Lord. For, lo! I will command, and I will sift the house of Israel among all the nations, like as corn is sifted in a sieve; yet shall not the least grain fall upon the earth." This is taking place now.

Questions & Answers

Inquirer, Rahway, N. J. 1. What is the population of Korea? 2. What does it produce and what is the extent of its foreign trade?

1. About 15,000,000. 2. It produces and exports rice, beans, ginseng and hides, and imports a great variety of goods. It is capable of producing for export purposes a surplus of barley, wheat, sorghum and millet. Its exports are about $4,500,000; imports $7,500,000.

A. W. K., Fargo, N. D. If a person in securing a marriage license, states his age incorrectly (for example, giving his age as fifty when he was sixty), would this make the marriage invalid?

No; the marriage would stand good in law, in spite of the error or deception mentioned.

P. W., New York. Is it wrong for a man to remain single? I am a confirmed bachelor, and have no desire to marry. I support my aged parents, on a small salary, and they may live twenty or twenty-five years yet.

If you consider it your duty to remain single, in order that you may support your parents, you are right to so remain. The Bible says that "it is not good for man to be alone," and a famous German philosopher supplemented this by declaring that "a man single is only half a man," while Paul, on the other hand, urges celibacy as the more desirable state. A bad marriage is worse than none, but a good marriage is unquestionably the best, most natural and most desirable condition. Read the beautiful description by King Lemuel's mother of a good wife, in Proverbs 31:10-33.

H. B., Archbold, O. Did a rainbow appear in the skies before the Flood?

Some scientists hold that in antediluvian times, the surface of the earth was perpetually covered with mist which obscured the sun and that the Flood changed this condition; consequently, if these scientific speculations be sound, there could have been no rainbow before the Flood.

J. F., Newark, N. J. How can we best express the difference between the pleasures of this world and the pleasures of the Christian life?

They have very little in common. Worldly pleasures, such as feasting, dancing, theatres, horse-racing, gambling and various forms of dissipation, have no attraction for one who is following the Master, since these and similar indulgences are barriers to spiritual growth. There are, however, many rational and delightful pleasures open to the Christian—travel, books, music, pictures, and many outdoor and indoor gatherings and other recreations, that can be enjoyed without conflicting with duty or principle. If you are in doubt as to the propriety of any amusement, it is a wise plan to let it alone.

Inquirer. Where does the Moravian Church at present conduct missions?

Amongst the Eskimos in Labrador and Alaska, the Indians of California, the Indians and negroes of Nicaragua, in the West Indies, and Demerara, and Surinam, in Cape Colony and German East Africa, among the Papuans of Australia, the Tibetan-speaking peoples of Kashmir, and the West Himalayan mountaineers. Besides, the Moravian Church maintains a home for lepers near Jerusalem. Rev. Paul de Schweinitz, Bethlehem, Pa., will furnish all particulars.

M. Y. Z., Westville, Conn. To whom did our Lord refer (Luke 15: 7) as just persons who need no repentance? Are there such persons?

The parables which follow illustrate our Lord's meaning. There was a tendency among the Pharisees, as you will see by Luke 15: 2, to despise the sinner and make no effort for his reclamation. They prided themselves on their scrupulous observance of the law and on their lives being free from open sin. Christ met them on their own ground, and showed them that the recovery and reformation of the sinner was pleasing to God. He desires that none should perish, but that all should forsake sin and return. They thought that as there were no flagrant sins in their lives to be repented of, that they were God's favorite children. Christ showed them that if, as they contended, they were free from such sins, their self-righteous attitude was not so pleasing to God as was the attitude of the man who knew he had done wrong, and abjured it and asked pardon. There was need for repentance on the part of those who claimed to be just persons, as Christ showed them over and over again; but he was teaching another lesson at that time, and was proving to them that, even assuming that they were sinless, as they claimed, they were wrong in the position they took toward the sinner.

A. A. B., Grover Hill, O. A book has come into my hands, in which the statement is made that the New Testament contains over 2,000 errors, and that the Sinaitic Version is the only correct one. Is there any basis for that statement?

Possibly if the errors of grammar and punctuation and mistranslation in the Authorized Version were counted, they might number 2,000. But that does not apply to the Revised Version. The Revisers had the Sinaitic Version before them when they performed their task, and derived assistance from it. Their fully, any one deliberately rejects it, there is nothing more to be done and he must be prepared for "the fiery indignation." It does not apply so much to wicked acts as to apostatizing and rejecting Christ. Neither penance nor any other way is open; "there remaineth no more sacrifice." It does not mean that that one does not still avail, if appeal is made to it, but that it does not need to be repeated like the Jewish sacrifices, and that there is no other. 2. Such persons may be backsliders, but the latter word is generally used of persons who return to a sinful life, rather than to those who deliberately and wilfully reject Christ.

R. N. T., Dalhousie, N. B., Can. You ask questions which are incapable of being answered. It would be folly and presumption Russell Wallace, Prof. Mourawoff, of St. Petersburg University; Sir Oliver Lodge, of England; Profs. Joire, of France, and Van Eeden, of Belgium, and a score of others in support of this assertion. We do not believe the study of any of the sciences leads to infidelity, but that, on the contrary, such study would rather tend to impress upon the mind a greater wonder at the marvels of the universe and a higher reverence for the Creator.

Subscriber, Ocean Grove, N. J. What did the Civil War cost in money, and lives of men?

It cost the North $4,700,000,000, the South $2,300,000,000. The North lost in killed, wounded, or died of disease, 280,000; the South 520,000.

G. S., Milwaukee, Wis. Kindly name the principal divisions of missionary activities and good causes fostered by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and the religious denominations under whose auspices said work is conducted.

In foreign missions, the India orphan work is the best known; 5,400 orphans are supported and trained by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD contributions. The work is interdenominational. In rescue work in the home field, the Bowler Mission is probably the oldest and most widely known mission of its kind in America. It is supported by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and is wholly undenominational. In juvenile work, the Children's Home, Mont-Lawn, New York, is a benevolent which has sheltered and cared for 22,000 tenement children in the last ten years. It is evangelical, and all denominations are represented among the beneficiaries. There are many others in which we are interested; indeed it is no exaggeration to say that the charities and good works of our readers reach out to almost every land under the sun.

M. M., Sac City, Ia. I read that the newly discovered substance called radium, will burn a person if carried in a bottle in the pocket. How is it handled? In what can it be kept?

It is usually kept in a glass tube and carried in a metallic or leather covering, being kept away from contact with the person. It is true that it will burn the one who carries it if not carefully handled.

Writing from Winona Lake, Ind., the Rev. J. Wilbur Chapman sends us his views concerning Bishop Potter and the saloon, which we gladly accord space, though somewhat late. He says: "I have the highest regard for Bishop Potter personally, and appreciate all he has done for the cause of Christ and the uplifting of humanity; but my work has been so constantly among men, and I have learned to know so much of the awful evil of the saloon, that I cannot, for the love of me, understand how a minister of the Gospel would in any way countenance the establishment of any kind of saloon, however carefully it might be guarded by those interested in it to have it conform to the law. I believe that great harm has been done to the cause of Christ in general, and the temperance cause in particular."

Good News to the Friends of our DROP-LEAF BUTTERFLY CALENDAR

THE Forbes Lithograph Co. made an accidental overrun on our Drop-Leaf Butterfly Calendar for 1904-1905, and these extra copies must be sacrificed to make room for new stock. Last year we published in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD the following concerning this Calendar:

★ ★ ★ ★

Rarely, if ever, has a calendar been issued that can compare with our Superb Drop-Leaf Butterfly Calendar for 1904 and 1905. The best artists known were engaged to reproduce in all their Natural Brilliance and Richness of Coloring, a series of Tropical and Semi Tropical Butterflies, and The Forbes Lithograph Company had the original butterflies continually at hand, to enable them, step by step, to compare their work with nature's product.

They have marvelously succeeded in accurately reproducing all the delicate tracings, and never was more perfect work issued from any lithographic press. Four Lovely Children's Faces lend additional grace and beauty to this Art Production, which covers a space, when unfolded, of 10½ by 29 inches, or over 300 Square Inches, and supplies the calendar for Two Whole Years. This Artistic Gem will beautify many a home during the coming two years.

Fifteen Printings were required to bring the work to the highest standard which The Christian Herald always demands, and on which its enviable reputation for superior work has been established.

★ ★ ★ ★

As the Calendar contains the whole of this and all of the next year, it makes an exceedingly useful and beautiful Holiday Gift.

We sold large numbers of it at 25 cents each. To close out the small lot now on hand, we will sacrifice them at Five Cents each, postage prepaid. Our subscribers thus get the benefit of this overrun. Remember the stock is absolutely new and fresh. Act promptly, or you will surely be too late.

While it is doubtless true that there are more educated than uneducated sceptics and atheists, it is generally found, upon investigation, that the education, in such cases, has been shallow and superficial, dipping into theology and philosophy without giving sincere consideration to any problem presented, and leaping at conclusions from very uncertain premises. Your true scientist or scholar, on the other hand, approaches these subjects with an impartial mind, and his investigations bring him ultimate conviction of the great truths of religion and the life hereafter. OUR LATEST GIFT TO INDIA

The X-Ray Machine presented by "Christian Herald" Readers to Ludhiana Hospital for Fighting the Leprosy Scourge

WHEN Dr. Alice Condict, the brave little American medical missionary interested in the lepers of India, appealed to the readers of this journal several months ago, to aid her in procuring an X-Ray machine for use in her work, he did so with the consciousness that she was asking the most unusual thing. Many thousands of miles away from the scene of her efforts in Ludhiana, India, it was not to be expected that any very lively interest would be manifested in her humane project. But she made the plea in hope, and prayed that some hearts might be touched with a sense of kinship for those far-away sufferers.

Dr. Condict, a few weeks ago, was called from India to America, where she expects to make only a brief stay before returning to her work at Ludhiana. Within twenty-four hours after setting foot on her native shores, she visited THE CHRISTIAN HERALD office in the Bible House, New York. There she was told that her prayer had been answered; that good friends had contributed the greater part of the necessary amount through this journal, and that all that was now needed, was that she should make her choice of an X-Ray machine from among a number that had been submitted by leading manufacturers.

The little woman's eyes danced with pleasure, and then suddenly filled with tears of joy, when she heard this welcome news.

"It's just like THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and its good people!" she exclaimed. "It is wonderful! wonderful! to think how they remembered my poor little appeal, and how grandly they have responded. Oh, I have prayed and prayed for this machine, and here is the answer. My heart is full of joy and gratitude to the kind friends who have made it possible to carry this great blessing back with me."

"There are only two X-Ray machines in all India, that I know of," she added. "I have seen epithelioma, lupus, and other skin diseases melt and disappear beneath continued applications of the X-Ray. But how was I to get this apparatus? In my extremity I turned to Dr. Klopsch, the friend of India, and before I realized it, the money was raised—all but a small amount, which I now will be forthcoming as soon as the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD know it is needed—and I was called upon to select the machine, which was purchased immediately."

"I bless God that I am a woman, otherwise I could not carry the X-Ray to those secluded women of India, or no man doctor—not even a native—is allowed to see his patient, but prescribes the dust of diamonds or the ashes of pearls for her, as her hand is thrust through a curtain for this wise quack to examine. I have already been permitted to save many lives and to mitigate the sufferings of many women, and now I am going back, armed and equipped with the most powerful means of doing both, that has yet been discovered. How can I ever be grateful enough?"

"The X-Ray will cure many different kinds of skin disease, and if it will not entirely heal the leper, it will arrest the disease, and mitigate the suffering inseparable from the dread scourge. I feel positive, after what I have seen demonstrated, that the X-Ray can cure leprosy, if taken in time."

Asked when she became interested in the women of India, Dr. Condict replied: "I have always been interested in them, even when a little child. When I grew older and became a physician, I never gave up the idea that sometime, somehow, in God's own good time and bers of young, devoted native Indian women, who are in our North India School of Medicine for native Christian women, at Ludhiana, doing splendid work. Among these are Rosie Singh, Mary Morton, Doris Ward, and Saloma Prem Mashi, who are most capable and earnest native workers. This school is the only medical college exclusively for India's women; the only one that is suited to give an Indian girl the education necessary for work in medical missions, and in the homes of India's secluded and suffering women. It is now nearly ten years since Dr. Edith M. Brown established this school, with the co-operation of other Christian workers and missionaries of various denominations, since which time it has graduated many competent hospital assistants, nurses and compounders, for several different missionary societies.

"I wish you could be near when some of those covered zenana carts come in from the jungles, bringing a sick woman for our hospital," said Dr. Condict. "The news travels to some far-off village about what seemed a marvelous cure. If one woman has come back from the hospital well, the fear and superstition and dread of that whole village will melt into confidence and cheerful trust, and it won't be many days before some other poor, well-nigh hopelessly sick woman, will be led to try the Doctor Mem Sahibs (lady doctors).

"One woman who dared to trust herself inside the Christie Log Dawah Kanah (The Christian Medicine House), and has come back well, is the heroine of that whole district.

"Oh! they are so kind!" she said. "I had Brahmin roti (bread). Yes! A true Brahmin cooked it! Yes, she made it into chow patties, just as we bake it on a griddle! They said my sauree (dress), was too dirty; but they gave me another red one, like I always wear. You never could believe how often they washed me and my sauree."

"They sang strange songs, and they did pujah (prayers), but you couldn't see their God; but they said he was there. It did seem so, for they were always talking about him. No one scolded or screamed, or got angry. Something made it different, and they said their God is love, and his Spirit got into the nurses, and those young Mem Sahibs. Yes! The nurses and young women who learned to be doctors—Mem Sahibs, were so different from us Hindu log (Hindu people). They always have on such clean white dresses and speak so softly! It did seem as if some big god had got hid inside somewhere. I never got sight of him, but we felt Him plain enough."

I resigned my position in connection with a medical mission in Chicago, and sold my personal belongings to raise funds for my expenses to India. When I arrived in Bombay, I had just ten dollars left; but I found good friends, and I soon had practice enough to pay all current expenses. But how small I felt, and how insignificant seemed any effort I might make, when I thought of the 150,000,000 of India's women, so few, so very few of whom had ever heard the name of Christ. THE WORTH OF A MAN

A Sermon at Ocean Grove, N. J., by Bishop Luther B. Wilson, Chattanooga, Tenn.

The audience leaving the great Auditorium at Ocean Grove after a week-day service

YOU will doubtless recall the circumstances under which the words of the text were spoken. Jesus had gone into the synagogue, as was his custom, and there chanced to be there that day a man with a withered hand. The critics were there also, and they desired, if possible, to find in the Saviour that which would furnish them ground for accusation. And so, seeing him and the man, they recognized that a chance had come for the asking of a difficult question. And so they propounded to him whether it was lawful for one to heal on the Sabbath day. Jesus, in his answer, refreshed their memory as to the old law, and then amplified the significance of that old law by the question of the text.

We are all sure of the fact that there is within us, always and everywhere, the ethical sense. All that we need is that it shall be educated and wisely directed. Going over the Great Divide, one sees the snow-fields there, and knows that there will be water on the hills, and water in the channels. It does not need that there shall be brought into operation any new force. It is only necessary that the forces which are already present in the world shall be distributed in order that "the desert shall rejoice and blossom as the rose." Take the ethical sense that is in humanity, and let it be wisely directed, and there shall come clearly into our view the vision of the world renewed in righteousness.

I beg your thought for this question of the text, not only as it stands related simply to the matter of Sabbath observance, but as it stands related to our general thinking and acting. "How much then is a man better than a sheep?" It may be that someone is ready to say, "that question is an irrelevant question." I beg to remind you that it was not an irrelevant question in the day of Lot, when, choosing for himself a place of residence, he thought of the fields where the flocks and the herds might be pastured, forgetful of the moral conditions into which he introduced his household.

The World's Estimate

And we remember well that day when David, upon his throne, listened to Nathan the prophet, telling that simple story of the two men, one of them a rich man and the other a poor man, and of the poor man's possession of the one ewe lamb; and how the rich man, passing by his own flocks and herds, went to the home of the poor man and took his one ewe lamb. Do you remember how David rose from his seat, and said that a man that would do such a thing as that was worthy of death; and how Nathan pointed his finger at him and said, "Yes, and you are the man?"

The ethical sense does not always work out its legitimate ends, because we do not apply it logically and equally. While the world has seemed to come more and more to the adequate estimate of the value of a man, it is because of the frame of fire that is about him. If only we might enter into the homes of poverty, if only we might climb the steps up into a tenement, and down in the slums, where humanity seeks a shelter from the storm, and a place to sleep; if only you might take your place beside some great thoroughfare, along which the multitudes are passing, you would discover that, after all, it is the frame that attracts attention to the picture.

I want to ask this question, "How much better, then, is a man than a sheep?" It is an important question; it is a significant question, and I pray that the good God may bring out of its consideration something of blessedness to us, and through us to the great world that we are continually teaching and influencing.

*Text: Matthew 12, 12: "How much then is a man better than a sheep?"

A day or two ago I stood in the great Exposition at St. Louis, and I saw the productions there of human genius—the stately buildings, the rippling fountains, the sparkling lights that turned night into day. But I confess to you that that which lingers with me, and which most deeply impressed me, was the portrait of a man. It was in the Gallery of Fine Arts, and the portrait was that of the German Emperor William. There he stood, every line that the artist had laid upon the canvas was a line of imperial majesty, so that he looked a kingly, imperial man standing there, as the multitude passed by.

So if you take the portrait of a man simply physical, and contrast that portrait with the picture that is in the memory of us all, of this sheep grazing upon the hillside, what an immeasurable distance seems to separate the two. This creature upon the hillside, the head turned toward the earth; the only instinct the instinct which leads to green pastures and beside quiet streams.

Intrinsic Value

Let us take away the robes of office, and the star from the breast, and the crown from the brow, and leave just a man—a common man, but a man who stands straight up and looks over the fields and the forests and the lakes, along to where the sky kisses the earth, and looks up to where the sun crowns the mountains, and up to where the stars of God are each set in its appointed place. Oh, the dignity of this man! Touch his muscle, and look at his eye, and then go back and look at the creature in the field, and know that you cannot measure the distance between them.

Man is not limited to the physical, nor to the intellectual. Going over this great continent you may see everywhere the indication of the fact that our nation has taken account of the man thus far; but I do not believe that we shall establish our claim to have fully comprehended the situation, until the gateways to perdition in all our great cities throughout the country are closed.

Between Baltimore and Washington I have seen a place where they quarantine the cattle, because they were fearful lest some disease of the individual animal might contaminate the herd. I pray for the coming of that day when there shall be a quarantine for humanity, when they shall be free to resist any influence that has a reeking cesspool, for the pollution and taint of the moral atmosphere in which men live. "How much then is a man better than a sheep?" Let us pray and labor that everything that we do for a sheep may at least be done for a man. It has not been so always, and it is not so even yet.

The answer to this question determines the value of your civilization. It determines the tendency and zeal of every religious movement. It determines the tenor and quality of every life. How much a man is better than a thing!

A Market Valuation

I am glad to believe that Ocean Grove stands for a fair estimate of a man's worth, and that it does not believe in a Sunday in which humanity is simply to run sheep-like over the hills; and a week in which the dominant ideas and impulses should be simply a development of the social plane. Ocean Grove has a sane idea of what a man is worth, and is seeking to shape all its machinery and plan to this idea.

What will the man bring? That is what we are asking about the sheep. How much wool can we shear from the sheep? How much is he worth on the hoof? How much is he worth a pound, this sheep in the field? How far have you advanced in your thinking, and how nearly have you come to a proper answer to this question, when you think of humanity as being worth simply what humanity will bring? When you talk about men as hands, and think about them only as hands, you put your man down on a level with the sheep. You are only thinking of how you can shear him, and how you can convert him into twentieth century economics and gold for your pocket. My friends, that is no fair question to ask about any man, what you can get for him. You are in a realm of commercialism that is not much above raw barbarism when you have such a conception as that. Humanity is not worth only what humanity will bring.

Here is a veteran of the fields. He was once a man in every sense of the word. He stood six feet in his stockings. He bared his brow and held his head erect. He marched behind the drums, fearing not; brave even. He carried his gun to the field, and then, by the price of heroism, purchased the right to carry back a sword with him. There he stands, but he is a maimed veteran. He cannot carry sword or musket any longer; and the face that once was bronzed is now wrinkled with years, and the years sit so heavy on his shoulders that he is bowed down to the earth; and one sleeve is quite empty. What would you take for him? It is not a fair question that a man should be determined by the tag-mark that a brute commercialism has placed upon him. You cannot figure it out on that hypothesis. Humanity was only worth what it would bring, there are some of us to-day that might have to retire from business.

I go back to the beginning and think that God does not seem to have made man as he made the sheep. When it came to man God paused for a moment at the thought of how he could fashion him, and fit him in the holy beauty that was to stand for his own conception. God has invested in man his own thought.

Enhanced by Heroism

I think of the movement of human history. I think of manhood and womanhood in the conflict of the ages, struggling and striving and fighting a thousand battles upon all the battle-fields of the earth. I think of that movement in human history that began with the beginning and has continued down to the present day. I think of the womanhood that never knew this man and yet was widowed for him, when that womanhood surrendered the arm on which it leaned, that that arm might fight the battle of coming generations. I think of man dying on the battle-field, that a larger liber might be born. I hear the poets singing of them. I see the seers climb the hills, and write as they look. I see the priests sacrificing for them, and the preachers of righteousness seeking to lead on and up to the heights of a newer and better civilization. I see that this has entered into the life of every one of us here to-day. We are not always prepared to comprehend the significance of the past and present; but the very evidences of our civilization are cemented in the blood of heroes who have died without a sight of that civilization.

Think of the mother of this manhood. There is nothing this side of the Gate of Pearl that is quite so magnificent as holy motherhood. That word, so broad, its loving, so deep in its bearing. What has motherhood put into the manhood of to-day, out of its own life, out of its own blood, out of its own agonizing heart? What has motherhood put into this child to-day—that young fellow that left college with the light of hope in his eye. How much is a mother's heart worth? How much is it worth to have a mother's prayers? How much is it worth to have a mother's toe to the cradle so softly that she shall not wake the sleeping infant, and there, on her knees before God, seeking to have all the angels come and camp about her sleeping child? How much is it worth to have the

A Great Church Convention

NOTABLE from many points of view is the Convention which assembles in Boston, Mass., on October 5. It is the forty-first triennial General Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church. Compared with the small body of delegates gathered in 1785, in Emmanuel Church, Baltimore, Md., provide for the government of the Church under the new order of political conditions, the assembly of distinguished men who will meet in Emmanuel Church, Boston, next month, is a numerous and imposing company. The Convention is notable, too, on account of the mental calibre of its members. No branch of the Church of Christ has been more insistent than the Protestant Episcopal Church, on a thorough training of the men to minister at its altars. This has been necessary on account of a large liberty of thought conceded to them. There is room under its roof for all shades of religious opinion, from the extreme evangelical to the extreme rationalist, and for men whose views differ but little from that of the Unitarian. It speaks highly for the broad tolerance and Christian love of the clergy, that men differing so widely from one another can meet together in harmony, to loyally work for the welfare and advancement of their Church.

The Convention is representative. The Bishops are members ex-officio, and constitute one house. The other house consists of four clergymen and four laymen from each of the sixty-two dioceses of the country, and one clergyman and one layman from each of the twenty-five missionary districts. Either of the houses may initiate legislation; but the concurrence of both houses is necessary to the validity of any enactment.

The Convention is the highest legislative authority in the Church. It is, however, so far democratic as to submit questions of high importance to the various dioceses previous to their being decided by the Convention, in order that the general opinion of the whole Church throughout the country may be elicited. Care is taken to avoid hasty or precipitate legislation. The changes in the canons which are urged by any particular school, are carefully considered by committees appointed by one Convention to report at the next, three years later. There is thus time not only for the committees to ventilate the question, but for the delegates to the Convention to form an opinion before receiving and endorsing the reports of the committees.

This Convention will have before it several reports of such committees. One of these refers to a change in the name of the Church. On this question the committee reports its opinion that a change at this time would be inexpedient. Another question has arisen through the vast increase in the membership of the Church and the immense area of the country. It has been suggested that the dioceses be grouped in provinces. The proposal is endorsed by the committee appointed to consider it, with the recommendation that seven prov-sal will be one of the most important in the Convention. Besides these, the Convention will have to consider a long and comprehensive report from a committee which has been engaged for several years on a revision of the canons and reports from other committees appointed by the previous general Convention.

An interesting feature of the Convention will be the presence of a distinguished visitor in the person of the Most Reverend Dr. Davidson, Archbishop of Canterbury. Never before has a Primate of the Mother Church been present at a Convention of the American Church, and his visit will make this Convention a memorable one. His portrait, and the report of a sermon he preached shortly before setting out for this country, appeared in this journal on July 27.

On this page, with the picture of the church in which the Convention will meet, are portraits of some of the officers who have charge of the arrangements. Their work has been onerous and responsible, but their ability and the devotion with which they have carried it on assures its being well and thoroughly done. Mr. Dana, who is chairman of the General Committee, is a well-known lawyer in Boston, Mass. He is a son of the author of the famous book, Two Years Before the Mast. Mr. Dana has taken a prominent part in civil service reform and other public movements. He has also given special attention to the organization of associate charities, and to the Young Men's Christian Association, of which, in 1890, he was elected chairman. Dr. Hutchins, who is Secretary of the House of Deputies, has served several parishes in New York, Buffalo, Lowell, Medford, and other cities. He is the compiler of a hymn-book that bears his name, and has edited several musical works. Rev. John McGaw Foster, the Secretary of the General Committee, is the Rector of the Church of the Messiah, Boston. He was formerly Rector of St. John's Church, Bangor, Me., and Honorary Canon of St. Luke's Cathedral, Portland, Me. Mr. Minot, Chairman of the Committee on Entertainment, is a nephew of Bishop Grafton, and is a recognized leader in Boston society, with a record that specially fits him for his present duties. Dr. Addison, chairman of the Committee on Arrangements, is Rector of All Saints' Church, Brookline, Mass.

man gather into her own life all the bitterness of the old's disappointments, and try to bury them in her broken heart, that he may not see them?

Go back over the centuries. Gather up the groans of the men who have died. Weigh in the golden balance the significance of the sigh that escaped from patriotism on the firing line, when his red blood rushed out in obedience to the bullet when the enemy shot him down.

Go back over the centuries. We climb a little hill and look up to Him who hangs upon the central Cross. Look into his face, and see, if you can, the love that shines from those dying eyes. Look, as the crown of thorns starts the ruby jewels from that brow, and see the quivering agony of the palms pierced by the nails. Watch the tremor of his flesh as it suffers and bleeds for a world's sinfulness. Hear him cry, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" And tell me what it is worth to hear the Son of God cry out like that. What is it worth to see his face in deadly pallor, and see those crimson drops gush from him, baptizing this world of ours to a newness of everlasting worth? Tell me what it is worth, and I will tell you what your man is worth; for your man has in him, or ought to have in him, all the purchase of the crimson drops that fell on Calvary.

What will he come to? What will you make of this man? Elijah also was only a man, and Peter was only a man. The evident design of God is not to take a thing that earth has made; but it is to lift up a common man and make him a king, and to make out of every woman in the humble homes of earth a queen. The man redeemed by the blood of Jesus rises from his low estate and moves out and takes his place beside the conquering hosts of the centuries, and marches on into the glories of the palace of God.

This is what God can make. Any sinner can be made into a saint by the blood of Christ; and any scarred and maimed and ruined soul can be made white and glorious, and can bear the image of "Him whose we are and whom we seek to serve." Don't throw yourself away in sin. You are worth too much to throw yourself away; worth too much to risk the eternal years for the price of a moment's sin.

When I think of this man and of what he may be, I am so glad God does not hold his watch in his hand. God shall give him not an hour, not a year, not a century. God will be better than that. God will give him all eternity to prove what every man is worth under the shadow of the Cross, and in the presence of the glory of the conquering Christ.

Synopsis of Preceding Chapters

THE story begins in an ancient tower in Provence, where, early in 1793, the Marquis de Vaudémont, a French noble, his grandson Honoré, and his granddaughter Louise, aged seventeen, are besieged by a mob of their former tenants, reinforced by Jacobin soldiery, led by Jean Garron, an enemy of the Marquis. Garron, through his violence and excesses in the "Reign of Terror," has been made a lieutenant in the French Navy, and is in command of the besiegers. In the defense of the tower, the three de Vaudémonts are assisted by Brébœuf, a retainer of the family, and by Aurore, a peasant woman, foster-sister of Louise. They are at the point of surrender, when an English ship-of-the-line, cruising along the coast, appears in sight, throws a few shot into the besiegers' camp, lands a party and rescues the besieged. The landing party is in charge of Lieutenant Macartney, an Irish officer in the English Navy. With the landing party is the captain of the ship, Sir Horatio Nelson. The young Comtesse Louise de Vaudémont admits them at the gate of the tower. Nelson transports all the de Vaudémont party to Toulon, which is in revolt against the Jacobins. Macartney falls in love with Louise, but his suit is met with cold disdain.

The siege of Toulon is described picturesquely. The arrival of a young French artillery officer, a military genius, is followed by the capture of Fort Musgrave, and the immediate abandonment of the harbor by the English fleet. Many fugitive Girondists and Royalists embark on the English ships. Amid scenes of terrible confusion the French Republican Army storms and pillages the town; the inhabitants being slaughtered with ruthless ferocity. Again the de Vaudémonts are rescued and received on board an English frigate, which is now commanded by Macartney, and are taken to Italy, and thence to Austria.

The scene now changes to 1798. Honoré de Vaudémont gets a command in the French Army, but plots to capture Napoleon. The old Marquis and his granddaughter take ship for Brittany, to head a revolt in La Vendée. They are captured by a French fleet, and are put aboard Le Tonnant, under the command of the Marquis' old enemy, Jean Garron. Among the papers of the Marquis, in confinement, and threatens to betray the plot to Napoleon, which will cause the death of Honoré and of the Marquis, unless Louise consents to his suit. Macartney in his frigate is also captured by the French fleet, and, by a singular coincidence, finds himself a prisoner on Le Tonnant.

THE MEDITERRANEAN

CHAPTER XXIII

FRIENDS ON "LE TONNANT"

EARLY in May, 1798, Lord St. Vincent, commanding the blockading fleet of Cadiz, sent Macartney, in the Inconstant, to the Mediterranean to Nelson, now a rear-admiral, commanding a small squadron observing Toulon. Macartney brought word of the detachment of several ships from St. Vincent's command with orders to report to Nelson. These ships would give the rear-admiral a formidable force. To him was submitted the task of watching Bonaparte, of keeping him in the harbor, if possible, of following him, and defeating him in case he got away.

Fortune favored the French, for before Macartney's arrival, and before the other ships reached him, Nelson's flagship, the Van-guard, was dismasted in a storm and driven to the coast of Sardinia. Before he could return, the great fleet of Bonaparte got to sea. In the storm, Nelson lost touch with his frigates. Of scouting ships he had with him only the Inconstant. He immediately despatched Macartney to get in touch with the French, and report to him as soon as possible where they had gone, while he followed after with the great ships-of-the-line which had joined his original force.

Before his departure, Nelson explained his views as to the probable destination of the French at great length to the captain of his solitary frigate, upon whom so much depended. Macartney, in full possession of Nelson's conclusions that the French must be bound for Egypt, carefully considered his course. He determined to run direct for Malta, along the western side of Sardinia. Between Sicily and Africa the Mediterranean contracted to its narrowest width. If he could get there before the French fleet, they could hardly pass without being observed by him, especially if they were headed for Malta. If they disdained Malta and went straight to Egypt, they might pass through the straits of Messina, although that, considering their numbers and the difficult navigation entailed by the narrow strait, was hardly likely. For Sicily, therefore, he laid his course, and as the wind was favorable he made tremendous progress.

Few ships were ever driven as was the Inconstant. Yet, if he had had the faintest suspicion that, upon the decks of one of the ships he was striving to come up with, he should find Louise de Vaudémont, the pace, which to his ardent impetuosity seemed slow enough, would have driven him mad.

The run to Sicily was made without any mishap or adventure. He spent two days in beating across to Cape Bon on the North African coast, and then, finding nothing, he ran for Cape Passaro. He heard nothing there and determined to try Malta next. On the evening of the 20th of June he made a landfall, which his navigation determined to be that island. He ran along the northern side of the island for the harbor of Valetta.

The night was dark and rainy. The wind was blowing a half gale. Macartney had set his main topgal-which had run into him had sheered off in the darkness. No one, of course, could tell that she had been in collision with an English ship. If no more French came that way he might get off. The men of the constant worked with feverish energy to get the ship in serviceable condition again. But to no avail. She had been so strained by the force of the blow that she made water badly, and every wave flooded her through her shattered broken side. Only toiling at the pumps enabled her to keep afloat. They had managed to get a jury foretopmast and set some sail on it, but when morning came she was a sorry hulk indeed.

Right in her track came a belated squadron of French ships, the rear division of the armada. There were a number of transports convoyed by two or three frigates and corvettes and a ship-of-the-line. Seeing the bedraggled wreck of the Inconstant, two of the French frigates ran down toward her and demanded her surrender. It was useless, of course, but Macartney could not give up his ship without a fight. He stood off the two ships desperately, dismasted one seriously cut up the other, until the whole squadron came swarming down upon him. Then the ship-the-line took a hand, ended the unequal struggle by a broadside which completely wrecked the constant.

Macartney had been seriously wounded, and senseless on the deck. There was no flag to hoist down for none had been flying. Over half his crew had been killed and wounded. Not a gun was serviceable and the ship was in sinking condition. The boarders from the ship the line took possession of the frigate without further resistance. It was impossible to save her. Her crew were distributed as prisoners of war throughout the French squadron. Her captain, in an unconscious condition, was taken aboard the ship-of-the-line.

Nelson had lost his frigate, and Macartney failed to give him the news.

They were kind enough to the English captain when they got him aboard Le Tonnant, for that ship it was which had captured him, and at Dupetit Thours' suggestion he was passed below into one of the spare staterooms of the ship, from the captain's cabin occupied by the other prisoners. The de Vaudémonts had been sent below during the action, much to the disgust of the Marquis, and they knew little of what had transpired, until the senseless form of English captain was brought into the cabin.

Macartney's face was grimed with powder and covered with blood from a nasty scrape of a piece of iron grage along his forehead, and no one recognized him. When the surgeon of the vessel had examined him and pronounced his wound in the shoulder serious, though not mortal, Louise de Vaudémont, with her grandfather's permission, had offered to assist in taking care of him. She could do no less, indeed, for one who had been fighting the battles of her king against Republicans, and had been wounded in the service.

Thus, it happened that when Macartney opened his eyes, after a little space, he saw bending over him the lovely face of the woman he adored. He stared at her in complete bewilderment, a curious, puzzled look in his eyes. Then he lifted his hand to his face and found it across his eyes as if to shut out the vision. As he did so, his fingers touched the bandage. He felt carefully with his hand. Recognition swept across his countenance.

"Ah—my ship," he said faintly. "We—were captured by—the French fleet. Yes—we made a good fight—but that last broadside—did for us. What ship is this? How came I here?"

"What! Monsieur le Chevalier!"
exclaimed the Marquis

lant sail over a reefed main topsail in his determination to drive her to the last limit. Going at a terrific speed he ran slap into the French fleet in the darkness. They had seized Malta and occupied Valetta, and had that very day taken their departure for Egypt. The French ships were distributed over the ocean in great disorder for miles. Before Macartney realized it he was hopelessly mixed up with the scattered flotilla.

He did not despair of extricating himself from his predicament, however, and to that end brought to bear all the resources of his seamanship and skill. He might have won clear of the mass of ships into which he had first burst, but just as he fancied he had open water before him he ran into another division. In the darkness and confusion, one of the largest of the French transports, a ship which had been in the East Indian service, and was almost as big as a ship-of-the-line, crashed into him in spite of all he could do to avoid the collision. The shock stove in the side of the frigate to the water-line, just abaft the foremast. The foretopmast was carried away and the main topgallant-mast speedily followed. The dashing and beautiful Inconstant was almost a wreck.

Still her commander did not despair. The ship

He was translating his thoughts into words. He opened his eyes again. His glance fell once more upon the woman he loved bending over him. He stared and stared.

The heart of Louise de Vaudémont rose in her throat and beat so that she felt as if it would choke her. Her bosom heaved. Her body shook with agitation. If she had had any doubt or hesitation before, she realized now her love for this man. France and the king? They were as nothing—love was all. He was speaking again.

"Comtesse," whispered Macartney, "is it another dream? I have seen you often so—Louise—"

"Monsieur," murmured the girl, her face aflame with color.

"My heavens!" exclaimed the man with sudden strength lifting himself on his unwounded arm and crying, "Did you speak? Are you alive? Is it indeed—"

He stretched out his hand toward her. She was bending close above him and did not shrink away. His hand fell upon her shoulder. She did not move.

"Yes," she said, "it is I."

"Alive? Here? What happy chance—"

"Hush!" said the woman, laying her finger lightly on his lips. "I—you lost your ship. You remember? They brought you here. I am a prisoner like yourself."

"I had rather die than lose that ship," said Macartney faintly, "yet to find you—what will Nelson do? How I loved you all these years! If I could have only seen you away! Oh, if there was some way to carry the news! And to see you again! You—you! Yet, I could only let the admiral—"

"You are exciting yourself, monsieur," said the woman with gentle insistence, "the surgeon gave me strict orders that you were to say nothing. You must be still. You have been badly wounded. You must be quiet. Perhaps I would better—"

"You won't leave me. You won't go away?" cried Macartney. "I shall die if I lose you now! If you will only stay here by my side—just let me look at you! I will promise—there! Sit down. I shall say nothing. There's nothing to be said but that I love you."

"And to that I cannot listen, monsieur," returned the comtesse, "I—am—"

"Don't say again you are for France," cried Macartney, "you have been for France so long, now be a little trile for me."

The comtesse smiled at him but made no answer. "Monsieur!" she called after a moment, rising and opening the door. "If you will step hither you will find an old friend."

Presently her grandfather came into the cabin.

"What! Monsieur le Chevalier!" he exclaimed. "Even so, my lord," said the young man.

"And you, Louise?" asked the old man apropos of the thing apparently, looking keenly at his granddaughter, and well he might, for such radiant beauty of happiness as she then exhibited he had never before seen upon her face.

She fairly filled the room with it. Her grandfather read such signs before in other women and easily recognized what they meant. What wretched fortune, he thought, had brought this persistent Irishman upon them at this juncture? Yet, in spite of himself, he and a flickering hope rising in his breast at the sight of the man.

Their situation had daily grown more desperate. Macartney apparently had not ended it summarily because he was greatly enjoying the daily torture that he inflicted upon the marquis, although he would have joyed it a thousand times more if the marquis had given him any outward sign of his inward anguish. As he might, the old man could not think of any way by which he could extricate himself—or rather his granddaughter, for he cared nothing for himself—from her awful predicament. The appearance of Macartney, helpless, wounded though he was, yet put new life into the marquis' veins. Twice in imminent crises the Irishman had brought salvation. Like most of his kind the marquis was something of a fatalist. Perhaps, through Macartney, salvation had come again. So, what then? He had not changed his own views as to the suitability of an alliance very greatly, but conditions had changed him.

He felt now that he would never live to see a king on the ancient, the rightful line, upon the throne. His dignities and properties could never be restored to him unless he were willing to pay a price from which he shrank with a repugnance that could not be overcome; the price was an allegiance to, and acknowledgment of, the French Republic. Perhaps not even that!

Would it not be better to allow his granddaughter to consult the wishes of her own heart and marry the man she loved, even though he were a foreigner, than to sacrifice her happiness in some of the alliances of mere seeming advantage which had been proposed to her? Well, that was in the future.

"Monsieur Macartney," he said at last, "for your sake, I am sorry to see you in so desperate a case. For our own, I am glad you are here. You have been our good genius. Perhaps you can help us again."

"Are you in trouble, monsieur?" asked Macartney. "We are prisoners, sir. But you cannot bear this now. To-morrow. Then you must grow strong to help us—to help mademoiselle yonder."

"Is she in danger?" cried the young man, half rising from the bed. "If so, I am well."

"Not yet, not now," said the marquis quickly, while Louise laid a restraining hand upon her lover's shoulder. "You will be of good service to us, to her, I am sure, monsieur, as soon as you gain your strength. But that must come first. You will hear all to-morrow. Meantime, I believe we are in no immediate danger. And perhaps you can save us. You have done so twice before."

"And if I do, my lord," asked Macartney eagerly, "what then? What reward shall I have?"

"Do the gentlemen of England, Monsieur le Chevalier, serve demoiselles in straits, for a reward?" asked the marquis gravely.

"No, my lord," returned Macartney faintly. "you reprove me well, sir. I will do it for love of her—with no other thought."

"Who knows," said the admiral, tapping his snuff-box and looking quizzically down upon the wounded man, "if you succeed, in love you may find reward after all."

The Irishman stared at Louise, and the woman dropped her head and turned away under his beseeching glance. He could see nothing but the color that wavered in her cheek. The admiral smiled.

"Now there must be no more talk," he said, "or I shall stay with you myself."

"On my word," said Macartney quickly, "I will be silent. I am happy just to look at mademoiselle."

With a pleased laugh and a lighter heart than he had carried for weeks, the admiral left them alone.

CHAPTER XIX

PLAYING AT HIDE-AND-SEEK

MEANWHILE, Nelson was hurrying down the Mediterranean after the French. On the 22d of June, two French ships were seen on the horizon, and the Leander, which was far to starboard of the rest, dimly detected the outlines of a French battle ship off Cape Passaro. Nelson, however, did not learn that latter fact until some time after. As a matter of fact the French armada was close at hand. Not a dozen miles intervened between the two fleets, and the booming of signal-guns on the English fleet was distinctly heard by the French. The night was dark and rainy, and the French immediately swung to the northward, and by rare good fortune escaped discovery.

Nelson finally abandoned any further search of the sea, confident in his conclusions that the ships must have gone to Alexandria. Therefore he repaired to that port without further delay. The speed of a compact fleet of battle-ships was necessarily greater than that of a heterogeneous number of vessels of different kinds which made up the French armament, and the English were soon far ahead.

And Nelson wondered, and wondered, what had become of Macartney and the Inconstant. He reasoned it out finally, that the Irishman must have been captured, and that he had nothing in the way of tidings to expect from him, else he would have heard long since.

On the 29th of June, the English fleet sighted the coast of Egypt. They ran along the shore line, past Marabout and the old harbor, past the promontory bearing the Pharos of Ptolemy, which had looked upon the ships of Antony and had welcomed the flying flotilla of Cleopatra; past the new harbor, and then swept into the Bay of Aboukir, searching the low, sandy shore with the same intensity as the first fierce glow of the tropic sun above their heads.

Nothing was there, no sign of the French. Not a ship, not a vessel, save those usually trading in the harbor. They spoke with pilots who put off from the shore, and learned that no news of any prospective expedition had come to Egypt. The land was as peaceful as if no enemy lurked below the horizon.

Despair seized Nelson's heart. He gave way to one of those fits of depression to which he was liable. He had made a mistake! His judgment had been at fault! Egypt, after all, was not the destination of the French fleet. Where, then, could they have gone?

He did not tarry, he scarcely paused before Alexandria, but bore up for the Syrian coast in a sweep around the north shore of the Mediterranean. He was like a man crazed with a fever in his wild anxiety to find the French. If he had only waited, confident that he had fathomed Bonaparte's design! Scarcely had the mastheads of his liners disappeared beneath the horizon, when the sails of the van ships of the French armada rose upon his track.

On the 1st of July, the French dropped anchor off the little town of Marabout, some five miles to the westward of Alexandria. By the shallowness of the water, they were forced to anchor several miles from the shore. There Bonaparte learned that the English, under Admiral Nelson, had beaten him to the harbor. The news was frightfully portentous. Where had the English gone? Would they come back? Were they even now heading toward him? Fortune had favored him. Was it about to desert him now?

The surf was breaking heavily upon the shore. The wind was rising. The great ships tugged uneasily at their anchors. No one knew the value of time better than Bonaparte. The debarkation of the army under such circumstances would be perilous, but not a moment was to be lost. Any hour might bring the English down upon them.

"Five days, give me five days!" prayed the little captain, hastening the landing of the troops with all his fiery energy.

Fortune still smiled upon him, his lucky star was in the ascendant then, as it had been heretofore during the cruise. The landing was effected safely, without molestation. Indeed, a whole month elapsed before the hated English swooped down upon the French.

The city of Alexandria was taken by assault; the army marched to Cairo, the battle of the Pyramids was fought; the Mamelukes were defeated and broken, the country was subdued, and the first step of that dream of conquest, which would fain end in the Orient, was completed.

And still, no English ships whitened the horizon with their stained and weather-beaten canvas.

Where was Nelson?

CHAPTER XX

GARRON'S PROPOSITION

UNDER the skilful attention of the French surgeons, and the careful nursing of Louise de Vaudémont, Macartney rapidly recovered from his wound. When Le Tonnant dropped anchor off Marabout with the rest of the ships, he was able to be on deck again.

Fortunately for all of them, matters continued about in statu quo. For one reason, Garron, in common with the other French captains, was intensely busy with the various duties concerned with the debarkation of the army.

Garron took just enough notice, therefore, of the marquis, to keep that gentleman fully convinced that he had abated no jot or tittle of his pretensions toward the comtesse. He had not sent the incriminating papers to Bonaparte. He had not informed him of the plan to make away with him. He kept these things to himself. It amused him to play with the vice-admiral.

In his undertaking to make miserable the life of the old man, Garron made one fatal mistake. He forgot that he was also playing with France, and what was more dangerous, playing with Bonaparte. Woe be unto him, if that little captain should ever discover his temporizing and his hesitation!

If Garron was hated by his crew, he was despised by Vice-Admiral Brueys, and his subordinates and his brother captains in the French fleet. Many of these, although they had given their allegiance to the Republic, were brave and gallant gentlemen. Had it not been for Garron's influence—wavering, but still considerable—with the Directory, Brueys would have insisted upon his detachment from the ship, the command of which would have fallen naturally to Dupetit Thouars. Consequently, after the transports and smaller war vessels had found shelter in the harbor of Alexandria and the fleet was left to itself, no one, unless moved thereto by imperative duty, came to Le Tonnant.

Garron had taken but little notice of Macartney heretofore. The Irishman had been astute enough not to allow the slightest suspicion of his intimacy with the de Vaudémonts to become apparent; Garron did not dream that his captive was also in love with the woman he had deigned to cast his eye upon.

The outward intercourse between the prisoners was of the most formal and indifferent kind. Indeed, it was more or less formal when they were all indulging in the privacy of the captain's cabin, which had been set apart for their use; for the marquis had relented of his half-intended design to permit matters to proceed to a climax, and he interposed his presence most effectually, as a barrier to further love making.

Macartney was filled with indignation. But he had learned something during the last few years, and instead of blazing out as he would once have done and thereby creating a hopeless breach between himself and the marquis, he dissembled his feelings as much as possible from the old man, while he took advantage of every opportunity to exhibit them to Louise.

A Pernicious Movement

AN invitation has been sent out by a society with headquarters in St. Louis, Mo., to "persons of any sect," to attend an International Congress in that city in connection with the World's Fair. The writer of the invitation recalls the fact of a Congress of Religions having been held at the time of the World's Fair in Chicago, and says that representatives of Free Thought were excluded from it. The managers of the World's Fair at St. Louis have, he reports, been "more magnanimous," and have provided a free platform for a qualified representative of any religion to express his views. He then proceeds to state his own position.

Among other declarations made in the invitation, we read that the Christian Church falsely claims to have a special divine revelation; that "the time has now come to make the fact of the great Christian delusion known to all the world;" that "Christian dogmas are not true;" and that "the International Congress will be a grand time of jubilee for science and reason."

The arguments to support these statements will, we presume, be adduced at the Congress. The invitation contents itself with the boastful assertion. This is characteristic of the class of writers from whom the document emanates, and their reasoning is usually of the same kind. Unhappily, they impose on minds not accustomed to logical thinking, and influence men who accept coarse vilification and wicked abuse as demonstration.

It is, of course, easy to denounce Christianity as a superstition, as does the writer of the invitation. Words are cheap, and they can be used to stigmatize the highest and grandest doctrines as false. It will, however, be difficult to persuade the American people that a religion which has demonstrated its value in our institutions and our national life, is a mere superstition. The unthinking classes may be misled, but the great heart of the people will not be moved. It would be useless to try to predict the reasons that will be adduced to disprove the Christian faith, but the facts are a sufficient answer to them, whatever they may be. It is incontrovertible that Christianity improves society wherever it goes. The Christian is a law-abiding citizen, and the better Christian he is, the cleaner and purer, and more beneficent his life. "By their fruits ye shall know them." The opponents of Christianity evade this practical test. If they could eliminate Christianity from this nation, close every church and expel every preacher, would this country be one that any desirable citizen would wish to live in? Would life and property be as safe? We are thankful to know that the doctrines of Christianity can be defended on higher and more philosophical grounds than this, but on this ground alone, the patriotic citizen should be convinced. It is, therefore, a matter of regret that opportunity should be given for the dissemination of sophistries which may influence any mind against the most effective agent in the advancement and welfare of the nation.

Guard the Lips

IN the daily newspapers, recently, there was published the story of a man who, with inconceivable foolhardiness, placed in his own mouth the head of a diamond-back rattlesnake, one of the deadliest reptiles known to the naturalist. It sank its venomous fangs in his tongue, and he expired in agony in a few hours.

This man was accustomed to handling snakes, and, confident in his mastery of the reptile, he attempted a feat hitherto unheard of. To all intents and purposes, he threw his life away, for he knew the fatal consequences that must surely follow, if he were bitten.

There are many who are emulating in various ways, the example of this wretched snake-charmer, and taking into their mouths an enemy that bears in its fangs a poison that kills. The drinker who foolishly believes he can tame alcohol, finds sooner or later that its bite is deadly—that it kills conscience and character and wrecks body and soul. The slanderer, the profane man, the liar, are toying with venomous serpents that will yet sting most grievously.

If our bodies are temples in which there shall dwell even the slightest spark of divinity, we must carefully preserve them from less noble tenants. At every gate we must set a guard, lest the defiler enter. Lest unworthy thoughts should seek to occupy us, we must set ourselves the habit of right cogitation, so that when the enemy of purity knocks, he shall find no response. And knock he will, for all are subject to temptation; but the evil lies not in being tempted, but in dalliance with the tempter. Covetousness, lust, anger, falsehood, indulgence, evil ambition, and a host of others, alluring or repulsive, will seek to occupy the soul's citadel; but at every repulse their persistence will become feebler, and if we ask in Christ's name for Divine reinforcement, we will score victory after victory against the tempter, till at last he ceases from his annoyance and our souls are at peace.

Be Content

AFTER all, though a man may change about as much as he likes, there is a pretty substantial equipoise and identity in the amount of pain and pleasure in all external conditions.

The total length of day and night all the year round is the same at the North Pole and at the Equator—half and half—only, in the one place it is half and half for twenty-four hours, and in the other, the night lasts through gloomy months of winter, and the day is bright for unbroken weeks of summer. But when you come to add them up at the end of the year, the man that shivers in the ice and the man that pants in the torrid heat have had the same length of sunshine and of darkness.

Oh, it does not matter much at what degrees between the Equator and the Pole of earthly experiences we have to pass our lives; when the account comes to be made up at last we shall be all pretty much on an equality. All earthly conditions have nearly the same quantity of the raw material of pain and pleasure, and the amount of either actually experienced by us depends not on where we are, but on what we are.

Russia's Religious Leader

AMONG the three great Russian personalities of the present time—Tolstoi, the philosopher, Witte, the exponent of financial and commercial progress, and Pobiedonostseff, the cleric, the last is probably the least understood. The "Procurator of the Holy Synod" of Russia—the head of the orthodox Russo-Greek Church in the Czar's dominions—has throughout his whole public life striven to "make and keep the Church and the State identical." He sets his face like adamant against all innovation. "Let the people," he says, "have a fixed faith"—a belief in God the Father, in Christ the Son and Saviour, in the distinction between right and wrong; in other words, in the fundamentals of the Christian religion. Pobiedonostseff believes that by the power of this simple faith, all the various races and nationalities in Russia will yet be united, and that ultimately Russia will regenerate the world.

Such, we are informed by observant travelers, is the idea of the great Russian cleric which prevails throughout the empire. It is unquestionable that in most other lands there exists a totally different conception of M. Pobiedonostseff. He has been widely pictured as the man of all men who is responsible for many of Russia's calamities, and especially for the bitter persecution of the various religious sects who did not conform to the orthodox faith—a relentless, pitiless fanatic, filled with the vengeful spirit of the Spanish inquisition; a man of low spiritual ideals, but measureless ambition; as ready to slay as to anoint, or to preach the savage doctrine of extermination as to show forth the gentle, forgiving spirit of the Man of Galilee. Such is the portrait of the head of the Russian Church, as it is usually drawn by the pen of foreign writers who, it may readily be surmised, really know very little about him.

In his writings, M. Pobiedonostseff indulges much in a philosophy of half-truths. He expresses himself with remarkable candor concerning the situation in those lands where representative government prevails. He considers parliamentarism a huge error and a delusion—"a triumph of egotism"—and asserts that ministers are really autocrats who rule the parliament, instead of being ruled by it. Elections and all the machinery of politics, he considers impure and repellent to the sense of duty and honor; theoretically, the majority rule while in reality the whole is ruled by a few bold, ambitious, eloquent leaders. Popular rule is an idol to be overthrown. He says:

Elections are a matter of art, having as the military their strategy and their tactics. . . . On the day of polling few give their votes intelligently. . . . The masses, the electors, after the practice of the herd, votes for one of the candidates nominated. All vote merely because they have heard his name so often. It would be vain to struggle against this herd.

These are half-truths, and the same might be said approximately of any human system of government from theocracy to mobocracy. It is a great pity that a man of the undoubted ability and force of character of this intellectual, political and religious Russian leader could not be brought into a more harmonious relation with the spirit of the age. To hope for religious or political progress in a land which is dominated by a conservatism that would have been considered ultra-century ago, is to hope in vain. It may be possible that the faith and expectation of the Russian peasant lie in the direction indicated by the leader of the Holy Synod, but we greatly doubt it. We prefer to hold, with Count Tolstoi, that the future of Russia lies in the ultimate realization of the nation's need of free schools, a free press, freedom of worship, and representative government. When these reforms come, as come they will, sooner or later, the creed-bound conservatism of Pobiedonostseff and his clerical and administrative followers will have to go to the wall.

Among the Workers

—A FREE HOME for poor consumptives has lately been established in Denver, Colo., by Dr. T. D. Bancroft, and is now opening a similar home at Colorado Springs.

—EVANGELIST G. W. EICHELBERGER has just closed remarkable revival in a tent at Bonanza, Ark.; 260 professions of religion publicly, and 152 united with the Cumberland Presbyterian Church and a number with other churches. Fund was raised for building a new church.

—ONE OF THE MOST successful evangelistic campaigns Chicago has lately known has just closed on the north side. Seven neighboring churches, including the Gross Park Methodist; Endeavor, Presbyterian; Gross Park, Baptist; Waveland Avenue, Congregational; Bowen, Methodist; the German Evangelical and English Lutheran, united in inviting Evangelist Rev. Milford H. Lyon to conduct the campaign. Services were held for four weeks. The aggregate attendance was about 25,000. More than 400 came to the front and professed conversion.

—REV. M. SAUNDERS, D.D., Buckhorn, Ky., writes: "The Soul-Winners' great work in the Cumberland Mountains still going on, with an increased number of consecrated workers. Hundreds of children have been gathered in catechetical mission schools, and taught hymns, catechism and Scriptures, and this instruction is bearing fruit. With the spoon Log College, at Buckhorn, is doing excellent work."

—MISS LAURA RADFORD, Secretary of the Y. W. C. A. Calcutta, India, writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, "You will be glad to hear that the Government has given us grant in aid of our Building Fund of $5,000. As we had not asked for a grant, it came as just another of the glad surprises our Father has for us. We need yet about $25,000 before we can build."

The Bible and the Newspaper

In the Lama's Capital

NEWS comes from India that September 15 had been set as the day of departure of the British expedition from Lhasa. This announcement would appear to indicate that satisfactory terms have been made with the Tibetan Government. After so difficult a journey, and so arduous a struggle, it is not likely that the British leaders would withdraw, unless the Lama had complied with the demands that the expedition was sent to make. It was learned that the hostility of the Lama was due to the influence of his favorite tutor over him. This man is a Mongolian who has entered the service of Russia. He is a man of considerable education, who has repeatedly visited St. Petersburg, and is a member of the Russian Geographical Society. He is known as the Lama Dorjieff.

When the Dalai Lama declared his independence of China, he was perplexed by the advice of his ecclesiastical counselors, who knew nothing of the outside world, and who gave him contradictory counsel. They were hopelessly opposed to one another, and the poor young ruler found himself forced into opposition with powerful ministers, no matter what course he adopted. His position was all the more difficult because these priestly counselors had no scruple about murdering a Lama, and had, with good reason, been suspected of having killed his predecessors. He therefore gave himself up completely to the guidance of the Russian Dorjieff, who poisoned his mind against the British, and convinced him that Russia was the most powerful and reliable protector. Overtures were made to St. Petersburg, and were received with assurances of friendship. The British Viceroy of India, recognizing the danger of having on his frontier a principality that was becoming practically a Russian province, applied for similar commercial privileges to those granted Russia, but under the advice of Dorjieff, who apparently did not know how absorbing the Japanese trouble was becoming, the Lama sent an violent reply to the Viceroy's request, and brought upon himself the attack in which his capital has been penetrated. In a recent address the Viceroy of India said: "No one regrets more than I the fighting which has occurred. We did our best to avoid it. We hope to introduce a measure of enlightenment into that monk-ridden country."

The picture on this page is from the first photograph ever taken of the Lama's palace. It is described as a majestic mountain of building, rising far above the roofs of the city. The road to it is free from stones, and very bad. The foundations of the palace rise from the base of the hill, and on these is erected tier on tier of white masonry. In the centre are two red edifices, crowned by five golden domes, which glitter in the sunlight. Between this and the city is a dense wood and cultivated fields. The city itself covers an area about a square mile in extent. The most conspicuous object in it is the Buddhist Cathedral, four stories high, surmounted by gilded domes and pinnacles. Many have tried in vain to reach this city, but it has, until now, been jealously guarded from the foot of the foreigner. It may be hoped that the terms wrung from the Lama by the British, include not only commercial concessions, but the right of missionaries to enter and proclaim in this, almost the last unevangelized land on earth, the glad tidings of salvation.

This Gospel of the kingdom should be preached in all the world for a witness unto all nations (Matt. 24: 14).

The Tremendous Battle

History gives but few parallels to the battle at Liao-Yang which began on August 30. There have been battles involving greater issues and the fate of a larger number of nations, but few in which so many men have been engaged and none in which the appliances of science have been used to a similar extent. It appears that on the Japanese side 240,000 men were in action, and on the Russian side there were at least 170,000, and probably many more. The idea of nearly half a million men gathered at one place fighting with the desperation of tigers, is simply overwhelming and appalling. Even in our own Civil War, there was no such gigantic force engaged in a single battle. In the Franco-German war, only at the supreme struggle at Sedan was the number approached. In the Napoleonic wars the number was still smaller. Only at Leipsic was there a parallel. Even at Waterloo, it is estimated that less than 300,000 men were present. Only when we go back to ancient times, where the numbers are stated by historians prone to exaggeration, do we find armies so enormous, engaged. Darius and Xerxes, and Attila are said to have brought more men into the field, but since their day there has been no struggle comparable in magnitude with that at Liao-Yang. It has been our boast that the world has advanced in civilization, and triangulation. It struck a place known as Eagle Point. The boundary extends due north to the mountain indicated by the boundary tribunal, a short distance above the fifty-sixth parallel. The monument is a four-sided bronze pyramid, six feet high, bearing the words, "Canada" and "United States" on opposite sides. In an old wooden building standing on the boundary line a dinner was spread, the table being set across the mark, half within America and half within Canada. There the commissioners dined and toasted the rulers of the two countries. It is very gratifying that this vexed question has been settled in this amicable way. The whole line will now be speedily marked and further disputes will be avoided. People who live near the line will no longer be in doubt as to which government has the right to claim their allegiance. We may well wish that every man was similarly certain about his position in the spiritual world. To many the question of Elijah is still appropriate.

How long halt ye between two opinions? If the Lord be God, follow him: but if Baal then follow him (1 Kings 18: 21).

Recognized the Call

An example of the ingenuity of men in a difficulty is narrated by an officer in the Navy. He says that two of the sailors on the vessel to which he is attached were allowed leave of absence to visit their families on shore. They had known each other from boyhood, and had been warm friends while on shipboard. They were going to towns a few miles apart, but arranged that one of them should come to the other to spend the last two days of leave together. The one who was to make the journey duly reached the town in which the other was staying on the day agreed upon; but to his chagrin discovered that the card bearing his mate's address was in the pockets of the suit of clothes that he had sent forward in his trunk. He made inquiries at the hotels, the Post Office and other places, but could not learn where his friend was staying. After debating with himself what course he should pursue, he heard the notes of a bugle with which a clock-pedler was trying to attract customers. The sound suggested to the sailor a way of solving his difficulty. For a small sum he obtained the use of the bugle at intervals, and went into various parts of the town, and on the corners of the streets played his ship's call. Very soon he was rewarded for his ingenuity. A window in one of the houses was thrown up, and a familiar voice hailed him, bidding him come in. He could not have found a landsman in that way, but a sailor, as he well knew, would recognize the familiar strain, and would know that it was a sailor who was blowing it. So it should be with the Christian. The language of the kingdom of God should find recognition in the ears of all who belong to the kingdom.

There are, it may be, so many kinds of voices in the world, and none of them is without signification. Therefore, if I know not the meaning of the voice, I shall be unto him that speaketh a barbarian (1 Cor. 14: 10).

BRIEF NOTES

A statistical authority says that Tibet occupies a unique position in the proportion of the sexes. The number of men in the country is fifteen times that of women.

Mr. and Mrs. Tennyson Smith, the English temperance advocates, have arranged to visit America to conduct a temperance campaign during the ensuing winter. They have been exceedingly successful in their own country.

Australia has no orphan asylums. Every child who is orphaned, or is not supported by parents, becomes a ward of the State, and is placed in a private family, where board and clothes are paid for until the fourteenth birthday.

Dr. Muller, who attended ex-President Kruger on his last illness, says that shortly before the end, the dying statesman declared, "I no longer hate the English. It is a pity there was war; but everything will come right in the end."

there are abundant grounds for the boast, but such a conflict as this proves that the nature of man has undergone no change. He is still as ferocious as a wild animal and it is still possible to array huge numbers against one another, all bent on using every resource for the destruction of life. The fact is depressing, and as we think of the slain and the wounded and the widowhood, we can but appeal to Him who alone has the power to remove from the world the awful scourge:

How long, O Lord, holy and true, dost thou not judge and avenge? (Rev. 6: 10.)

Marking the Boundary

A press despatch from Tacoma, Wash., announces the setting up of the first boundary monument between the United States and Canada. The Canadian steamer, Danube, carried the commissioners representing the United States and Canada up the Portland Canal. They were Prof. W. F. King, of Ottawa, head of the Dominion Astronomical Survey, and O. H. Tittmann of the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey. The position of the initial monument was determined by

Remembered Opportunities

SUNDAY SCHOOL REVIEW LESSON, BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS

WHAT have we done with our opportunities? is a good question for all thoughtful reviews of life, daily, weekly, monthly, as well as for quarterly reviews, on whatever lessons and for all anniversaries. What we have not done with our opportunities is often more significant than what we have done. The quarterly review, instead of being the dullest day of the quarter, often used for a music drill, or made a "rally" about nothing, should be a solemn review, not only of what we have learned, but also of what we have lived. It should remind us of the march of time, of the coming of eternity.

One sweetly solemn thought comes to me o'er and o'er,
I'm nearer my home to-day, than I ever have been before.

Instead of attempting to review all the lessons at two minutes each, we may well use an omitted lesson, one of the most thrilling of the quarter, that of the murder of Naboth (1. Kings 21), as a centre-piece in which to set forth once more the chief figures of the quarter, with the side-lights of all the lessons turned upon them.

Where did this Naboth murder occur? In Jezreel, then the capital of the ten tribes of Israel. When and why had they separated from the other tribes? On Rehoboam's coronation, because he refused just reforms of burdensome taxation. Who had led the revolt? Jeroboam. In fear of reunion, what sin did he fall into? The setting up of calf worship at Bethel and Dan, to keep his people from going annually to the temple at Jerusalem. What grosser idolatries had his successors Omri and Ahab added? The foul worship of Baal and Astarte. By whom especially was this licentious worship fostered? By Ahab's heathen wife, Jezebel. What prophet of God had dared to rebuke this sin and proclaim God's punishment in famine? Elijah. How had God cared for Elijah in the famine? By ravens at the brook Cherith. Here let us pause for a story, showing how God has used other birds to cheer his prophets. Luther, when greatly disheartened by the Ahab's and Jezebel's of his time, threw himself down to rest in the forest. He almost envied the dead. Just then, a robin lighted on a bush close by, and struck up a song. Luther looked and listened, and said to himself: "This little creature knows nothing of God or Christ, and yet, exposed to a thousand dangers, it sings, carefree. And I, who know God and Christ, was sinking in despair." The bird had not fed his body, but his heart and soul.

"Cheer up," the sparrow chirpeth,
"Thy Father feedeth me;
Think how much more he careth,
O, lonely child, for thee!"

And when the brook dried up, how was Elijah sustained? By a widow's meal and oil that never failed. That recalls another story:

The Rev. Willis R. Hotchkiss, a missionary who recently returned from British East Africa, in an address not long ago, related this incident from his experience in a certain place. He said: "The people did not want me any more than the world wanted its first great missionary, Christ. They told me that they would kill me if I remained more than three days. I felt I was in the place God wanted me to be, so I sent word back to them, 'I am here to tell you about God. I expect to stay.' It would have fared very ill with me if it had not been for a divine providence. An old woman who used to pass my hut going to and from her work in the fields, managed secretly to drop a root of cassava before my door; it is a root from which comes our tapioca. I roasted that root, and it enabled me to eke out my slender supply of provisions through the months." When the famine was about to end, to whom did Elijah go with a heroic proposal and what was it? Through Obadiah he called Ahab and proposed a fire test on Mt. Carmel, before all the people, by which it should be known whether Jehovah or Baal was the true God. When God answered by fire, was everybody converted from the false worship? No, Jezebel was wicked as before. Who fled from her threats? What prayer did Elijah offer under the juniper tree? That he might die. And did God answer his prayer? Yes, he answered, No. What an impressive picture of the blessing of unanswered prayers might be made by putting a picture of Elijah under the juniper tree, praying to die, side by side with a picture of Elijah going to heaven in a chariot of glory.

When by earth's crossing lights perplexed,
I ask the thing that should not be,
God, reading right my erring text,
Gives what I would ask, could I see.

It was after God had sent Elijah to Horeb, and encouraged him there, and sent him back for heroic service, that the crime against Naboth occurred, in the story of which we shall see the three great personages of the lesson: Elijah, Ahab, and Jezebel; the first at his best, the others at their worst.

Ahab's covetousness and oppression. Ahab was one of that great number of men who substitute covetousness for contentment. His palace grounds were all one man could reasonably desire, but Naboth's beautiful vineyard at hand made him unhappy with land-hunger. He was willing to buy it, but as it was an heirloom of Naboth's, endeared by family history, he would not sell. Ahab, accustomed to have his own way, had a bad fit of the blues to be denied this whim. Many a man, ambitious to rule others, would be wiser if he first conquered himself. In some men anger and impatience are veritable tyrants of the inner kingdom. A scientific gentleman in Washington, exasperated by the stupidity of a negro servant, seized the nearest book at hand and threw it at him. The servant dodged, and the book went out of the window. The servant was sent for it, but some passer-by had taken it and disappeared. On looking about, he found that it was one of his rarest books he had thus thrown away. Some weeks afterward he got an opportunity to replace the book at $40. On examination he found it was the very same. His moment of anger had cost him $40.

Covetousness leads to oppression, not alone in kings, but often in private lives, where, by law, or in spite of it, the strong seize the property of the weak. In most homes the woman is the very force that prevents this, but in Ahab's household the leader of wickedness was the woman. The wife was a Lady Macbeth. She hesitated at no crime that would advance her power or pleasure. She bade her husband be merry, for he should have what he desired. With Ahab's seal she ordered that Naboth should be falsely accused and condemned. It was not the first time that a robber had a court at command. And so the courts, at her word, murdered Naboth that Ahab might rob him. "The men of the city, even the elders and nobles did as Jezebel had sent unto them." This is not the only time that "nobles" have dishonored their name. Said Tennyson:

Kind hearts are more than coronets,
And simple faith than Norman blood.

In the palace of the Doges at Venice there hang the portraits of those merchant-rulers, and a long line they make. But one space is empty. A black curtain hangs there instead of a picture. Marino Faliero was found guilty of treason and beheaded. His portrait was removed from among the portraits of the Doges.

ELIJAH DENOUNCING AHAB IN NABOTH'S VINEYARD

But the eye of every person who enters the room rests upon that black curtain. It seems to fascinate each visitor. In the gallery of queens, most of them noble, the historians hang the blackest curtains over Bloody Mary and Jezebel, who illustrate how a woman who turns her powers to evil may outrun man in wickedness.

What folly are most of the shows of wealth! An unconscious travesty on "life's poor distinction" occurred in Vienna last April, when an undertaker got the body of a pauper and that of a millionaire mixed, and the pauper got the millionaire's big funeral. This would never have been known had not the wife insisted on a last look at the tomb. On opening the casket, behold the pauper! Nowhere more fitly than in this review of kings, mostly stained with foolish ambitions, can young people be taught to repeat those greatest of uninspired words, in which Shakespeare makes Wolsey say, after the failure of his ambitions:

I charge thee, fling away ambition:
By that sin fell the angels; how can man, then,
The image of his Maker, hope to win by it?
Love thyself last; cherish those hearts that hate thee;
Corruption wins not more than honesty.
Still, in thy right hand, carry gentle peace
To silence envious tongues. Be just and fear not;
Let all the ends thou aim'st at be thy country's,
Thy God's and truth's; then if thou failest,
Thou failest a blessed martyr.

And we may well add here a similar summary of virtue in prose—the words in which Pilpay condensed for his master, King Dabshelim of India, the truths in his great library:

1. The greater part of the sciences comprises but one single word—Perhaps; and the whole history of mankind contains no more than three—they are born, suffer, die.
2. Love nothing but what is good, and do all that thou lovest to do; think nothing but what is true, and speak not all that thou thinkest.

3. O kings! tame your passions, govern yourselves, and will be only child's play to govern the world.

4. O kings! O people! it can never be often enough repeated to you, what the half-witted venture to doubt, that there is no happiness without virtue, and no virtue without God.

But in speaking of kings, and queens, and nobles who have abused their powers for selfish ends, let us honor those to whom "office" is opportunity for doing good, nobles oblige. At the time of Lord Shaftesbury's death, two ragged boys, almost denuded of clothes, stood gazing into window. The one remarked to his companion, "Lord Shaftesbury is dead." His little friend replied, "That's not Lord Shaftesbury." "Yes," replied the other, "it is Lord Shaftesbury." General Chaffee, head of the United States Army, was visiting a hospital in one of the posts of the Philippines. He asked how it was that the patients were getting no milk, and was told because of the short supply. "How is it," he asked, "that we had milk the table this morning?" "There's only enough for the officers' mess." "Let the sick have it, and we will do without," said the General promptly.

Elijah's courageous rebukes of sin. Like lightning flashing at midnight is the courage of Elijah, seen on the black background of Ahab's and Jezebel's meanness and murder. A young man graduated with high honors, the finest mathematician that had ever walked the halls of the great university. Soon after graduation, a minister, who had known him from boyhood, met him and said: "I understand that you are celebrated for your mathematical skill. Have a problem I wish you to solve." "Tell me what it is," said the young man, "and I will try." The clergyman answered: "What is a man profited if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul?" The young man walked away in silence, saying himself, "It is a great problem. The question rang in his ears, day and by night. He said to himself, 'There is no profit, if I gain the pleasures, and all the wealth, and all the honors of the world, and lose my soul.' He surrendered himself to God, accepted Christ as his Saviour, and became an eminent minister of the Gospel.

Does any one think that killing people to get property stopped with Jezebel or is confined to highwaymen to-day? In the inquest over the who sale slaughter in the burning of the excursion steamer General Slocum, June, 1904, Rear-Admiral Melville declared that the deaths were due to defective laws for which steamship owners generally were responsible, they having defeated at Washington, because of the cost it would be to them, a proposed code that would have saved these and many other lives, by requiring adequate safety appliances.

Professor Taylor, of Chicago, in this telling story about evolution. There was a large assembly of Socialists and Anarchists in Chicago discussing the great question of religion, and an Anarchist got up and raved against the idea of the Golden Rule, declaring that the doctrine that we should do others as we would have them to do us is an absurd doctrine, that had never been believed or practiced and that the sooner men got rid of it the better. Then arose a Socialist and said: "It is well known that man has been evolved through various degrees of development, that he has passed through the stages of the lower animals, and," he continued, pointing to the Anarchist, "that man there seems to me as if his evolution had been arrested at the stage of the hyena." The man who professes to believe the Golden Rule and in his life gets Naboth's vineyard by foul means when fair will avail, is not truly humane or human, but a beast of prey like Jezebel.

Against this tendency to greed and oppression rises the hero voices of the prophets of all ages. The great lesson of the quarter, rising above all its shadows of idolatry and oppression, is the lesson of Christian courage. Elijah wore sheepskin, while Rehoboam and Jeroboam and Omri and Ahab wore purple, but he towers as the kingliest figure of all, even above the good kings Asa and Jehoshaphat. History, as well as heaven, crowns the bravest and the best. I see the face of God and cease to fear the face of man.

In the middle of last century, while 25,000 French soldiers lay encamped, a young officer advanced alone into wood to reconnoitre. He was suddenly surrounded by ambush of the enemy, and while the bayonets pricked his breast, a stern voice whispered in his ear, "Make the least noise and you are a dead man!" Without one second's hesitation the young hero shouted, at the top of his voice, "Help! the enemy are here!" and instantly he fell pierced with a score of bayonets through his body. He fell; but the French army was saved from surprise. You see that, what that brave youth, military duty had become an instinct and habit to be instantly obeyed even on pain of death. Faith may pass into purpose, and purpose into deliberate resolution.

Let us honor courage in civil life, no less than that of the soldier, for example, that of a farmer's wife, Mrs. Stephen Haines, of Morristown, N. J., who, hearing her husband shot for help, saw him tossed and gored by a mad bull. Seizing a pitchfork, she ran to the spot, only to find her husband sensible. She attacked the bull furiously, driving the tip of the fork into his body till he broke, and then clubbed the beast with the handle, until by a fierce blow on the nose he was put to flight.

The Twentieth Century Home

A NEIGHBORLY, HELPFUL, ENTERTAINING FAMILY MAGAZINE

THE TWENTIETH CENTURY HOME requires no introduction to the good people of this country. Wherever magazines are read, there THE TWENTIETH CENTURY HOME is cherished. It stands for the highest ideal of home life. It points the way to the development of all that is to be valued and prized in the family circle. Its pages are read and re-read, and, in countless homes throughout our country they are prized as the one unerring, failing guide to greater happiness, to a fuller enjoyment of life, and to a more perfect development of all that contributes to the contentment of each and every member within the sacred precincts of HOME.

WHAT IT WILL DO FOR YOU

THE TWENTIETH CENTURY HOME, like a good faithful counsellor, will help you over the many perplexing phases that confront us on every hand in daily life. There are points of etiquette concerning which we are in doubt—etiquette at home, etiquette when visiting, etiquette when receiving, etiquette when traveling; the issuing of invitations, the preparation of cards, etiquette of introduction, etiquette of weddings, etiquette of funerals, indeed, all the phases of good form than we can think of at the moment, which must be solved, and solved correctly, in every family that pretends to any degree of social standing. All these problems are met and satisfactorily answered in the columns of THE TWENTIETH CENTURY HOME.

ABOUT DRESS.

In the matter of dress, one of the most intricate problems of modern times, especially in families of limited means, THE TWENTIETH CENTURY HOME will prove a much valued and highly prized friend. It offers in each and every issue numerous suggestions, every one of which is well worth more than the yearly subscription price.

It tells how to dress, what to wear, when to wear, how to prepare it, how to make it over, and how to vary the style with few and inexpensive additions, which advice to the lady and daughters of the house must prove a mine of valuable information.

ABOUT CHILDREN

The training of children, which to so many fathers and mothers is a most distressing problem, is considered interestingly and intelligently from every point of view in the columns of THE TWENTIETH CENTURY HOME. There are wilful children that require severe treatment, backward children that require encouragement, sickly children who need strength, weak children lacking proper nourishment—each and every one of which presents problems that are handled in a masterly way by specialists in the columns of THE TWENTIETH CENTURY HOME.

OUR GIRLS

Girls, however much we may love them, are naturally a source of tender solicitude to fathers and mothers, day and night, watch over their physical, mental and moral welfare. Some would seek employment, others are ambitious from a social standpoint, and, again, others would devote themselves to professional pursuits, while not a few would leave the parental roof for the great city, in which to achieve not only independence for themselves, but financial assistance for the dear ones at home.

The hints and suggestions contained in the columns of THE TWENTIETH CENTURY HOME will be helpful to these girls, and will enable mothers and fathers to intelligently and gently direct those energies into channels that will contribute to the everlasting good of the dear ones on whom their hearts' affections are centered.

MR. JOHN BRISBEN WALKER
PROPRIETOR OF THE TWENTIETH CENTURY HOME

BOYS GOING OUT INTO THE WORLD

Next come the boys—the men of the future—who in the coming years are to bear the brunt of the burden—on their shoulders will rest the responsibilities to come when father and mother are too far advanced in life to contribute to the material welfare of the family.

These boys are like young eagles, eager to fly from the parental nest, in order that out in the world they may achieve fame and fortune. Full of vitality and energy which must not be repressed, they seek an outlet, and only the wisdom of ages, the experience of experts, can thus direct their course, that on the sea of life they may avoid shipwreck and disaster which has overtaken thousands who, without helm or rudder, have ventured upon the perilous voyage. Here also THE TWENTIETH CENTURY HOME is the counsellor, the friend, the guide, for parents in their attitude toward ambitious, energetic, enthusiastic boys.

THE MOTHER

The mother of the family occupies a position of grave responsibility. She must seek counsel, in order that the children to whom she gives birth may be strong and healthy, and, to this effect, it is necessary that she herself understand many phases of the mystery of human life which, to most women, is as a book which is sealed. Many children will be born weak—many mothers will be unable to give them that nourishment which nature has ordained for infants. Substitutes must be chosen, and how shall the young mother decide on a proper selection from the multitude of foods that are brought to her attention. One child needs fattening substance, another needs phosphates, a third needs tissue, a fourth requires bone, and a fifth brain-food. Who shall guide her in the selection of the one food that will meet the requirements of her beloved offspring? And in the treatment of the simple ailments of childhood how can she avoid the terrible risk of overdosing unless some friendly counsellor of the family gives her the proper advice? This is a department to which THE TWENTIETH CENTURY HOME pays special attention, and which we are sure will result in the saving of thousands of precious human lives.

THE FATHER

In all these phases of family life the father is intensely interested. While we cannot promise him any help in the commercial difficulties that present themselves from time to time in the life of every breadwinner, we can relieve him from many perplexing distractions incident to family life, by affording him such honest advice as will make THE TWENTIETH CENTURY HOME a vade mecum to everything but business affairs. The well and carefully prepared index to the contents of THE TWENTIETH CENTURY HOME will enable him at a glance to discover such articles as at any particular time may be of special importance to him, and thus afford him in the perplexing questions that must and will arise, such sage and helpful counsel as will make every issue of THE TWENTIETH CENTURY HOME worth more than the price of a yearly subscription.

In addition to all this, our literary department is the best of any family magazine in the world, while the art department is absolutely unequalled. The literary giants of all countries, and artists of international repute, have made THE TWENTIETH CENTURY HOME famous throughout the length and breadth of the land.

We invite you to give us a trial. Join our ranks to-day, and never again will your home fail to invite the visits of that ideal family paper of the age, THE TWENTIETH CENTURY HOME.

50,000 Hear the Gospel Outdoors

MANY direct beneficent results have grown out of the great evangelistic movement organized in Philadelphia in 1899, and which has been carried forward ever since with increasing access and vigor. In no quarter have the good results of the movement so manifested themselves as among the Italian population, although many predicted that the work would be the most hopeless. A church of over one hundred members has been organized, and many are being drawn to its services. A flourishing Sunday School appeals to large numbers of boys and girls, and a week day school gives instruction in English, and also teaches useful employments. The uplifting and refining influence of the work is manifesting itself in the neighborhood. At a recent noon-day rally the evangelistic workers, some fifty young Italians, between the ages of eighteen and twenty-five, marched to the stage and sang a hymn. When the question was asked, "How many of you are Christians?" nearly every hand was raised.

Another excellent outcome of this Gospel work is the organization and development of the St. Paul Church, for which the Rev. Dr. J. R. Miller is the pastor. Organized in a tent some five years ago, it now has above a hundred enthusiastic members, who are building a new stone church, which will seat twelve hundred people. Several other churches have also grown out of this work, and are making gratifying progress.

Tents are erected in congested districts, where every afternoon children's services are held, and every evening direct appeals are made to crowds of people to accept Christ. From these quarters cheering reports are received. Important noonday meetings are held in industrial centres of the city, and many busy men are thus reached. They are held on the plaza of the City Hall, at Baldwin's Locomotive Works, under the shadow of the famous old State House at Cramp's shipyards, and several other places. Rev. James B. Ely, D.D., general superintendent, estimates that above 50,000 people are reached every week through these services. This does not include the 5,000 or more which assemble at Lemon Hill, Fairmount Park, every Sunday morning and evening, to hear the Gospel story.

At the Monday noon-day rally all the workers come together and encourage each other with brief recitals of their experiences. Some of these noon-day rallies are attended by hundreds of children, by negroes, by Italians, and by so many earnest workers, that the great hall will not contain them all, while both sides and the rear are lined by those who cannot find seats. At a recent meeting earnest addresses were made by John H. Converse, Hon. John Wanamaker, and by several workers who have charge of the tents. At this meeting Dr. Ely reported that the total attendance for the week ending August 19th, was 51,475, and that more than 16,000 had attended the previous Sunday's services. Those who had the privilege of listening to the fine singing of the children will never forget it. It is little wonder that one of the speakers said: "When I go to heaven, I am sure that the last thing I shall hear will be a child's voice, for no earthly sound carries so far."

Mr. Wanamaker told the children that Mr. Converse had given at least the price of one of the biggest engines he builds in his locomotive works, to help defray the expenses of the tent work. "I believe this work means a great deal," he said, "to all the churches of the city. The evangelists do not come teaching Presbyterianism, or Methodism, or any other ism. They come with the little child Jesus in their arms, and they ask you to look at him. It makes little difference which church it is to which you belong, if it is the Church of Jesus Christ."

President Patton of Princeton, said of the movement recently: "I am sure that some of our fashionable churches would be better if they could have preached to them some of the sermons delivered in the tents. It is a great mistake to have one Christ for the rich and another for the poor; to have one theology for the church and another for the tent. Christians who go to fine churches and to operas want the Gospel evaporated into something finer than one hears at evangelistic services; yet, when death's shadows are on our brow, we all want the same precious Gospel which is preached to the poorest." ALLAN SUTHERLAND.

New York's Subway Nearly Ready

(SEE ILLUSTRATION ON COVER PAGE)

WHILE it is not possible to predict to a day just when the Underground Railway System of New York City will be open to the public, it is quite safe to say that it cannot be very long before the famous "subway" will be crowded with passengers, whirling from City Hall to Harlem, or vice-versa, in fifteen minutes. From City Hall to One Hundred and Twenty-fifth Street in less than twenty minutes—that is what the general manager of the Interborough Company promises the citizen who has the necessary nickel. This is marked contrast with the time, not so very long ago, when horse-car passengers spent two and one-half hours every day traveling to and fro between Bond Street and Broadway and One Hundred and Fourth Street, Harlem. One hour and fifteen minutes was the quickest time at could be made between these two points, one way. The evolution from the old "sweat-boxes," as the horse-cars were called, has been gradual; but there remains little left to be desired, even by the most fastidious person, in the equipment of the cars to be used in the new Subway. These cars are models of strength and beauty, and have every facility for the comfort and convenience of the traveler. They will seat fifty-six passengers each, and can carry as many as one hundred and seventy-five. Strength and safety have been considered in the construction of these cars, the sides being sheathed with copper, and floors lined with asbestos, thus minimizing the danger from collision and fire. The story of how the underground roadbed upon which these cars are to run, has been made, is most wonderful.

Pliny says that in Caesar's time it took 30,000 men eleven years to build a tunnel three and one-half miles in length, while in four years, in New York, the masters of engineering mechanics, with the aid of less than 12,000 men, have made a tunnel equal in capacity to one of over fifty miles in length, to say nothing of ten miles of elevated structure, and the excavation of extra areas for underground stations. It would seem almost impossible to overestimate the magnitude of this work. Underground New York has gradually become a replica of the upper city, with its system of lighting, drainage, propulsion, and other appurtenances; but the obstacles encountered in carrying out this stupendous project of underground transportation were many and great. The sewer problem was one of the hardest. In some places the pipes were relaid alongside the tunnel; others, for long stretches, were jacked up to the roof; still others, where they crossed the structure, were split up into two or more smaller pipes, so that they might pass between the surface car tracks and the Subway. In one instance, a large district draining into the Hudson River was diverted to the East River. Trolley and other street-car traffic must not be interfered with, and these tracks must of necessity be supported. Strange and devious are the ways of this Subway. At some points it is only four or five feet below the surface, while in others it takes a header down under the river's bed. At one place it rides triumphant over a breezy viaduct in Harlem; at another it invades the home of a great Metropolitan daily, going through the press-rooms down in Park Row; but so daintily did this monster pick its way that the paper never missed an hour's use of its presses. The tunnel seemed to be especially attracted by this particular publication, for at Broadway and Forty-second Street the tunnel took a curve and darted down under the uptown edifice of the same journal.

The tunnel follows Broadway to One Hundred and Fourth Street, where it divides, going east and west; but before reaching this point, it passes beneath the elevated railroad tracks. Here is where the contractor found unusual obstacles, for he had not only to hold up the surface of the streets and several car-lines, but also the enormous elevated structure. When solid rock confronted the engineers and contractors, the path was blasted clean through, as was the case from One Hundred and Forty-fifth Street to a little north of One Hundred and Ninetieth Street, where the tunnel was constructed practically through solid rock. The rock drill is an important feature of all excavation work in New York City. London and Paris subways were built through clay, and Boston's through earth.

The great Escalator, or moving stairway, which conveys passengers to and from the elevated section of the subway uptown, is the largest of its kind in this country.

A school for Subway motormen has been busy, preparing and graduating men for positions as conductors or motormen, and when the system begins its operations, they will be fully prepared to handle the crowds and manage the mechanism which will whirl them in the morning down town, and home in the evening. According to Mr. W. B. Parsons, chief engineer of the Rapid Transit Commission, "all but one-half of one per cent. of the work on the sections between City Hall station and One Hundred and Forty-fifth Street, is completed, and the cars should be running regularly between these two points within a few weeks."

are doing three things there: First, Healing poor diseased bodies. Second, Taking the opportunity to preach the Gospel. Third, Training young Christian girls to become medical missionaries. We are getting ready nurses and women doctors to help the medical missions of all denominations, who are already at work among 125,000,000 of India's zenana women."

Dr. Condict speaks enthusiastically of the bright life of Christian usefulness that is opening up before those young native students who are being trained at the Ludhiana College. Four of the students ALD's devoted friends, a young lady of Pennsylvania. While the selection of a student was being made, this young lady died, but it was found that she had made ample provision in her will for her substitute in the field of India's missions.

The other three CHRISTIAN HERALD students have just completed the first year of study at the Medical College. There are now six others—all fine young women of superior education, awaiting scholarships of $75.00 a year, to enable them to take the course at Ludhiana that will fit them to go forth as healers of the sick and bearers of the Divine Message.

Eva Ullah began the medical course at the college this spring. She has a good record and is putting her heart into her work. Razabai, also needing a scholarship, is a very superior girl, with an earnest Christian character. She has passed her matriculation examination and will be a valuable worker. Naomi, a sensible girl, of good Christian character, is from the mountain country. Miriam, another good girl, and Alice, a very intelligent girl, wish to take the training course as nurses. Winnie Heller, a bright young Eurasian girl, is waiting for a scholarship.

Speaking of the X-Ray apparatus, which, with its perfect equipment, is now ready for shipment to India, Dr. Condict said: "This beautiful machine, the gift of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers to our Women's Medical College and Hospital, will be the first apparatus of its kind ever sent to any Medical Mission in India, or, as far as I know, to any Mission in the world."

The photograph on this page is that of a group of high-caste India widows, who have received a mission education. All are women of fine Christian character, well equipped for work among the neglected native women of their own land. One of the group is now studying medicine at Ludhiana.

NATIVE MEDICAL STUDENTS AT LUDHIANA

are supported by CHRISTIAN HERALD readers. Mary Morton, the senior CHRISTIAN HERALD student, has just completed her second year. She received her education in the M. E. School in Poona, and is a finely educated, consecrated Christian girl. Her medical education was undertaken by one of THE CHRISTIAN HER-

Missions in Japan and Korea*

DURING the war between Russia and Japan, the cheering facts demanded in the Topic are difficult to find. The conduct of the national enemy, a professing Christian nation, must have done much to prejudice the Japanese against Christianity. To a nation so intelligent as Japan, however, we may hope that the difference between profession and conduct will be obvious, and that it will not judge Christianity by the behavior of a nation which acts in violation of its first principles.

It is only half a century ago that missionary work was systematically commenced in Japan, and it was not until 1868 that full liberty was granted to the Christian missionaries. The Protestant Episcopal Church promptly entered the field, and was followed by the Presbyterians, the Congregational and other churches. The American Bible Society took up work there with remarkable energy, and has been a most important factor in the propagation of Christianity. The establishment of the Doshisha, a college built and endowed principally by American funds, has also contributed largely to the spread of Christianity among the upper classes. A conservative estimate made before the outbreak of the war, placed the number of Protestant converts at 43,000. Though this is relatively a small proportion of the entire population of 44,000,000, it is marvelous that in so short a time, so many have been won.

In Korea, the pioneer work was done by the New Testament itself. Long before it was safe for the missionary to enter, Rev. John Ross, of Moukden, learned the Korean language, translated the New Testament, and sent large numbers of copies into the country. On the arrival of the missionaries, they found people in all parts of the land familiar with the Gospel and eager to be taught. Not until 1884 was the door opened, and then it was to the missionary as a medical healer rather than as a preacher. In a few years about 800 natives out of Korea's 12,000,000 had been won, and it is believed that now there are over 5,000 converts. Political troubles and the disturbances incident to the present war have sadly interfered with missionary work, but the prospects of success when peace is restored are bright.

ON HIGHER GROUND

I'm pressing on the upward way,
New heights I'm gaining every day;
Still praying as I onward bound,
Lord, plant my feet on higher ground.

I want to scale the utmost height,
And catch a gleam of glory bright;
But still I'll pray till heaven I've found,
Lord, lead me on to higher ground.

Lord, lift me up and let me stand
By faith on heaven's table-land—
A higher plane than I have found—
Lord, plant my feet on higher ground.

To preserve the original freshness and color of your dainty summer fabrics, avoid the use of ordinary yellow soaps. These contain rosin and strong acids that destroy the color and do not rinse perfectly. Ivory, a soap made of clean, fresh oils and simple alkali, perfectly combined, rinses readily and will not destroy color or fabric. The saving in wear and appearance is much more than the slight additional cost of Ivory over ordinary soap. 99⁴/₁₀₀ per cent. pure.

Little Children Help Others

ONE of the most interesting and pleasing features connected with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home at Mont-Lawn is the interest which children, more fortunate than the little guests, take in the work.

The letters which some of these little ones write are full of that sympathy, which wells up so naturally in each tender heart when told of others who are deprived by poverty from enjoying the beauties and freedom of the country. How ready and willing to work and help the little "Rosebuds" were, is shown by the letter sent by the leader:

DEAR FRIENDS OF THE CHRISTIAN HERALD—I am a little girl, twelve years old, living at Rockville Centre, but I spent my summer vacation at East Setauket with my grandparents. This summer Elsie Wheeler (my cousin) and I thought it would be nice to have an entertainment for the benefit of the Fresh-Air Fund. So we selected aid of a number of our little friends to help us, and on August 12 we held our entertainment in my grandfather's barn, asking an admission fee of ten cents. We forwarded the money ($9) to you, hoping it may give pleasure to some little ones not as fortunate as we are.

Sincerely yours,
E. R. HORTON.

An enclosed clipping, from the local newspaper, gives the names of the girls and boys who took part in the entertainment. The movement originated with Edna Horton, Elsie Wheeler and Hazel West, they invited their playmates to join in their efforts. Among those who assisted were—Florence Edwards, Irene Hannowell, Sadie and Evelyn Hutchinson, Alida Gurney, Hattie Jayne, Helen Tyler, Ruth and Florence Hawkins, Marion Peters, Ralph Hannowell, Robert Horton, Clifford Hutchinson, Mattie Mamann, Oliver and Wilfred Lyon. The manager was Robert Darling; musical director, Albert Hallock; Ticket Agent, Mary West. The Hall was beautifully decorated with flowers and flags, and the curtains and stage admirably arranged. The programme was well rendered and interesting, and the children are to be congratulated on their faithful work in preparing the same.

Another letter says:

Enclosed please find six dollars ($6) to send two poor little children to Mont-Lawn. Last year I sent three dollars ($3) for one poor child. Mamma, sister and I gave a social to our friends, we had a nice time, and took in almost six dollars ($6). We have two little Fresh-Air children from Cleveland. They have been here two weeks, their time will be up to-morrow. They were sent by the Fresh-Air Camp of Cleveland.

Yours truly,
LUCILLE POOL

In the same envelope came a letter from one of the two "Fresh-Airs" at the Pool home.

DEAR CHRISTIAN HERALD:

I am a poor little "Fresh-Air" girl from Cleveland. My sister and I are staying in the country with Mr. and Mrs. Pool. I am ten years old and my sister is eight. We have a nice time milking cows, gathering eggs and feeding the chickens.

Mrs. Pool's girl is going to send $3 and so am I. Mrs. Pool gave us the social money, and we want to send two of the poorest children to Mont-Lawn from New York City.

Yours truly,
ELSIE HANGELINGE.

A primary class in Macatawa, Mich., called the Busy Builders, send $3. This money, the teacher writes, was gathered by the children, who "denied themselves candy, popcorn, and the many alluring slot-machines. Learning that it is better to give than to receive, in making some little one happy at Mont-Lawn."

The following letter speaks for itself, and should be very helpful to those who would like to help the Fresh-Air Fund, and have but little to give. The pennies of these little ones are greater in the sight of the Father than many dollars from a millionaire. The children's mite is indeed blessed both to the giver and the receiver.

HAMILTON, N. Y.

Enclosed find money-order for four dollars for Fresh-Air Fund from the superintendent and children of the primary department of the First Baptist Bible School, Hamilton, N. Y. For several years our primaries have given three dollars a year to send a Fresh-Air child to Mont-Lawn. It may be helpful to other schools to know how we raise our money. We have a "love-penny" box, in which we drop our pennies on Sunday, during the early part of the summer. The superintendent tells the condition of these poor children in New York, and of the beautiful home at Mont-Lawn, where they can go for ten days if their friends will send the small sum required to keep them. Occasionally a story from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is told.

This school has many visitors. They are influenced by what they see and hear, and they make an offering. One lady, whose husband is a pastor in a distant town, said: "I want to know more about that Fresh-Air Fund. I think it would be nice for our school to do something." So the superintendent gladly gave her the information needed, which a personal visit to the Home last summer enabled her to do. A member of the C. E. Society said, "I think our Society ought to send one child." So we see that when we try to do good others are influenced and helped by what they see us do.

The Sunday before the picnic or excursion, the superintendent asks the children not to spend all the pennies their parents give them, but deny themselves something and bring that money the following Sunday for the Fresh-Air child, and tell what they did without. It was very interesting to hear them tell last Sunday how they did without candy, peanuts, popcorn, and did not go on the merry-go-round, etc. This pleased our visitors so much, that a gentleman from the South handed a little boy some money, and sent him up to the "love-penny" box with it. In this way we completed our three dollars, and now we shall be a great deal happier and enjoy the summer better, because we have helped some one else to have a good time. The superintendent sends one dollar as a thank-offering to the Lord, for permitting her to see for herself what is being done at Mont-Lawn. She appreciates the courtesies shown her by the friends in the Home last summer, in carrying her to and from the Home when in Nyack, in taking her over the grounds and through the buildings. The chapel exercises were delightful and very interesting. The songs, talks, prayers, and blackboard lesson were all so simple and sweet, so easy to be understood, we did not wonder the children sat in rapt attention, and their faces beamed with happiness.

Three dollars and seventy cents is sent as a birthday offering of the Doylestown Presbyterian Sunday School, Primary Department, to be used in Fresh-Air work at Mont-Lawn.

The Great Battle at Liao-Yang

INTEREST in the Far-Eastern campaign, which was lately centred on Port Arthur, has now been transferred to the neighborhood of Liao-Yang, where one of the greatest battles of modern times began on August 29. For nearly a week previous, three Japanese armies, under the supreme command of Field Marshal Oyama, had stubbornly fought for the possession of the heights surrounding the city. A fourth Japanese force, which had marched from New Chwang up the Liao valley, menaced the Russian left, while Gen. Kuroki, with a strong body of troops, threatened Gen. Kouropatkin's northward communications with Moukden. Liao-Yang was very strongly fortified, Russia's intention being to make it the great military stronghold of Manchuria. Skilful engineers had erected elaborate defences, and dug double and treble rows of trenches, with open lines of communication for the rapid transfer of heavy guns from one point to another. Great military magazines and vast storehouses were filled with supplies of ammunition, corn, wheat, rice, and tinned foods for the army. Strong forts with covered approaches defended the stout walls and the artillery was modern and abundant. All the neighboring hills went singing into battle, with their bands playing.
